ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

(No. 355.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(12.20.) CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness), (for Mr. JENNINGS, Stockport), moved to leave out, in line 11, "average attendance," and insert "on the total attendance." The hon. Member said that after the concession which the Government had made last night he would not press the Amendment to a Division.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, to leave out "in average attendance," and insert "on the total attendance."

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I have upon the Paper an Amendment to the same effect, and I think the Government might make some concession to the denominational schools in this respect, especially in the case of schools which are largely attended by half-timers. I may mention one case in which the proposal of the Government will result in a loss of 17s. 6d. per week, or £40 for the whole year; and I think that after the concessions which were made last night a further concession might be made by the Government. I am afraid that if some concession is not made it will result in the closing of many voluntary schools.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I must really say that it is not in the power of the Government to comply with this Amendment. The question is one which has been under our careful consideration; and we have gone as far as we possibly can in order to meet the demands of hon. Members. I trust, therefore, that the Amendment will not be pressed.

(12.25.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I am afraid that the wording of this clause will not carry out the intentions of the Government; at any rate, the point is one which ought to be considered, especially in regard to half-timers. In the case of my own constituency—that of Preston—there are 1,700 half-timers who at present pay the full school fee; but they will be unable to earn out of the grant more than 7s. 6d., being a loss of 2s. 6d. per head. What I want to know is, whether the Government propose to give any assistance towards making up the deficit? This is a Bill which gives to the half-timer no advantage whatever. The loss to the schools in Preston by retaining the words “in average attendance” would be £434 15s. I do not see how the financial arrangements of the schools are to be carried on.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think that the question into which the hon. Member is entering is pertinent to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. TOMLINSON: I was only anxious to point out that this state of circumstances may arise.

*(12.30.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The point raised by the Amendment as to the average attendance is, I think, an important one; but I wish to point out that if the average attendance is struck out we shall have to fall back upon the actual attendances upon the books, which would make the working of the Bill utterly impracticable. We cannot certainly accept any Amendment to strike out the word “average.” The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson) has referred to the difficulty in the case of the half-timers; but I do not think it is strictly in order to refer to that matter now. It will have to be raised hereafter, and I think it will be better to deal with the question on its merits when the proper time arrives.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I presume, after the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, that the Government are not prepared to accept this Amendment, but I think I ought to explain that the reason why it has been proposed is that an impression has got abroad that the grant of the Government is equivalent to 3d. per week. It is nothing like 3d. per week; it is much more like 2½d. or 2⅓d. But as the question of half-timers is to be raised later on I will not at present enter into the question.

MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): As the question will come before the Committee later on I hope the Amendment will be withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR G. STOKES (Cambridge University): I wish to point out, in regard to average attendance, that there is a time of year when the attendance is naturally slack. If the average is taken upon the whole time the school is open, there is manifestly a temptation to the managers to shut up the school when the attendance is slack, whereas if the average is taken for 40 weeks it would be perfectly fair to all, and there would be no temptation to the managers to close a school during the time that the attendance is slack.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, after the word “attendance,” to insert the words “during forty weeks of the school year.”—(Sir G. Stokes.)

Question proposed, “That those word be there inserted.”

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The Government cannot accept this Amendment. I am afraid that it would lead us into a considerable entanglement if we were to insert these words. All that we desire is to secure the efficiency of the school.

Question put, and negatived.

*(12.36.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I have now to move the omission, in lines 12 and 13, of the words “not being an evening school.” My object in moving this Amendment is to bring evening schools within the operation of the Bill. There has been a strong feeling expressed on all sides of the House as to the importance of the school life of the children. Two years ago I introduced a Resolution into this House in favour of evening schools. My Motion was discussed at great length and with a general feeling of sympathy from every part of the House. Indeed, there was an unanimous feeling in favour of the importance of evening schools as continuation schools. The result of the present system is that numbers of children after school hours swarm the streets, and become what are called "street arabs." There is nothing like the same state of things in any other country, and as we all know it is these street arabs who recruit the criminal class. The cause of that is, I think, our inefficient system of evening schools, which is very different from that adopted in Germany and Switzerland.

THE CHAIRMAN: I wish to point out to the hon. Member that only those evening schools are admissible under this Bill which are public elementary schools, and that it is not competent to enter into an argument as to the general question of establishing evening schools.

*MR. S. SMITH: I will confine myself, Sir, to the line which you have indicated. Last year there were in attendance at the evening schools 64,000 children; of these 51,000 were qualified by attendance for examination, and there was an average attendance of 43,000, as against 4,800,000 on the register for day schools, or scarcely 1 per cent. Ten shillings per head on 43,000 is only £21,500; but all we ask for is 5s. per head, which will cost a trifle over £10,000. Taking into consideration that the Government yesterday accepted Amendments which involve an additional cost of £200,000 or £300,000, I do not think they ought to object to this additional £10,000 for a most important and valuable work. Evening schools are conducted under very great difficulties; it is most difficult to keep them up, and, without a grant, it will be impossible for them to make both ends meet. Under these circumstances, I do not think that a special grant ought to be grudged.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, lines 12 and 13, to leave out the words "(not being an evening school)."—(Mr. Samuel Smith.)

Question proposed, "That the words '(not being an evening school)' stand part of the Clause."

*(12.40.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I think it must be perfectly obvious, after the discussion which we have had already, that it is altogether hopeless to ask the Government to extend the provisions of the Bill to evening schools. It is a most important point, indeed, as to whether the Amendment is in order; but I presume that it may be regarded as regular, seeing that we include scholars in certain standards who attend evening schools. At the same time, I would ask the Committee to deal with the Amendment at once, and pass on to other Amendments which are really more important. I will not weary the Committee by going into the various grants which have been given to evening schools, but I will remind them that we are imposing heavy burdens for the purpose of encouraging elementary schools; and when the hon. Gentleman pleads for continuation schools, I can only assure him that when I submit the Education Estimates he will find that under the new Code we are making giant strides in this direction. Her Majesty's Government have made concessions which involve a large expenditure of money, in order to meet the demands which hon. Members have made, but I think it is somewhat hard that, having made these concessions, we should be pressed over and over again to make more. I hope that we shall be allowed to proceed to matters that are more intimately connected with the provisions of the Bill.

(12.43.) MR. A. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): The right hon. Gentleman expresses a wish that we should pass at once to the next part of the Bill, but I think we ought to be allowed to plead the cause of evening schools. We are now, in reality, imposing a barrier against the use of night schools, because for the first time we are requiring that a fee shall be paid. Taking into account the small number of children we have hitherto been able to draw into evening schools, I think this is a question which deserves serious consideration, especially if evening schools are to flourish as they ought to flourish.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I am unwilling to retard the progress of this Bill, but I think this is an important matter which deserves serious consideration. The Vice President of the Council says that the Government are making gigantic strides in the direction of assisting evening schools.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: What I said was that when the Education Estimates are brought forward it will be seen that the evening school question is making giant strides.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I am very glad to hear it, and I think the admission shows what a very deserving class these schools are. My own opinion is that nothing has done more good than the evening schools. But what I wish to draw attention to is the result which was arrived at yesterday, in changing the age to which education is to extend from 14 to 15. We are grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for having made that concession. But it is quite clear that in most cases it is impossible for children after the age of 14 to attend any but evening schools, for the simple reason that they are at work during the day. The amount now asked for is really very small—only £10,000—and I trust that the Government, seeing the importance of the matter, will concede it.

*(12.48.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I quite understand and appreciate the sympathy which hon. Gentlemen feel in regard to the encouragement of night schools, but, at the same time, I wish to point out that there is a limit beyond which the Government cannot go. We find it impossible to contribute out of the Imperial Exchequer more money than has already been appropriated, and the argument that as concessions have been made more concessions ought to be made only indicates how extremely unwise it is for the Government to have made any concessions at all. For my own part, I think it is unreasonable to ask the State to pay the fees of boys and young men who are earning money, and are in a position to pay for their own education. We cannot accept the Amendment, but must adhere to the concessions which have already been made.

(12.50.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I gather from the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman that if we press for further concessions the Government will drop the Bill. I have no desire, nor have my hon. Friends, to press the Government unduly; but really when the right hon. Gentleman says, "We cannot afford," and that "our financial resources allow us to go no further," I wish to remind him that under certain circumstances the attendance of a child at a night school is made compulsory. If the Government insist upon resisting this Amendment I hope my hon. Friend will allow us to make our protest at once, so that we may proceed with the other provisions of the Bill. I warn the Government that the time will come when they will have to do this. It is one of the inevitable consequences of having taken the first step. The time cannot be long delayed.

*MR. S. SMITH: I am quite ready to accept the suggestion of the First Lord of the Treasury that there should be a limit put upon the age, and that the age of 18 should be fixed.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I made no such suggestion.

*MR. S. SMITH: The suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman was that young men who were earning a living might avail themselves of the privilege. That is not my object. My object is to get children of 11 and 12, who have reached the standard which enables them to leave the day schools, to enter the night schools in order to continue their education.

*(12.55.) MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I desire to say a word in support of the Amendment, namely, that until evening schools are made compulsory we ought to do something to encourage the children to attend them. So many children after leaving school forget what they have learnt, that we should get far better value for the money we are spending if we go a little further and make evening elementary schools also free, and thus induce children to continue their education.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.) supported the Amendment; but the hon. Member's remarks, owing to loud calls for a Division were inaudible.

*MR. DIXON (Birmingham, Edgbaston): I am extremely anxious for the maintenance of evening schools, but I cannot support the Amendment, because I think that the Government have gone as far as they can be expected to go, and that it is unwise to ask them to incur additional expenditure.

*MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I think there is some misapprehension as to the amount of money involved. The entire cost would be somewhere about £2,500, and I would ask if it is worth while for such a sum to prevent children who have left school at an early age from trying to keep up their education for a short time longer.

SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): The sum involved is extremely small, but the amount of good it may do is very great. We all know the enormous advantage it is for children to continue their education after they leave school at an early age, especially where technical instruction is concerned. The cost is an extremely small matter, but the question itself is a most important one, and I trust the Government will re-consider their decision.

(1.0.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 99; Noes 61.—(Div. List, No. 314.)

*(1.10.) MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name, which is intended to make it clear that managers of schools are free to take or to refuse the fee grant. I believe it will meet with no objection from my right hon. Friend.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 13, after "evening school," to insert "the managers of which are willing to receive the same and."—(Mr. Talbot.)

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I think there can be no doubt that if Sections 1 and 2 are accurately read and understood they will be found to cover the objection of this Amendment. But I can see no possible objection to the proposal, especially as the insertion of the words proposed by my hon. Friend will more clearly emphasise our meaning.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I now beg to move the Amendment standing in my name, namely, to insert after the word "to," in line 14, the words "management and." The three chief points to which I wish to call attention are these: First of all, the audit of accounts. The hon. Members for Rotherham and Staffordshire have Amendments relating to an independent audit of accounts preceding the free grant. But I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council will accept my Amendment. The next point is that the accounts of the schools shall be rendered to the local education authorities, and that copies of those accounts may be had by any persons interested in the schools. The third condition is one which is also embodied in several Amendments which appear upon the Paper. The first of these Amendments is that which appears in the name of the hon. Member for Somersetshire (Mr. Hobhouse), and the words of that Amendment have pretty much the same effect as mine, namely, that in cases where the fee grant exceeds the present fees of the schools the surplus shall be used to promote increased efficiency. I think it would be scandalous if some restrictions were not laid down to insure that the expenditure of the surplus money should be devoted to increasing the efficiency of the schools, because there can be no doubt whatever that increased efficiency is needed. This has been admitted over and over again by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. I think I have on these three points made out my case, and I hope the Amendment will be accepted by the Committee.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 14, after the word "to," to insert the words "management and."—(Mr. T. Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member and the Committee that if this Amendment is accepted it will have the effect of shutting out the other Amendments on the Paper raising questions as to management.

*(1.17.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I am not prepared to accept the words proposed by the hon. Member, and as you, Sir, have indicated the position in which the Committee will be left should this Amendment be accepted, I do not think it necessary to argue the different points that may be urged on the questions involved. I would merely point out that this is a Bill for the relief of the parents from the payment of school fees, and I do not at the present moment propose further to discuss the merits of this question beyond pointing out that, if accepted, it will shut out a further Amendment enabling the surplus beyond the present fees to be devoted to increasing the efficiency of the schools.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I would point out to the Committee that if the words "as to fees" were omitted the difficulty might be met.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I hope the hon. Member will not press his Amendment, because if he does the other Amendments, as I understand your ruling, Mr. Courtney, may be prevented from being put. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council desired that this Amendment should not be pressed, because it would shut out another Amendment, by which the efficiency of the schools would be promoted by the application of any surplus over and above the present fees. We hail that remark of the right hon. Gentleman because we regard it as an indication that he will at least give his serious consideration to that proposal. I hope, therefore, that my hon. Friend will not press his Amendment.

*(1.20). MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I should like to obtain from the Chairman some definite ruling as to whether it will be competent to hon. Members to move the further Amendments upon the Paper if this Amendment should be agreed to?

THE CHAIRMAN: I thought I had already explained my view upon the matter with sufficient clearness. I had pointed out that if this Amendment were carried it would have the effect of preventing the discussion of other Amendments which are upon the Paper.

MR. T. ELLIS: Under the circumstances, I will ask leave of the Committee to withdraw my Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: The question is that leave be given to withdraw this Amendment. [Cries of "No!"]

*MR. HOBHOUSE (Somersetshire): If hon. Members opposite refuse to allow the Amendment to be withdrawn it will, under the Chairman's ruling, become necessary to discuss all the points involved in this Amendment, and those which may be shut out by its adoption. It certainly is somewhat inconvenient that upon words of this general character we should be compelled to discuss the questions raised by two or three other Amendments.

MR. MUNDELLA: I hope I may be allowed to appeal to hon. Members opposite to allow this Amendment to be withdrawn. Of course, if they insist on this Amendment being put, we shall feel bound to raise the whole question arising upon it and the other Amendments which it is intended subsequently to introduce. Do the Government intend to shut out the discussion of the other Amendments?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I understand that hon. Members are desirous of arguing the points arising on the other Amendments, and I think, therefore, it would be well if this Amendment were allowed to be withdrawn.

SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): As I understand the matter, if hon. Members opposite persist in forcing on this Amendment, it will involve the shutting out of all the subsequent Amendments which involve the question of management, consequently it will be necessary for us to enter into a general discussion of the whole question of management on this Amendment.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I understand that you, Mr. Courtney, hold that the Amendment before the Committee if carried will supersede the other Amendments relating to the same subject. I think, therefore, it would be advisable if this Amendment were allowed to be withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think that upon the whole that will be the better course.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(1.25.) MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): I have now to move the Amendment I have placed upon the Paper. I think the Committee will see the desirability of accepting this proposal, as it is inevitable that unless the principle it asserts is adopted, the half-timers in the schools will be placed at great disadvantage.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, after "Act," to insert, "Where there are children attending school only half time, the average attendance of such children shall, for claiming the fee grant, be calculated in the same manner as for the ordinary grant, that is to say, an attendance of two consecutive hours by a half-time scholar shall be reckoned as an attendance and a half."—(Mr. Jennings.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I may inform the hon. Member that it is my intention at a later stage to introduce a clause which will place the half-timers on the same basis in regard to the fee grant as that upon which they stand in regard to the ordinary annual grant. Undoubtedly as the Bill now stands my hon. Friend has hit a blot. I admit that fully, but my Amendment will, I think, be found to answer the object the hon. Member has in view.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: I desire to express my thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for the Amendment he has indicated, because this half-time question is one of great importance to the schools of the North of England. After this concession I can hardly ask the Government to do more; still I hope they will consider the question with the view of carrying the principle a little further. The half-time schools in the North are as efficient as the full-time schools, and though the children attend only a part of the day, the results achieved are as good as those obtained in the full-time schools. If the average attendance is calculated on the number of days the school is opened, instead of on the times of meeting, the half-time schools will be placed in the same position as those of full time. As the Bill stands, and allowing for the concession just made by the right hon. Gentleman, the half-time schools will sustain heavy loss, and even if they are treated as full-time schools, which on all rational grounds ought to be the case, they will still suffer an appreciable loss.

MR. MUNDELLA: I understand from the remarks made by the First Lord of the Treasury a short time previously, that the Government have made up their minds that they cannot consent to any further extension of the grant, but practically this Amendment involves a large extension of the grant to the half-time schools, in the North of England chiefly, schools which are the worst supported and the worst staffed in England, and at which the children pay most extravagantly. I cannot, in the circumstances, join in pressing this demand on the Government.

MR. TOMLINSON: I must protest against the remarks made by the right hon. Gentleman in reference to the half-time schools in the north. They are by no means the worst schools in England; many of them are excellent schools, and produce good results.

MR. JENNINGS: I think the explanation offered by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council is perfectly satisfactory, and in order to give him the opportunity of bringing forward the Amendment he has indicated I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(1.33.) MR. HOBHOUSE: I beg to move the Amendment which appears on the Paper in my name. Its object is a very simple one, but, at the same time, it is of considerable importance. It is to secure in all cases the appropriation of the surplus which will exist in many schools, when the fee grant is paid, to proper educational purposes, and especially to ensure the advancement of education under the New Code in the voluntary schools of the country. This Bill, on the face of it, does very little directly to advance education, although, no doubt, indirectly it may do a great deal. Many of us would be better satisfied with the measure if it bore on the face of it some provision securing greater efficiency in return for the benefits conferred by the grant. In many of the schools there will be a large surplus. There will be a sum amounting to something like 5s. or 6s. per head in the cheapest schools of the country, and I am informed that in the county I have the honour to represent the average amount of surplus will be 4s. per head. What is to become of all this money? Surely it is a matter for the earnest consideration of this House how we are to expend it. Ought we not to make sure that in granting so large an amount we are really securing the permanent advancement of efficient education? This question was raised by several speakers on the Second Reading of the Bill, and I listened with great attention to what was said by the right hon. Gentleman, the Vice President of the Council, on this subject. I do not think that what he said was a complete answer to the arguments advanced. He told us it had been said that in some cases, such as those of the Welsh schools, the managers might even put some of the surplus into their own pockets, and he met that argument effectively by referring the House to the 20th Section of the Act, 1876, under which it was quite clear that no portion of this fee grant would be allowed to go into the managers' pockets. That is true. But, nevertheless, I think there is great danger in the case of those schools which are being starved at the present moment, that the surplus will go into the pockets of the subscribers or into the pockets of the ratepayers. No doubt the subscribers will be very much induced, by the windfall coming to the managers under this Bill, to slacken their subscriptions, and in many parishes where School Boards are conducted on economical principles the ratepayers will insist on the reduction of the rates in consideration of the increased grant, and thus one of the results will be that the poorer schools, both Board and voluntary, will continue to be half-starved at the expense of efficiency. We were further told by the right hon. Gentleman that the requirements of the New Code are such that the whole of the surplus will be absorbed. I quite admit that where the School Board or managers are anxious to do their duty and to increase the efficiency of the schools up to the full extent of the resources that will be the case. But even there I should be glad to have the provision I now propose, in order to make it perfectly clear to the subscribers and the ratepayers that this is what they are bound to do. As the Bill at present stands, however, there is no security, there is not even an indication of the way in which the surplus grant is to be expended. I cannot help thinking that if we are to secure the whole of this money as an additional educational fund throughout the country, we ought to have some provision like that of my Amendment on the face of the Bill. I wish also to say a word or two as to the special advantages that will be derived from this provision by the voluntary schools. The existence of those schools depends on their keeping up a liberal amount of subscriptions. And I think it a most short-sighted policy for the friends of voluntary schools to look merely at the relief which will be afforded to subscribers by this Bill, and not to consider the position in which those schools will be put in the future if the subscribers are induced by the new grant to slacken their subscriptions. My own county of Somerset stands in a peculiarly favourable position in this respect. Our fees average about 6s. per head, and our subscriptions nearly 13s. per head, and I am bound to state that some of my friends think the subscriptions so high that they might be reduced without danger to the schools. I do not think so myself. There are other parts of the country in which a different state of things prevails, and where the subscriptions only amount to 3s., 5s., 6s., 7s., or 8s. per head. I cannot help thinking that if my Amendment is not accepted the subscribers generally throughout the country will be tempted to diminish their exertions, so that their schools will ultimately be placed in a very perilous position. A provision of this kind will strengthen the hands of the good managers and force the hands of the bad managers of the voluntary schools, especially in the rural districts, and thus secure what must be one of the main objects of the Education Department. As to the special form of my clause, that is a comparatively immaterial matter. It provides that the surplus shall be spent in the advancement of education, and the improvement of the schools, and I am quite sure that that is an object which is desired by the right hon. Gentleman. The main objects of the new expenditure will be the improvement of the schools, the provision of special apparatus, the increase of the staff, and the furnishing of means for technical instruction. I wish to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that this is a critical moment in the history of elementary education. The right hon. Gentleman knows what a wonderful effect was produced by the optional clause in an Act of Parliament inserted last year by my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham, and that under that clause of the Local Taxation Act an immense sum has been voted for the promotion of the objects which, I believe, will confer the greatest benefit upon the country. Great difficulties still exist in carrying out a proper system of technical education, owing to the want of a proper foundation being laid in the elementary schools of the country districts. I believe that the adoption of my Amendment might result in much being done to supply this deficiency. In conclusion, I would call attention to the elasticity of my Amendment. Where the schools are already so efficient that not much more expenditure is required, there will be no necessity for the appropriation of the surplus. We have heard of schools in Birmingham which are supposed to be absolutely efficient. I do not know whether that is so or not, but if there are cases in which the extra money cannot be usefully expended, the Education Department will have power to release such schools from the operation of the clause. Again, where it is desirable to expend money in objects not specifically mentioned in the clause, or in new objects, the Education Department will have power to sanction the appropriation of money to such purposes. I confidently recommend my Amendment to the House, as tending to maintain the school resources and to keep the managers up to the mark, while it will indirectly in the future do much towards helping to maintain the voluntary school system of the country.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, after "Act" to insert, "Provided that in the case of any school where the fee grant exceeds the amount received in fees during the school year ended last before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, an annual sum equal to such excess shall (unless the Education Department certify that such expenditure is not necessary or expedient), be expended by the School Board or managers of such school in one or more of the ways following (that is to say): on rebuilding, enlargement, or improvement of the school buildings, the provision of school books, plant, and apparatus, the payment of additional staff or of special teachers for drawing, cookery, laundry work, science, drill, or manual instruction, or for any other proper educational purpose from time to time sanctioned by the Education Department."—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(1.46.) MR. GIBBS (London): I have listened with great attention to the speech of the Mover of this Amendment, but I cannot say it has removed in any degree my objections to it. I regard it as superfluous because, as far as I can understand, its object is met in another way, and I also regard it as vexatious, because it forces the Education Department to enter into the consideration of a number of small details, from which it might well be relieved. All the Education Department ought to do is to look at the general efficiency of the Education Department over which it presides. Its main care is to see that the educational expenditure is properly and efficiently applied. The duty of seeing whether schools are properly administered lies upon the Inspectors, and it would be absurd to require the Education Department to consider every small surplus in order to see what ought to be done with it. The great consideration that seems to move hon. Gentlemen opposite is the fear lest any money should go back into the pockets of the subscribers. Why should it not? What evil have the subscribers done that the beneficence they have shown should be converted into what mediæval Sovereigns call a benevolence—that is to say, a voluntary tax which they must pay? Why do the subscribers to the voluntary schools tax themselves. They do this for three reasons—first, to increase the efficiency of the education given; next, to lighten the burden falling upon the poor; and, thirdly, to secure that efficient education shall also be a religious education. Who are they who have done this? They are not a definite or permanent body which can be perpetually taxed. The mover of the Amendment said the whole incomes of the schools ought to be appropriated to education. But what is the income of the schools? It is a thing on which you cannot count. It is in part the contribution of the shifting body of subscribers which is here to-day and gone to-morrow. Why are we to say they should be continually taxed by the operation of law? They have willingly taxed themselves, and will continue to do so. I do not at all disagree with the hon. Gentleman opposite when he contends that any surplus there may be should be devoted to the purposes of education; but, first of all, it must be a surplus on the real income. Those who have hitherto contributed to voluntary schools will not wish to be relieved until the education provided in those schools is efficient; but when the education is efficient, why should they continue to provide unnecessary funds? I have no doubt that hon. Members on the other side of the House rather wish to get rid of voluntary schools, because their destruction must lead to School Boards. I detest School Boards and all their works if they are to supplant the voluntary schools. If the latter are inefficient, then I would welcome School Boards, because the people must be properly educated. What they ought to do is to give liberally to relieve the poor from that which presses hardly upon them, and to take care that the means of education are as efficient as possible, the schoolhouses good, the attendance sufficient, and the teachers what they ought to be. Any arbitrary attempt to put the hands of Parliament on these surpluses would tend to diminish the money that will be available for education. I should like to tell the Committee how this Amendment will affect the two parishes in Hertfordshire with which I am connected. In the parish of Aldenham the fees are for one child 3d., for two children 3d., and 2d. each for three or more. The average, therefore, is 2½d., so that they would be in the happy position of profiting by the 10s. grant. The schoolhouses, five in number, are very good. They have an endowment of £100 from the Platt Charity a year, of which £30 a year is put aside for the maintenance of the buildings.

MR. MUNDELLA: The fees were £70 19s. 11d.

*MR. GIBBS: And the subscription about £100.

MR. MUNDELLA: £38 5s.

*MR. GIBBS: I think I ought to know the amount. They were about £100.

MR. MUNDELLA: The hon. Member does not seem to have before him the right figures. According to the last published return, the subscriptions were £38 5s.; the pence, £70 19s.; and there was an endowment of £76.

*MR. GIBBS: I still maintain that the subscriptions last year were £101.

MR. MUNDELLA: The return from which I quoted applied to the year before last.

*MR. GIBBS: Last year the subscriptions amounted to £101. The Government grant in the last three years has been £251, £262, and £280, and it seems to show that the schools are maintained in an efficient state. The average number on the books is 390; and the fees average 9s. 2d. for 44 weeks' schooling. The small surplus which the fee grant will give the managers ought to be left to them to spend in the way they think best for the education of the parish, and I do not see why they should not, if they wish, economise one year and use the surplus another year. The circumstances are about the same in an adjoining parish. [Cries of "Name!"] I will not give the name, and then I cannot be contradicted. The school pence in the parish last year amounted to £59, the subscriptions to £50 17s., and the fee grant will be £62 10s. Therefore in this parish the surplus will be £2 10s. when the new grant is substituted for fees; and the managers will have to sit solemnly to determine what is to be done with this surplus if the Amendment is carried. I will not say anything now about the religious difficulty except to remark that in this parish no such difficulty at all has arisen as to the Conscience Clause—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. GIBBS: I apologise for transgressing the rules. I will say no more on the point. I hope Parliament will not enter into those details, but will leave managers to do what they deem to be best in the interest of education. The less interference we have in these small matters the better it will be for the schools. I thank the House for extending to me that indulgence it always accords to new Members.

*(2.5.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to make an appeal to the Committee. It would be inconvenient and quite opposed to the plan of the Bill to introduce this Amendment into the clause. I recognise the full right of the House to consider the main question raised, which I understand to be the application of any surplus for the benefit of a school, and to secure that the schools shall be really efficient. I think it will be more convenient to consider that question on the subsequent proposals of the right hon. Members for Leeds and the Brightside Division of Sheffield. The present Amendment is encumbered with details which would make it difficult to carry out; and it would, therefore, be better to consider the question on the later Amendments.

(2.7.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I wish to join in the request to the hon. Member to withdraw the present Amendment, reserving his right, if he thinks fit, to bring up a new clause on the subject. I must, however, protest against a doctrine that has just been laid down by the hon. Member for the City of London. I cannot conceive any argument more disastrous to voluntary schools than the argument that the Bill is a Bill for the relief of subscribers. It is not for that reason that the Bill has been accepted by the House. The supporters of voluntary schools are prepared not to diminish, but to increase, their subscriptions, and it is not likely the taxpayers of this country will consent to pay £2,000,000 a year simply to relieve the supporters of voluntary schools of the necessity of continuing their subscriptions. I do hope that it will not be thrown in our faces that the supporters of voluntary schools accept the Bill as one of relief to themselves. That, I think, is a most unhapy argument.

*MR. HOBHOUSE: A strong appeal has been made to me, but I think I have a right to complain of the manner in which I have been treated. This is the first speech I have made on the Bill, and, as I was anxious to economise the time of the Government, I put my arguments as briefly as possible. Several weeks ago I laid the matter before the Vice President of the Council, who, I understood, agreed to consider the matter, yet I am to have no explanation of the views of the Government. No indication is given whether the Government intend to accept or reject the principle embodied in the clause, and we do not know when the matter can be again discussed.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The hon. Gentleman has made an appeal to me. When he showed me the Amendment some time ago, I made a careful note of the arguments he advanced in support of it. I did not, however, give any pledge, but only said that the subject was a fair one for discussion. I was prepared to go minutely into the point; but the leader of the House, in the interest of the progress of the Bill, intervened and shut out any further remarks I might have made. The question, however, will be more fully discussed on subsequent Amendments. I may say I am not prepared to accept this Amendment.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: As I said just now, the Government recognise it is only reasonable that the House should have an opportunity of discussing this question, and that can be done best on the Amendments of the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Leeds and Sheffield.

*MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I appeal to my hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment. The matter is too complex to be discussed at this stage, and my hon. Friend will not be placed at any disadvantage by adopting this course, and bringing up his Amendment as an alternative new clause, to be discussed with others on the Paper.

*MR. HOBHOUSE: In deference to the right hon. Gentleman, I ask leave to withdraw the Amendment. At the same time, I think the Government ought to have replied to me on the subject.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(2.15.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I wish to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The words at the beginning of the Amendment, "for these and all other purposes," are quite inadmissible. The Amendment must be restricted to the purposes of this Bill.

MR. SINCLAIR: I will adopt your suggestion, Sir, and substitute the words "for any purposes connected with this Bill and other Educational Acts."

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. SINCLAIR: Very well, Sir, I will alter the words so as to run "for the purposes of this Bill." My object is to equalise the fees payable throughout a child's educational life, and to enable the managers of both voluntary and Board schools in which fees are payable to charge the same fee for infants as they can for more advanced pupils. Let me give one case as an illustration. There is a school with three departments. For the infants 3d. a week is now charged, for the juniors 4d., and for the seniors 6d. Under this Bill the infants will be educated free, the juniors will have to pay 1d., and the seniors 3d.; but I want to enable the managers, if they think fit, to make a uniform charge in all departments. I desire to take away all inducement to parents to withdraw their children from school in consequence of the fees being increased as they grow older. These higher fees ought not to be imposed at the time the child becomes more costly to feed and clothe, and, therefore, I would give the school managers the power to charge a uniform fee in all classes. This question affects Board and voluntary schools alike, and I trust the Government will accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, after "Act," to insert "and for the purposes of this Act any public elementary school in which there is more than one department may, at the option of the managers of said school, mean an 'elementary school,' notwithstanding the definition given in Clause one of 'The Education Act, 1870,' whereby each separate department of a school is defined as an 'elementary school.'"—(Mr. Sinclair.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(2.20.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I think I can shortly show my hon. Friend that the object he has in view can be attained under the Bill as at present framed. I fear that an answer I gave recently to a question as to how far a department can be considered a school in itself has induced him to propose this Amendment, but I may point out to him that it is the practice of the Education Department to deal with the income of a school as a whole, and therefore it will be quite possible for managers to equalise the fees. I do not, at the same time, think that advisable, because the Bill is founded on the principle of the relative payment of fees, and maintaining the relative position of fees in each department.

MR. SINCLAIR: Do I understand that if this Amendment is withdrawn it will be possible under the Bill to equalise the fees? I will not go into the question whether it is advisable.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: Certainly.

MR. SINCLAIR: That being the case, I have no wish to press the Amendment.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The Bill will not prevent the equalisation of fees, but it discourages the adoption of such a course.

MR. SINCLAIR: On the understanding that it will be possible for the managers of such a school as I have referred to to charge an all-round fee, instead of differentiating the charges, I withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn. (2.25.)

*(2.47.) MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield) rose to move—

In page 1, line 15, at the end, to insert "Provided that no religious catechism or religious formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught in any school receiving the fee grant."

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): I rise to order. I notice that this Amendment would strike out of the operations of the Bill 14,784 schools. The total number of schools dealt with is 19,498. Consequently, if the Amendment is passed, it will strike out approximately three-fourths of the whole of the schools dealt with. I submit that such an Amendment is in contravention of the Resolution on which the Bill is founded.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not a point of order. It is entirely in the discretion of the Committee.

*MR. SUMMERS: I think it right to avail myself of this opportunity of raising a protest against the sectarian character of much of the education given in our public elementary schools. This Amendment is taken verbatim, so far at any rate as the first part of it is concerned, from Section 14 of the Act of 1870, which is known as the Cowper-Temple Clause. That section reads as follows:—

"Every school provided by a School Board shall be conducted under the control and management of such Board in accordance with the following regulations:—

"(1.) The school shall be a public elementary school within the meaning of this Act.

"(2.) No religious catechism or religious formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught in the school."

This, then, is the present law in School Board schools, and what I propose is to put denominational schools and School Board schools on a footing of equality so far as the teaching of a distinctive religious catechism or formulary is concerned. In other words, I propose to make it illegal to teach during the school hours any religious catechism or any religious formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination. What is the ground upon which I base my contention? It is that by this Bill you are materially altering the character of the so-called voluntary schools. When this Bill is passed you may call these schools, if you like, denominational schools, but you will have no right whatever to call them voluntary schools. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Talbot) appeared, the other night, to think that anyone who uttered such a sentiment as this must be either a platform agitator or a partisan orator. Is the hon. Gentleman aware who is the author of that opinion? Does he know that it dates back to the year 1876, and that the author is no other person than the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington)? Speaking on the consideration of Lord Sandon's Bill in 1876, the noble Marquess said that the clause releasing managers from the obligation to meet the Parliamentary Grant with an equal local income—

“Altogether abandons the principle hitherto adopted by Parliament, that assistance should be given to denominational schools only in proportion to the voluntary contributions. It is now no longer a necessary condition that voluntary support should be given. In fact, the word ‘voluntary’ ought in this matter now to disappear altogether. They are denominational schools, but they are not voluntary schools.”

If that statement was true, as it no doubt was true, in 1876, it is still more true to-day. The voluntary contributions to so-called voluntary schools have not increased in the interval. If you consider the number of children in these schools the contributions have diminished rather than increased, because I find that the voluntary contributions to Church of England schools amounted in 1876 to 9s. 6d. per head, whereas in the year 1889 they had fallen to 6s. 11d. per head. Hon. Gentlemen are no doubt aware that there are a great number of these so-called voluntary schools without a single penny of voluntary contributions. There are 1,176 of such schools, and there are 548 schools, not only without voluntary contributions, but without a single penny of endowment either. When this Bill becomes law these so-called voluntary schools will really be schools maintained almost entirely out of the Public Purse. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton showed the other night 56 per cent. of the income of the voluntary schools is now provided by the State; and he demonstrated beyond the possibility of contradiction that when this Bill is passed not 56 per cent., but 78 per cent. of their income would come from the National Exchequer. These schools call themselves national. All I ask is that we should make them national in reality as well as in name. I propose, then, to exclude from publicly supported schools the teaching of sectarian catechisms. Some hon. Gentlemen may, perhaps, ask what objection there is to the Church of England Catechism being taught in our national schools. I will not go into the question whether it is wise to endeavour to indoctrinate the minds of young children with particular theological opinions, and I will not ask why we should attempt to teach children of tender years what many grown-up men profess their inability to comprehend. I take the two first questions and answers in the Church of England Catechism—

“Q. What is your name?—A. M. or N.

Q. Who gave you this name?—A. My Godfathers and Godmothers in my baptism”—

I think that that is an improper Catechism to teach in schools attended by the children of Baptist parents. Such children have not been baptised at all, and they are puzzled when they have to give an answer to the question, “Who gave you this name?” and are taught to say in reply, “My Godfathers and Godmothers in my baptism.” The Baptists are a numerous body in this country. In the year 1888 in Great Britain and Ireland they had 3,745 chapels and 1,865 pastors. The members numbered 324,498, and Sunday scholars 482,167. In 10,000 rural parishes the children of Baptists are obliged to attend Church of England schools. There are, no doubt, a considerable number of hon. Gentlemen who think it is right to continue the use of the Church of England Catechism, but who, at the same time, object to what is called an “unauthorised Catechism,” and if any hon. Gentleman will propose an Amendment which will forbid the teaching of an unauthorised Catechism I shall have great pleasure in supporting him. I think this might easily be done. We might give to the Education Department power to prohibit the use in a public elementary school of an unauthorised Catechism. The other night the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) called attention to the Catechism compiled by the Rev. Mr. Gace, which was published for use in parochial schools, and which has gone through a considerable number of editions. It has been condemned by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who said it ought to be impossible that such teaching should be given in public elementary schools, but it has been condemned by a still higher authority on religious questions than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham—the Archbishop of Canterbury. On March 9, 1889, the Archbishop wrote the following letter to the Rev. R. F. Horton, M.A.:—

“I am much obliged to you for your letter of the 7th inst. The question of this ‘Catechism,’ which appears to emanate from a small parish in Essex, has already been more than once brought to my notice, and I have in each case replied that it was a most unjust and uncharitable document.”

I think hon. Gentlemen will quite agree with that description: it is a most unjust and uncharitable document—

“I am glad to assure you that it in no way represents the mind of the Church of England, whether her greatest theologians of the past or her leaders of the present day are called as witnesses. I venture to say there is hardly a clergyman of any weight whatever—certainly no Bishop—who would endorse the intolerant statements to which you have drawn attention.”

The Archbishop concludes—

“I cannot but think that the circulation which it is said to have attained must be largely due to the notice which, as I hear, some of the society papers and many indignant pulpits have bestowed upon it.”

Well, I think we shall all agree in condemning Mr. Gace's Catechism as an “unjust and uncharitable document,” and, if we are so agreed, surely the wisdom of the House can find a remedy for an admitted grievance. Surely we may now in Committee, or, if not now, on Report stage, devise some Amendment which will make it impossible in future to teach this obnoxious Catechism. There is another Catechism to which, a short time ago, I ventured to draw the attention of the Vice President of the Council—the Catechism of the “Church Extension Association.” There are two of these Catechisms—the “First” and

Mr. Sumners

“Second,” and on the title-page of the copy of the First Catechism I hold in my hand I find printed “115th thousand,” so that it seems that this catechism is taught in a considerable number of schools, subject to the control or under the management of “The Church Extension Association.” I ventured a while ago to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President whether he was aware that this Catechism was taught in any of our public elementary schools, and the right hon. Gentleman will remember some of the questions and answers in this Second Catechism of the Church Extension Association. Let me quote one or two—

“Q. What are those who separate from the Church of England commonly called?—A. Dissenters.

Q. Are there different sorts of Dissenters?—A. Yes. Baptists, Independents, Quakers, and many others.

Q. Is it wrong to join in the worship of Dissenters?—A. Yes. We should only attend places of worship which belong to the Church of England.

Q. Why?—A. Because it is the branch of the true Church which God has placed in this land.”

Now, since I put my question to the right hon. Gentleman on this subject I find that another edition has been published, “carefully revised and corrected,” the passage to which I called attention having been revised and corrected accordingly. I am not sure that the revised edition is any improvement on the original; but, in order that I may be perfectly fair in the matter, perhaps I had better read the revised version of the Catechism—

“Q. Is it not, then, very dangerous to leave the Church?—A. Yes; and it is also a very grievous sin.

Q. What is this sin called?—A. Schism, or division.

Q. Are we warned against this sin in the Bible?—A. Yes. St. Paul tells us to mark them which cause divisions, and to avoid them

Q. What does St. Jude say?—A. ‘These be they who separate themselves, sensual, having not the spirit.’

Q. Is it wrong to forsake the services of the Church of England?”

The answer, of course, is in the affirmative. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President told me he was not aware that this Catechism was taught in any public elementary school, and, of course, I know very well that it is not the duty of the Department to inform itself on the subject. I know that by Section 7 of the Act of 1870 it is provided that a public elementary school shall be open at all times to the Inspector, so, however, that it shall be no part of the duty of such Inspector to inquire into instruction in any religious subject given in such school, or examine any scholar therein in religious knowledge or belief; but perhaps I can assist the right hon. Gentleman in his inquiries if he is at all disposed to make inquiry on the subject. This Catechism, as I have said, is published by the Church Extension Association, and I will read to the right hon. Gentleman a list of the schools for which this Church Extension Association has made itself responsible. The list is taken from the official journal of the Association, called Our Work, and I quote from the copy of June 1, 1891—

“Some of our friends are interested in the schools for which the Church Extension Association has made itself responsible. Of these there are in London: The St. Augustine's Schools, Kilburn (girls and infants), number on the books 1,400; Gordon Memorial School, West Kilburn (boys, girls, and infants), 900; Wilberforce Memorial, West Kilburn (girls and infants), 500; Princess Frederica, College Park, Willesden (boys, girls, and infants), 800; Princess Frederica, Willesden, upper grade school (girls and infants), 90; Keble Memorial Schools, Harlesden (boys, girls, and infants), 600; People's College, upper grade (girls and infants), 140; Waterloo College, Kensal Green, upper grade, 100; Old Palace, Croydon, upper grade, 180; St. Gabriel's, Bromley, 80. Then in the Provinces: Nottingham, All Saints' School (boys, girls, and infants), 190; Salisbury, George Herbert Schools (girls and infants), 240; York, upper grade school, 140.”

I invite the right hon. Gentleman to make inquiry whether the First or Second Catechism is used in these schools for which the Church Extension Association has made itself responsible. When Mr. Forster introduced the Education Bill in 1870, he prepared a Memorandum to be submitted to the Cabinet of that day, and in that Memorandum Mr. Forster used a remarkable sentence. “It would not be fair to tax a Roman Catholic to teach Methodism.” Now, I hold that if it is unfair to tax a Roman Catholic to teach Methodism, it is equally unfair to tax a Dissenter for the purpose of teaching in a public elementary school to the maintenance of which Dissenters contribute that “Dissent is schism and a sin.” I said at the outset I did not wish to detain the Committee at any length. I am advocating not that religion should be excluded from public elementary schools, but that sectarianism should be excluded from these schools. We sometimes hear that School Boards are irreligious bodies, but I find from the Majority Report of the Royal Commission that out of 2,225 School Boards in England and Wales, only seven in England dispense with religious instruction, and only 50 in Wales. As to Wales, the Commissioners say—

To sum up. I have been arguing not in favour of excluding religious teaching from our public elementary schools, but that sectarian catechisms, and especially these unauthorised catechisms, should be excluded from our schools. I say, in conclusion, let us banish sectarianism, and thus make it possible for true religion—pure and undefiled—to exert its natural and beneficent sway over the minds, and hearts, and consciences of men.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, after the word “Act,” to insert the words “Provided that no religious catechism, or religious formulary, which is distinctive of any particular denomination, shall be taught in any school receiving the fee grant.”—(Mr. Summers.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

(3.15.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I venture to suggest as an Amendment to the Amendment of my hon. Friend to omit the words—and to add the following words:—

“Except (a) in the case of schools belonging to the Church of England, such catechism or formularies as are authorised by law; (b) in the case of schools belonging to other religious communions, such catechism and formularies as are, or may be, hereafter authorised by the proper authority of the Church, denomination, or congregation to which the school belongs.”

Let me point out exactly what is my intention, and the object of my Amendment. It would mean that the forms recognised in the Act of Uniformity, the Prayer Book, the recognised formularies of the Church of England, might be used in Church of England schools; and with regard to schools outside the Church managed by members of Nonconformist denominations, for my own part I think that the words I have suggested are sufficient for the purpose. Of course, there are various Church organisations among Nonconformists. The Presbyterians have a body to whom authority is delegated, and among Congregationalists each congregation is a law unto itself. All I am anxious to do is to protect the children attending our national schools from the unauthorised intrusion, by the mere caprice of particular managers, clerical or other, of Catechisms and formularies such as those which have been mentioned, and which are evidently abhorrent to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on either side. My Amendment, as hon. Members will agree, would not interfere with any religious instruction given in conformity with the recognised convictions of the various religious denominations. But it has been said to me, "Why, you are recognising the propriety of having Catechisms and formularies in schools." No, I am not recognising anything of the kind. All that I desire to do is to exclude certain unauthorised documents, Catechisms, and formularies. There is nothing in my Amendment to provide that Catechisms and formularies shall be used. All I wish to do is to correct one abuse. I cannot do away with all abuses in this connection. I wish to make my position quite clear. I am, and I ever have been since I have thought on the subject of national education, distinctly and emphatically in favour of excluding all theological teaching whatever from the schools of the nation. I would have morality taught, but not theology, though I have no objection to religious teaching in its proper place and time. I must guard myself against the imputation of being an opponent of religious teaching. I suggest secular instruction in schools, not because I am opposed to religion at all, but because I, with many others, believe that religion cannot properly be taught except where the children expect to receive such instruction from the hands of those to whom parents send their children for the purpose. That is what I mean by religious instruction at the proper time and place; and if any hon. Member does me the honour to criticise my proposal, I hope he will not assume, what I can assure him is not the fact, that I am opposed to all religious instruction. For many reasons it is better to exclude such teaching from our public elementary schools, but I wish emphatically to deprecate any hostility to religious teaching in itself, and I wish further to say in regard to the sentiments of those who belong to the Roman Catholic Church that though I shall be obliged to allude to certain practices of that Church which it is sought to introduce into our national schools, and to protest against them, I do not wish for a moment to express the slightest disrespect for those of the Roman Catholic Church who entertain opinions differing from my own as to practices they consider proper to the profession of Christianity. I hope I have made my position clear, but I do insist that parents ought to know what they are to expect when compelled by law to send their children to school. We have no right—no moral right, whatever may be the legal right of Parliament—we have no moral right to pass a law compelling the attendance of children at school, leaving it quite uncertain as to what religious influences the children shall there be subjected to, leaving to the caprice of managers or teachers what doctrines or superstitions they may impart to the children. Parents should know what teaching their children receive, and they cannot know unless you lay down restrictions, outside of which instruction shall not travel. Here is a fair opportunity for laying down such limitations. We are now making a large increase in the amount of public money given to public elementary schools, and I maintain that on this ground alone some concession should be made to the growing feeling that more respect should be shown than has been the case hitherto to the consciences of parents of children who are particularly affected by the management of these schools. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) has given illustrations of the dangers to which children are exposed in these schools. My right hon. Friend paused in his citations, and said he would not quote some of the answers in that Catechism in relation to certain sacred observances. Why not? This House is in the position of supreme authority over these schools, and in a great measure we are responsible for what is taught there. Why should not the House be informed of what is taught in the schools, for the management of which we are responsible? We are bound to make ourselves acquainted with the facts. When my right hon. Friend quoted from the Catechism which he said was in use in schools, he was challenged to say where it was used. Well, my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield has given a list of schools under the authority of the Church Extension Association, publishers of the Catechism to which he has referred. It is evident that the Catechism is extensively used, for this, I see, is marked the 115th thousand. Now, I say this: that this "First Catechism" and "Second Catechism" and the "Manual," all forming part of a series issued by the Association managing those schools to which my hon. Friend has referred—all these books betray an insidious design to lead children and young people under their influence to the practice of auricular confession, which I take it is generally deprecated by Protestant public opinion in this country. Having said so much, I am bound to give proof of my statement. In the First Catechism intended for very young children we find these questions and answers—

"To whom has God given authority to pronounce absolution?—To His priests.

How should we obtain absolution?—By confessing our sins.

What is to confess our sins?—To tell them one by one."

Now, that may appear laughable to some hon. Members, and it would be amusing enough if we could put out of sight altogether the kind of corrupting influence produced on young minds by such teaching. Then in the Second Catechism we find this—

"What is necessary before we can receive absolution?—Repentance."

Very true, no doubt.

"What are the three parts of repentance?—Contrition, confession, and satisfaction."

Then, farther on we find—

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

"What is confession of sins?—To tell them one by one.

Would it be wrong to keep back anything?—Yes, it would be a very grievous sin."

Then in the Manual which is put into the hands of children we find in the preface, "Go to confession as often as your clergyman advises you." Then we find in the book the introductory form of confession, and the penitent is instructed to say—

"I confess before the whole company of Heaven and to you, I have sinned in thought, in word, in deed."

Now, I say again, I have not a word of disrespect towards those who are members of the Church which teaches these practices; they have my profoundest respect; but we are speaking in reference to a Church supposed to deprecate such practices, or, at any rate, all parents who send their children to these Church schools believe that such practices are inconsistent with the doctrines and formularies of the Church of England. Why, I ask, should we by our legislation compel children to attend schools with the risk of being subjected to such teachings, which are known to be objectionable to the majority of our countrymen, with no control or safeguard except the miserable Conscience Clause, which is known to be inoperative? I believe the majority of the House object to these things. Why, then, not make some Amendment in the Bill to exclude these objectionable practices? Hon. Gentlemen laugh and sneer, not, I know, at these sacred things alluded to, but because they think we are incompetent to deal with these matters. Individually, perhaps, we are; but we are sent here to represent the views of electors, and those views I express. They protest against the present state of bondage under which Nonconformist children suffer, especially in rural districts, and I think the least we can ask is that Parliament should make this trifling concession in order that while proper and authorised religious teaching may be given, unauthorised, capricious, and offensive Catechisms and formularies shall be imperiously excluded from the schools we are called upon to support.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment,

To leave out the words "distinctive of any particular denomination," in order to add at the end of the proposed Amendment the words "except (a) in the case of schools belonging to the Church of England, such catechism or formularies as are authorised by law; (b) in the case of schools belonging to other religious communions, such catechism and formularies as are, or may be, hereafter authorised by the proper authority of the Church, denomination, or congregation to which the school belongs."—(Mr. Picton.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'distinctive of any particular denomination' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

(3.34.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I rise to appeal to my hon. Friends not to press their Amendments on the consideration of the Committee. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicester raises the whole of what is called the religious difficulty, and anybody who has had anything to do with the discussion of this matter during the last 20 years knows what the religious difficulty means. It was the great subject of discussion in 1870. I am not going to enter upon that question now; my views have been fully expressed; but I would ask the hon. Member for Leicester to remember that this is now the month of July, and to consider whether it is possible for this House to enter now upon a discussion of the religious question with any hope of the Bill passing into law this Session. I confess that I think it is not, but this Amendment raises the whole of that question. As far as we who sit on this Bench are concerned, we have put forward our views on the Instruction which was moved to the effect that protection should be given by popular representation against what might be considered by any section of the community improper religious teaching. I do not desire to enter into any detail or any argument on this subject; but I would appeal to my hon. Friends, in the interests of the passing of the Bill, not to insist upon the prolongation of a Debate of this character.

(3.36.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I do not deny that there is considerable force in the view expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, that at this period of the Session it is inopportune to enter into the religious aspect of this question. But if that is the case, the Government themselves are to blame for it. A large portion of the early part of the Session was taken up in discussing a measure connected with religion—a Tithes Bill, which was brought forward and passed by the Government mainly in the interests of the Church of England; and if we find ourselves now in the month of July without time to discuss the various aspects of this Bill, it is only right that the blame should be put on the proper shoulders. For my own part, I thank the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Summers), although it may be that the time is inopportune, for bringing forward this grievance. Only two years ago the Government conceded this very security now asked for in the Technical Instruction Bill, in which it was found necessary to make provision to safeguard those who do not belong to the dominant body who may control the schools in which technical education is taught. And in Mr. Forster's Bill Parliament inserted a provision in the case of Board schools similar to that now proposed by the Member for Huddersfield. Now, when we are altering the character of the voluntary schools by making them State-supported schools, it is only reasonable to expect that these safeguards shall be extended to the denominational establishments. If this is not the moment to raise the question, I hope that every Member sitting on the Liberal side of the House will at least assent to the proposition and determine that on the first occasion the attention of Parliament can be brought to bear on this question it shall be their solemn duty to insist that an end shall be put to the wrongs, injustice, and oppression which exist under the present system. It has been made manifest by the action of hon. Gentlemen on the Government side of the House that they are interested in the continuance of the teaching of the doctrines of the Church of England in these schools. That cannot be disputed. It is the desire of the National Society that the poor of this country shall be educated in the doctrines of the Church of England, and it is a remarkable fact that while in the course of this Debate hon. Gentlemen opposite are dumb when any proposition affecting education pure and simple is brought forward, when anything affecting the interests of the Church of England is mentioned they seem to regard it as their bounden duty to join in the fray, and defend what they call "the ancient rights" of that great religious and political corporation. I ask is the House of Commons so concerned in maintaining the privileges of the Church of England as to allow the injustice and oppression which the children of so large a body of the Queen's subjects now suffer under? I am proud to be able to stand here and defend the rights of the poor and the weak in this matter. ["Hear, hear!"] The Member for Oxford (Mr. Talbot) does not like to hear these observations. I have sat opposite to him while I have been in the House, and I must say that the hon. Gentleman has been a very zealous, if an unwise, defender of the privileges of the Church. But I would remind the hon. Gentleman that he has been fighting a retreating battle, while I am proud to say that the cause with which I have been associated is gaining strength. [Laughter and Opposition cheers.] Yes; the Church of England and the Political Party connected with it have been forced to make concession after concession. I cannot agree with the Amendment of the Member for Leicester. I do not believe it is for the House of Commons to sanction any particular form of religious teaching, which may be considered to be the case if they exclude one in favour of another. I hope that that Amendment will not be pressed; but if the Member for Huddersfield goes to a Division, I hope he will be supported, if only as a protest against maintaining a course of injustice and oppression in elementary schools.

(3.42.) SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): As this question of the Church Catechism is to the front on this Amendment, I hope I may be allowed to take the opportunity of asking the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield a question with regard to the Catechism of which we heard something two days ago. The sentiments with regard to Nonconformists expressed in the questions and answers read out by the right hon. Gentleman have caused great pain and grief to almost every Member on this side of the House, and I want to know whether the right hon. Gentleman can state in how many schools the Catechism is used for daily instruction, or what authority he has for stating that it is in very large use? For my own part, from inquiries which I have made and information which I have received, I believe that the circulation is not anything like that which has been stated.

*(3.45.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I at once respond to the inquiry the hon. Baronet has addressed to me. I referred to two Catechisms the other night. The author of the particular Catechism from which I quoted was the Rev. F. A. Gace, vicar of Great Barling, Essex. The edition from which I quoted—it was published a year or two ago—was the twelfth edition. That fact indicates pretty clearly that the Catechism has a circulation, and as my right hon. Friend the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield pointed out a circulation indicates that the Catechism is not printed simply for the purpose of being put into the waste paper basket. If it is put into circulation I think it is safe to infer that it is used. I distinctly said that my statement the other night was made on the authority of the responsible head of the Wesleyan Educational Department in this country, who authorised me to state that of his own knowledge he knew that this Catechism was in use, and in extensive use, in various parts of the Kingdom.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: In day schools?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: The whole purpose was in reference to day schools. We were talking about day schools and day schools exclusively when the information was conveyed to me. I simply stated the broad fact that this Catechism was in circulation. The other Catechism to which I referred I said was in its 157th thousand. I said it was in use in various parts of the Kingdom; but I say that even supposing such a Catechism is only in use in a very small district, that district has a right to complain. I may be allowed to express my grateful acknowledgments to gentlemen of all shades of religious opinion in this House, and especially to laymen of the Church of England, for unanimously repudiating that Catechism. I quite accept that repudiation, and I believe it will do more to put a stop to the use of such a Catechism than perhaps any other instrumentality.

*(3.49.) SIR W. HART DYKE: For pity's sake let us proceed with the Bill. In this Debate we have had a sufficient illustration of what might have happened had Her Majesty's Government proposed to introduce the religious element into the Bill. The hon. Member was perfectly candid when he said that this was a subject on which he felt strongly, and that he brought it forward simply as a protest, and not for the purpose of dividing the House upon it. The hon. Member has made his protest, and I do hope he will be satisfied with the discussion. For my own part, I must refuse altogether to enter into the merits of the question. I was a Member of the House in 1870, and I remember the tortuous Debates we had then on the religious question. I am confident of this—that the Member for Derby has done good service in the promotion of the Bill in having urged the Committee to at once proceed with other matters. I will add one word with reference to these unhappy documents, the Catechisms. It is perfectly obvious that the Catechism quoted by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton contains matter which any sensible man, any just or liberal-minded man, in the House or elsewhere, must repudiate, and, as far as I am concerned, I consider that a better document for the promotion of dissent in this country it is impossible to find. We shall find out by-and-bye, after the lurid glare that has been thrown upon it by these Debates, to what extent it has been circulated. I have been pressed on the question of these Catechisms and urged to instruct the Inspectors to see that they are not used. I think it is well-known with regard to the Department that they are absolutely shut out from dealing with the religious question. Both in the Act of Parliament and in the Code Inspectors are expressly enjoined not to meddle in religious matters. If there is any influence which I can bring to bear by any possible means to put a stop to the evil which must be created by such a Catechism as the one referred to I will gladly use it.

(3.53.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS [Cries of "Divide!"]: I thank my hon. Mr. H. H. Fowler

Friend for making this protest, but I hope he will go to a Division. [Cries of "Divide!" and interruption.] I have not had an opportunity in Committee of saying a word on behalf of Welsh Dissenters. I think hon. Members on the other side of the House—men whom I respect for their religious opinion just as I respect my fellow countrymen for theirs—will appreciate the position of a representative like myself when I tell them that in my own constituency in the Vale of Glamorgan there are 30 parishes in which there is no school but a Church of England school, although four out of five of the children who attend them are the children of Dissenters. These children are bound, under stress of the regulations, day after day in school, before the real work of education begins, to listen to the Catechism of the Church of England. [Cries of "Divide!"] The Amendment of the hon. Member for Huddersfield would, to a great extent, satisfy the grievances of the Welsh Dissenters, and would get rid of the religious difficulty if the hon. Member would consent to an Amendment. I would suggest that he should add at the end the words—

"No formula, catechism of the Church of England or any sectarian catechism shall be read in public elementary schools which accept the fee grant except during one hour out of the school course."

I believe the Welsh Members would be to a large extent, satisfied if those words were added, especially if it were stipulated that no child should join in the religious instruction, except at the written request of the parent. If the hon. Member for Leicester will withdraw his unfortunate Amendment, and the hon. Member for Huddersfield will add these words, I think his proposal will be acceptable, at any rate, to the Welsh Members.

(3.56.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I understand that the hon. Member for Huddersfield intends to go to a Division. I intend to vote against him, and I should like to explain why. The hon. Member for West Bradford is perfectly consistent. He represents the Liberation Society, and what may be called aggressive Nonconformity. Under these circumstances, he is perfectly consistent in subordinating the interests of education to the interests with which he is especially charged. That would be the effect of the Amendment, and it is on that account that I shall oppose it. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Huddersfield is really an Amendment against the principle of the Bill, and in another form brings up the issue which was raised by the proposed Instruction of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. That Instruction, if carried, would have led to making all the voluntary schools School Board schools. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Huddersfield requires all voluntary schools to behave as if they were School Board schools, and to give up the denominational teaching, which is, in fact, the chief reason why they have been separately established. If that Amendment were carried, the Government could not, without a breach of faith towards its own supporters and the managers of the denominational schools, continue the Bill. It would be fatal to free education, and on that ground I shall vote against it. The Amendment upon the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Leicester is not open to the same objection, but it appears to have no friends whatever. As has been pointed out, the hon. Member is compromising great Nonconformist principles. He directs his Amendment against some particular Catechisms, which are not only sectarian, but personally offensive. It is the opinion of the House that the Catechism edited by Mr. Gace is personally offensive to a large number of Nonconformists—[Ministerialist Members : And Churchmen]—and I should add Churchmen ; and we have it on the authority of the acting head of the Education Department that if he had the power he would discourage the use of it in day schools. Well, I think it would be possible hereafter by a short clause to give to the Department some discretion or power to deal with a Catechism of this kind, but the argument does not apply to a Catechism which is simply sectarian. The teaching in a Wesleyan school is just as sectarian to me as that in a Church of England school is to a Wesleyan, or that in a Roman Catholic school to a Protestant, but the objection which I think we have a right to take to the Catechism in question is that it is unnecessarily offensive to a large number of our fellow-subjects. For these reasons I shall vote both against the Amendment and the Amendment to the Amendment. The matter of the particular Catechism, as I have already pointed out, may with propriety be dealt with at a later stage.

MR. PICTON : I beg to withdraw the Amendment, my purpose having been served by the discussion. I had thought it would be acceptable to hon. Gentlemen opposite as well as to hon. Gentlemen on this side. It is not, and all I can say is that it is the very first attempt I have ever made at a compromise on this matter, and I certainly shall take care that it will be the last.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

*(4.15.) MR. ROBY : The question dealt with in the Amendment of which I have given notice is, I hope, not a burning question—at any rate, not in the way I propose to treat it. I would remind the Committee that the original grant from the Imperial Treasury had to be equalled by the amount from the local resources. But in the year 1876 that was in some degree infringed upon, and it was laid down that the amount from the Public Treasury should not exceed whichever was the greater of the two sums—the grant from local resources or the 17s. 6d. per head. It comes to this : Whereas the cost of denominational schools is about 36s. per head, and in Board Schools 45s. per head, the grant from the Imperial Treasury will be about 27s. in the first case and 28s. in the second. That is to say, the amount to be raised by local resources will be left entirely to subscriptions and endowments or to rates. What is the amount raised from local resources ? It is rather remarkable that in 1865 the amount in Church of England schools was 7s. 8d. ; in 1870, 7s. 6d. ; 1875, 8s. 9d. ; 1880, 7s. 10d. ; 1885, 7s. 2d. ; and in 1887, 7s. From 1865 the amount has been, on the whole, diminishing, while the amount of fees in the same time has risen from 7s. 10d. to 10s. 8d. per child, and the amount from the Imperial Treasury has risen from 7s. 5d. to 16s. 6d. We are actually now in this condition: that the Imperial Treasury is going to give 27s. out of 36s., and the remainder only is to be made up by the school pence and by voluntary subscriptions. I do not on the present occasion say a word against voluntary schools, though my own conviction is strongly in favour of having education under School Board management. I only urge denominational schools, in their own as well as the public interest, to take care that the name by which they have been recognised shall continue to be a real living name. It is not desirable in any way that these schools should exist all over the country without having surrounding them a body of persons really taking an active part in their maintenance and progress. That, I contend, is demanded by the interests both of the public and of the persons concerned with these schools, that they should not only take a share in administering the endowments left by their forefathers, but show their faith in the denominational principle by their work and subscriptions. I have taken the amount of 7s. I propose that if the amount of subscriptions is not equal to 7s. that the grant shall be reduced below 10s., exactly in the same proportion; that is to say, if they do not contribute 7s. the grant shall be reduced; and if they only contribute 6s. the grant shall be reduced to 9s., and if they contribute only 5s. the grant shall be reduced to 8s. The Committee will have observed that 7s. is now the average amount in the Church of England schools, the average for denominational schools being, I think, 6s. 7d. Now, is there any necessity for putting this clause in the Bill? I find that in Birmingham the voluntary contribution is 5s. 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ d.; in Bradford, 2s. 11 $\frac{3}{4}$ d.; Bristol, 3s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; Hull, 6s. 8 $\frac{1}{4}$ d.; Leeds, 4s. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; Liverpool, 3s. 1d.; London, 9s. 0 $\frac{1}{4}$ d.; Manchester, 4s. 7d., and so on. In Brighton it is 11s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., but all the others are comparatively small. Preston, of which we have heard so much, is only 4s. 1 $\frac{3}{4}$ d. These figures are for the year 1884-85. I imagine the figures are substantially the same in the present year. A considerable number of voluntary schools, especially in the North of England and the large towns, are supported mainly by school pence and the grant. I do not believe that the majority on the other side of the House will think that sound or wise. I do not think they will hold that it is desirable either on the ground of the public interest or on the ground of their particular denominations that there should be, as it were, excepted from the general run of public management certain schools which are to depend on a large gift from the Public Treasury, and very little, indeed, on voluntary subscriptions. The noble Lord (Viscount Cranborne) referred to the case of Darwen. By the Mundella Return I make the voluntary subscriptions there to be 3s. a head, and when he urges an increased grant I cannot help thinking that he ought to recognise as far more suitable that he should urge those in the district which he represents to show their faith in the principles they adopt by subscribing liberally in support of their schools. If they do not they must either diminish the efficiency of their schools or put the deficit upon the school pence. If I were specially anxious to destroy voluntary schools I should urge them as much as they could to add to the school pence. Surely it would be wiser on the part of those who are in favour of voluntary schools to try to increase the efficiency of their schools by urging their neighbours to contribute to the schools of which they approve, and they will have the additional inducement that for every 1s. above 3s. or 4s. which they are now giving they will get an extra 1s. from the Government. There should be a fair amount of subscriptions in order to maintain the efficiency of the schools, and to prevent in the case of any particular school the intention of Parliament being frustrated by maintaining the school pence at a considerable elevation. As to endowments, I should prefer that they be not used in the future to supply the place of subscriptions and of rates, but in making the school fulfil the object of the original benefactor by increasing its efficiency by means of the endowment. I urge strongly that a provision of this kind should be put in the Bill, so that security shall be given to the public, and the denomination that there shall be a living body of persons aiding, improving, and continuing to improve the school.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, after "Act," to insert "Provided that, if in any such school the income in any year arising from subscriptions, endowment, and rates does not amount to seven shillings for each such child, the fee grant payable to the said school in respect of each child shall be reduced by the difference between seven shillings and the average amount for each child of the income arising as aforesaid."—(Mr. Roby.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(4.30.) SIR W. HART DYKE: It is not possible for the Government to accept the Amendment, which has been so clearly placed before the Committee by the hon. Member. As I understand it, it is a scheme for fining schools when the subscriptions do not reach a certain point. For example, if the subscriptions do not amount to 5s. per scholar, then the fee grant will be 8s. instead of 10s. So far as the Amendment aims at insuring the maintenance of subscriptions and of the efficiency of schools, it has my sympathy with its intention. Any scheme which will insure the fulfilment of their obligations by voluntary managers will to that extent be valuable. But the Amendment goes far beyond that, for it really upsets the financial basis of the Bill. I have been obliged to resist Amendments which would have extended the financial operations of the Bill, and it would be unjust to entertain Amendments which would restrict those operations.

MR. ROBY: The Government are in a peculiar mood to-day; they resist Amendments for both diminishing and increasing the amount to be spent. If this Amendment were operative it would tend to increase the resources of a school by keeping up the subscriptions, or to diminish the charge upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. PICTON: I shall vote for this Amendment. The Bill practically does away with the 17s. 6d. limit by reckoning the 10s. fee grant as if it came from local sources.

Amendment negatived.

(4.37.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): The Amendment which stands in my name deals with the exceptional state of things which prevails in Wales. There the majority of the schools are Church schools, and it is well-known that Dissenters stand very poor chance of securing appointments as teachers in them. This inflicts a hardship on the Municipality, for it tends to reduce the efficiency of the teaching staff.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, after the word "Act," to insert the words "Provided always, that such grant shall not be made to any elementary school in the counties of Wales and Monmouth, the managers of which shall impose a condition or stipulation upon the appointment or retention of any teacher in such school that he or she shall be a member of any particular religious denomination, or shall attend or assist in the services of any such denomination."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(4.40.) SIR W. HARCOURT: Surely the Amendment is a reasonable one. My only complaint is that it is limited to Wales and Monmouth. It seems to me that it should apply to all schools receiving State aid. The profession of a school teacher is a very honourable one, and if persons fitted for it are to be disqualified from following it in so large a proportion of our schools unless they belong to a particular denomination, I think a great hardship is being inflicted on the community. This system operates very harshly in Wales. It is discouraging young people from qualifying for the work of teaching, and it is imposing an unjustifiable religious disqualification. I hope the Government will adopt some plan to remove that disqualification.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I quite agree that the profession of teaching is one of the most honourable, but I am not aware that there is any disqualification put upon persons by reason of their not belonging to the Church of England. There are training colleges by which they can enter the profession and schools in which they can be employed.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I put the case of a parish in which there is only one school. If elder scholars cannot begin teaching in that school, they cannot do so anywhere else, and therefore they are disqualified if their religion is not that insisted upon by the managers.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: This Amendment goes far beyond that, for it provides that no conditions shall be laid down by the managers of any denominational school receiving this grant that a teacher shall belong to a particular denomination. If such a provision were inserted in the Bill would it be operative? Would not the Wesleyans find means? Would not Wesleyans, who have some of the best schools in the country, find means of selecting a Wesleyan by conviction? And so with regard to the Roman Catholics. Are they to be deprived of the Government Grant if they insist that a teacher in any of their schools shall be a member of their Church? I cannot consent to an Amendment that would prevent the managers of a Roman Catholic school from making it a condition that the teachers in that school shall be members of that Church. I am in entire accord with the right hon. Gentleman opposite that the rights of conscience should be respected and should be dealt with in a most liberal spirit; but I believe that in practice the consciences of both teachers and children are respected in a far greater degree than hon. Members opposite appear to think they are. In many Church schools the pupil teachers are Dissenters. I, however, cannot accept, on the part of the Government, a proposal of this kind, which is entirely opposed to the existence of denominational schools, and which would put a severe strain upon the consciences of the managers of schools. Even if the Amendment were adopted it would be utterly and hopelessly inoperative.

(4.47.) MR. A. DYKE ACLAND: I cannot agree with the First Lord of the Treasury. I should like to point out to him that the rural schools in Wales require the protection which is proposed to be given to them by this Amendment. In a school in the parish in which I live 90 per cent. of the children are Nonconformists, and yet all the teachers are required to belong to the Church of England. Of the 105 children on the books not ten are children of Church-going parents. The school is governed by the clergyman, assisted by his curates. Some 40 years ago two parishioners were nominated on the Committee, but their successors have not been appointed. Surely it is not fair to lay it down that no one can be appointed teacher in a school in which 90 per cent. of the children are Nonconformists unless he is able to say he is a communicant of the Church of England. Yet, under this Bill, you will encourage such conduct.

(4.50.) MR. T. ELLIS: I appeal to the Vice President to make this small concession to Wales. The principle has already been found to work satisfactorily in connection with Welsh intermediate education. My hon. Friend has cited the case of a school in which 90 per cent. of the children are the children of Nonconformists. In my own village there is a school in which every child is a Nonconformist, and yet all the teachers are required to belong to the Church of England. That is a state of things which no sensible man will uphold. There will be no real grievance in the case of Roman Catholic schools, because the religious teaching in those schools is given by the priests and not by the schoolmasters. One of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools has expressed the opinion that religious teaching in all voluntary schools had better be given by the ministers and not by the teachers. In my opinion, the present condition of things offers a premium to hypocrisy, as it induces people to declare themselves members of the Church of England merely for the purpose of qualifying themselves as school teachers in Church schools. If this Amendment were agreed to, it would, even if practically inoperative as the right hon. Gentleman opposite says it would be in a majority of cases, at all events show the spirit in which the House of Commons looks at the matter. I hope my hon. Friend will press this to a Division.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: The speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down is another example of the reckless inconsistency with which hon. Members opposite attempt to draw distinctions between the Roman Catholic Church and the Church of England to the detriment of the latter. Why should the hon. Member desire that the schools of the two Churches should have a different treatment meted out to them?

MR. T. ELLIS: I only asked that this Amendment should be applied in the case of Welsh parishes in which there is only one school and that a Church of England one.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Why is it that the Welsh Nonconformists if they do not like Church of England schools do not build schools of their own? The answer given by an hon. Gentleman opposite was that they preferred Board schools. That is the difference between the Church of England and the Nonconformists. Whilst the members of the Church of England are willing to pay for the education of their children, the Nonconformists are not willing to spend a penny in aid of education, but desire that all the cost should fall upon the ratepayers. If Nonconformists in districts where there are many of them want schools of their own, let them build them. I am not speaking of the small congregations of Nonconformists in certain parts of England. Their case is entirely different; but in Wales, where we are told they are in such a large majority, I cannot conceive how they can have the face to complain that there are no Nonconformist schools. I protest against the assumption apparently favoured by some hon. Members opposite that schools exist not for the benefit of the children, but for the benefit of the teachers. If managers of schools were not to be allowed to require that teachers should conform to given conditions respecting religious belief, persons might present themselves for appointment as teachers who were not Nonconformists, but extreme, aggressive infidels. Supposing that an infidel wished to be appointed teacher in a school, for the purpose of indoctrinating the children with his own ideas on religious matters, are the managers to be prevented from rejecting his application on the ground of his non-belief? I hold that the discretion of managers ought not to be interfered with in the way now proposed, and I trust that the Committee will reject the Amendment.

(5.4.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The noble Lord, by what I cannot but think the unworthy and very hackneyed taunt with which he began his speech, has shown how a very kindly man may be influenced for the worse by sectarian feeling; it is astonishing that a country gentleman, or the son of a country gentleman, who knows what are the conditions of rural life, should think it a sufficient answer to a number of agricultural labourers and small farmers, who wish for schools in agreement with their own religious persuasion, to say that if they are not satisfied with the existing schools of a district they should set up schools of their own. That is an invitation and a challenge which, if the noble Lord were speaking to a number of poor labourers, he would be the very last man to use. What is the use of talking in that way? The Welsh Nonconformists have proved that they were willing to set up schools themselves in those districts where they derive sufficient private incomes from trade or other pursuits; the grievance of which they complain arises in the rural districts where the whole surplus wealth of the community is represented by the rent. For my own part, I feel that the landlord in such districts is not fulfilling his duty as receiver of that surplus when he sets up a school which does not conform to the views of the great bulk of the people living upon the soil. Does the noble Lord really think that in any Welsh village where there is already sufficient school accommodation for the children of the district the Education Department will permit the public money to be wasted in the establishment of another school?

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Certainly; according to the law, any school in an elementary school district which can attract a certain number of scholars for a certain time is entitled to a grant.

MR. A. DYKE ACLAND: A building must be provided.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: But does the noble Lord seriously think that his plan is one which would really conduce to the better education of the people? One of the reasons why we welcome the proposal of the Government to establish free education is that we wish to systematise the education of the country. The noble Lord's view is that in a small village two starving schools should be set up, when the only real means of insuring efficient education in the village is by concentrating all the educational enterprise and energy of the community on one school. On some occasions, perhaps, shadowy grievances have been put forward by Nonconformists, but the grievance which the Amendment is designed to meet is a very substantial one. It is a very great grievance that the people of a district should not be able to hope to teach in the schools of the district, or to have their children taught by those who are in sympathy with the religious views of the majority of the community. In the interests of education itself the legitimate prizes of education ought to be open to the many and not reserved for the few. Nonconformists in Wales and elsewhere have no chance at present of obtaining the blue riband of education. The noble Lord (Viscount Cranborne) sneers—[laughter]—yes, sneers as visibly as I have ever seen anyone sneer in this House. But those who do not belong to the noble Lord's class or to the class next to his, but to the ordinary village community, know that the proudest intellectual distinction in the eyes of a child is to become a pupil teacher, with the hope of ultimately becoming a teacher in his native village, or, as a Welshman would say, in his native country. This Amendment is a protest against the great abuse of obliging teachers to undertake duties lying outside the legitimate domain of education. It ought not to be required of a teacher that he should be an organist, that he should sing in a choir, that he should act as clerk; still less ought it to be made a condition of his employment—and this is a religious test of a most unfortunate sort—that he should be a communicant.

*(5.12.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I am afraid that the discussion is wandering away somewhat from the point before the House. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the spirit and object of the Amendment, but even the hon. Member for Rotherham agrees that it would not carry out the object he has in view. The hon. Member for Merionethshire (Mr. T. Ellis) referred to the endowed schools. The Endowed Schools Commission, of which I was a member, had to deal with cases entirely different from those which the Amendment is intended to cover. We had to consider cases in which it was impossible under old deeds to appoint any person to be master of a school unless he belonged to a particular denomination. This limitation was abolished, and the change was therefore an operative Amendment. This Amendment, on the contrary, simply provides that membership of a particular denomination shall not be made a condition of appointment. The appointment would still be made in exactly the same way, and the only difference would be that notice would not be given of it. Then we had a case referred to in which a school in Wales had been for 40 years carried on under the Church of England clergyman, and yet almost the whole parish were Nonconformists. That is hardly a case which shows there was much grievance or oppression, because it shows that the school has not been carried on in a proselytising spirit.

MR. T. ELLIS: The right hon. Gentleman is confusing a case I quoted with one referred to by the hon. Member for Rotherham.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon, but the argument holds good all the same. The Amendment now proposed, however, would have no effect. If, indeed, it were operative, and if it were extended, as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, to England, it would strike at the very root of the Bill, because it would exclude Roman Catholic and Nonconformist schools from the advantages of the Bill. As drawn, however, the words would really have no effect whatever, and would not carry out the object which the hon. Member has in view.

*(5.15.) MR. S. SMITH: The noble Lord opposite (Viscount Cranborne) challenged Nonconformists to build schools of their own. I wish to tell him that Church schools in Wales are largely built by the help of Nonconformists.

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I am of opinion that the Nonconformists of Wales do not object to the Bill in its present form. The persons educated in the denominational schools of which we have heard so much are generally labourers' children, and the agricultural labourers of Wales are Churchmen, not Nonconformists. As far as we can calculate, from the statistics at our disposal, about half the people of Wales are Churchmen. We were anxious to prove these facts by the official Returns of the census, but hon. Members, like the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith), oppose a religious census being taken for reasons of their own. If we had had a religious census much of the opposition to the Bill would have been abandoned. The speech of the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) has knocked the bottom out of the arguments brought forward in support of the Amendment. He has objected to it that it only applies to 12 or 13 counties in the West, and he very properly argued that it should be applied generally or not at all. The Nonconformists of Wales are not poor. The poorer classes do not belong to them. In fact, the Nonconformists of Wales do not want to have much to do with the poor. Their religious societies are designed for those who can pay for their own membership, and they are supported by the well-to-do middle class, and some rich strangers who are good enough to represent them in the House of Commons. It will be found that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Stuart Rendel) and others have contributed largely to Nonconformity in Wales. The Board schools in Wales are really denominational, because the religious teaching given in those schools is in accord with the religious views of Nonconformists, where any religious teaching at all is provided, for in 50 schools in the Principality the Holy Bible is a prohibited book. The proposed Amendment is, therefore, conceived in the spirit of bigotry rather than of religious liberty.

(5.22.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Member for Derby feels some compunction for having given his support to this Amendment after he had refused it to that of the hon. Member for Huddersfield. The right hon. Gentleman very justly deprecated sectarian discussion, but the question we are now debating is precisely the issue raised by the hon. Member for Huddersfield, although it is not raised in such a logical way. What we are discussing is not a particular grievance, but the grievance of the existing denominational system. Under that system the denominations are allowed to teach their own religious belief by formularies and Catechisms. It is surely only consistent that as long as that is the law those who wish to have those formularies and Catechisms taught should also wish to have them taught by those who believe in them. It is equally consistent that the Member for Huddersfield should propose that all that should be changed. My only objection to that is that the adoption of the Amendment would be fatal to the Bill, as we can only have free education on certain conditions, namely, that the denominational system shall be left alone. If hon. Gentlemen are determined to attack the denominational system, then they must be prepared to concede that they care much more about destroying the denominational system than about having free education. I shall vote against this Amendment, not only because it will be inoperative, but because I regard it as wholly inconsistent.

(5.25.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not myself feel the inconsistency of the declaration I made a short time ago. But really the Member for West Birmingham is much more denominational than the denominationalists, and carries his views further than Her Majesty's Government. If we want to understand why the Nonconformists in England and Wales are opposed to the denominational system, we have only to listen to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Darwen and that of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Leighton) who, although not a Welsh Member, always undertakes to speak for Wales. I hope the speech of the noble Lord will be accurately reported and will be distributed in every English village and rural district, so that people may thoroughly understand the purse-proud spirit on which the noble Lord has based his opposition. The noble Lord said he could not understand why these poor people could not build schools for themselves. It is because the noble Lord has never been able to understand what is the difference between wealth and poverty. Than such language used by the noble Lord a greater blow could not be struck at the denominational system, because it shows what denominationalism is and what are its objects. When we listen to such language we must be convinced that the only chance of fair play for all is the establishment of Board schools in every part of the country. The noble Lord said that it was not for the purpose of giving to the children in the schools a fair chance of rising to be professional teachers that they contributed their shillings or pence to the support of these schools, but for the purpose of excluding men of a different religious denomination. There is only one remedy for that, and that is, as I have said, to establish Board schools, where people will have fair play, and thus to put an end to persecution and injustice.

*MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): The Nonconformists of Wales have been taunted with not building Nonconformist schools. As a matter of fact, many of the Church schools in Wales have been built with the assistance of Nonconformists, who have contributed to them and have given a great deal in free labour. At the time many Church schools were built there was no suggestion that the schools would be put into the hands of the National Society and made denominational schools. The exhortations made to Nonconformists were solely directed to the necessity of having schools, and——

Sir W. Harcourt

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): Perhaps the hon. Member will bear in mind that this Bill, which I understand will be of great public utility, directed more especially to conditions that obtain in his own constituency, may give rise to questions affecting other counties, and therefore it is desirable, in order to afford proper opportunity for consideration, that Committee should be deferred to a distant date, consistently, of course, with this period of the Session.

MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I gladly accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, and propose to set the Bill down for Committee on Wednesday.

Question put, and agreed to.

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, in moving the Instruction which I have placed upon the Paper, it is not my intention to interpose long before the House goes into Committee upon the Bill. Perhaps I ought to apologise for the form of the Motion I make and for interposing at all. I am quite aware that, though a Motion to instruct the Committee is a very ordinary proceeding in the other House of Parliament, it is comparatively rare in your Lordships' House; and I must confess that during the many years I have had the honour of being a Member of this House I do not recollect one case in which an important debate was raised upon a Motion to instruct the Committee. However, I see from the precedents which have been put before me that it is a perfectly competent and regular Motion to make, and that there have been numerous cases standing on all fours with the present one. But this is not a matter of importance, because if the object I have in view should meet with the assent of the House, and should be acceptable to the Government, it would be very easy to put the Motion into the form of a clause afterwards in Committee. If, on the other hand, for any reason the noble Lords opposite representing the Government should not be able to accept this addition to the Bill, I should be extremely unwilling, as I am sure your Lordships know from the observations I made a few days ago, to impede the progress of the Bill, or to endanger its safety in another place. I am anxious to direct the attention of the House to what I think the incompleteness of the Bill in a very important matter. I imagine we have all two objects in view. One is simply to multiply the owners of land in Ireland, nothing more. The other is to improve ownership in Ireland. We desire to increase the number of those who purchase, and to improve the value of the article which is to be purchased. I can well understand the noble Lord, who has charge of the Bill in this House, will say that the first of these two objects is the object alone which the Government has in view, to multiply the number of owners, and not to affect the value of estates under the existing law. I confess if that were the only object and effect of the Bill, I should not much care what its fate might be; but I am very happy to feel, and I am sure that the Bill as it now stands, and without any alteration, does in a very important manner affect ownership value in Ireland, and that it will, to a large extent, improve the value of the article which you wish the tenant to buy. The noble Lord who introduced the Bill hardly mentioned at all in his speech the clauses which improve the Land Court and make it more truly a judicial body, which clauses, in my opinion, form one of the most important parts of the Bill. Those provisions will enormously improve the value of the Court, because I know nothing more unfortunate for those who occupy land in Ireland than to feel that the Court before which they are to go, and what we call a judicial body is not a judicial body in any sense of the word, that it does not judge by any known code of law, that it is a purely arbitrary body dealing with the whole agricultural property of Ireland without reference to any known principle at all. Therefore, the clauses in this Bill which tend to improve the Court are, in my opinion, the most important part of the Bill; and I do not remember that the noble Lord, in his opening speech in introducing the Bill, dwelt at all on this improvement in the law. I am not inclined to think myself that the Bill goes far enough in that particular. I think the Land Court ought to be made still more judicial in its character, not only than it is now, but even as it will be under this Bill, and that the owners and occupiers ought to feel that they are dealing with a thoroughly independent body constituted for the purpose of being under no personal, or political, or Party influences, and dealing with one of the most important interests of the country as judges ought to deal with the lives and property of men. But I cannot doubt that the amendment made by this Bill in that matter will be still further advanced in the times which are before us, and that no civilised people will long consent to the great mass of property in the country being dealt with by a body which is not put upon a thoroughly judicial footing. But besides this question of the improvement in the ownership of lands in Ireland by an improvement in the Law Courts, there is another item in this Bill tending in the same direction, which I do not think has been fully appreciated outside of this House certainly, and perhaps not by every Member in this House. I mean the effect of this Bill in improving the value of ownership, in virtue of the change which will necessarily arise from the existing owners to the tenants who may become owners. This is rather a complicated subject, and I wish to speak under all reserve, especially in presence of so eminent an authority as the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who must be most intimately acquainted with this subject, because it is a matter of legal construction; and it is an extremely difficult one, because your Lordships will remember that the Acts of 1860, 1870, 1881, and 1887 were all Acts cumulative, one placed on top of the other. They did not proceed by repealing the previous Acts, but they were additional Acts. It is, therefore, a very complicated matter, and it is difficult to know really what is the state of the present law with regard to the tenure of land in Ireland. But the law which operates upon the ownership of land in Ireland is, no doubt, principally the Act of 1881. Now I beg the attention of the House for a moment to what the effect of this Bill will be, if it passes, on the ownership of land in Ireland under the existing law. The Act of 1881 establishes an immense distinction between land which is now let and land which is not let, but which is in the owner's hands. As regards all Ireland, land which is let to tenants is subject to the Land Court, and to all the inconveniences of what are called the "fair rent" clauses; but as regards land which is not let, which is in the owner's hands, it is, to a large extent, free from the embarrassments of the Act of 1881. They can let such land as they please to the highest bidder, and the Land Court has no power to interfere with any step which the landowner may take in letting land which is now in his own hands. That results from the distinction which runs through the Act of 1881 between what are called "present" and "future" tenants. All lands which, at the date of the Act, were in the owners hands, were free from the fair rent clauses of the Act. Now what will be the effect of this Act, supposing the Bill passes, and supposing it succeeds in producing, as is anticipated, a large crop of new owners? I beg your Lordships' attention to the position in which they will be. They will be entirely free from the trammels of the Act of 1881 as regards any bargain they might make for their land in future. Every one of these little owners will be free to let at the highest market rate, and no Court can interfere with them. Now, I beg your Lordships to remember with whom we are dealing. When we talk of these new proprietors in Ireland, remember we are dealing with men, many of whom are below, not only the £10 rent line, but below a £4 rent. I think out of the 600,000 holders of land in Ireland, there are more than two-thirds of them who are now rented below £10, while there are no less than 118,000 who hold only up to £4. There are only 12,000 who are above £100, and only 50,000 who are above the £40 mark. I would ask any noble Lord who is anxious to see peasant proprietorship established in Ireland, what is the position of these men under the existing law, or will be if this Bill passes. They will all be free to let their land at any price they can get for it. I do not object to that. I hold that the value of an article is what men can get for it, and that attempts on the part of Parliament to jerrymander prices, to diminish them or to increase them, are all measures which will be sure to fail in their object, and to produce great mischief. Those who say that my proposal will put larger powers into the hands of the new landowners in Ireland, have to encounter the fact that under the existing law, that is, when this Bill has been passed, all these wretched little holders at £4 or upwards will be able to let at the very highest rent they please, and there will be no power to interfere with them. This will arise under the existing law, and nobody proposes to alter it as far as I know; but—more than this—under this Bill these men will not only be free to let, but they will be free to subdivide. There is no law in Ireland to prevent a landlord subdividing. Nobody has been mad enough to advocate such a law. Every landowner might cut up every acre in his domain and let it to as many as he pleased. There is no power in the present law to prevent the subdivision of holdings the moment these new men become proprietors. I say, under these circumstances, the question is, whether you ought not to give free power also to the better class of new landowners to do what it is eminently expedient they should have power to do, and that is, to let their improved land on any terms that they may seem fit. I cannot understand, I must say, the feelings of those who have objections to men making the most of their land. It seems to me the mistake that people make now is to imagine that rents are due to the action of the landlords. It is very much like the mistake that was made in the darkest part of the dark ages, when it was believed that the price of corn was due to the “forestallers and regraters,” and the outcry they made with regard to that is very much like the outcry now made against the owners of land in Ireland for having let their lands at improved values. The doctrine of free letting will most assuredly be asserted by the small owners. There are hopes entertained that the land hunger in Ireland may have somewhat abated in consequence of the immense emigration that has taken place. We know, according to the Census Returns, that the population has been reduced very nearly one half since the potato disease, and I am told by friends from many parts of the country that they think there is a sensible diminution in the pressure of competition for farms; but, at the same time, when we look at the Returns which have been presented to Parliament, showing the very high prices which have been obtained for tenant right in Ireland, the enormous prices which have been paid in the North of Ireland for “conacre” lettings—they go up to £10, £11, and £13 an acre—I do not think we can rely upon those opinions, and we must face the fact that if this Bill is passed and succeeds in effecting the object which it is intended to effect, they will let at the highest market value, and they will also subdivide, and you cannot prevent it. Now, look at the position of the better class of tenants, those between the £20 and £50 line. If there is a class of men in Ireland that you should wish to see placed in the position of small owners I should say it would be the higher class; and perhaps I should go further, and include those who are called comparatively large farmers in Ireland—men who are above £100 a year. What is likely to be their conduct if they are sensible men, if they are men with the interests of agriculture at heart and know how to promote it? They will have the security of tenure which they possess as new proprietors, being free to let their land as they like; they will make great improvements, they may drain and fence their land, they may do everything, supposing them to be as intelligent as I hope they will turn out to be, that any of your Lordships would do on your own large estates. What is the condition with regard to them? You do not allow them to purchase except on one condition: that any tenant to whom they may let their land shall have the power of selling the occupancy to the highest bidder. That is the law as it stands under the Act of 1881. The new owners will be able to let for the first time at the full rent which the market will supply, but only on the condition that the tenants shall have the power of selling that which they have done nothing towards creating. Having once let in a tenant, the new owners cannot prevent him from exercising the right of selling the holding which has been improved and built upon by another man. Under the Act of 1881 no owner of land can let except under the provision that the tenant shall have what is called tenant right, and shall be able, therefore, to sell the landlord's property. Now, I ask, is this a rational state of the law? Is it a rational thing to insist upon even when both parties agree to a more rational arrangement? You are giving power to the poorest people to do what it is not to the public interest they should do, but the higher and better class of tenants you do not put under a condition which is rational for them. That is the reason why I wish to see free trade in land in Ireland established as regards that class of tenants, and I do not know what objections can be made to the proposal. I myself, indeed, have a full conviction that if this Bill passes, and if it succeeds in its object, and if a very large crop of new owners arises in Ireland, they will not long tolerate the absurd and irrational restrictions of that kind upon them imposed by the Act of 1881. That is why I should vote for the Bill through thick and thin if no such amendment were adopted by the Government, because I believe it will come sooner or later; and though the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) and his colleagues may object to my Motion in form I cannot believe that they object to it upon its merits, although I can conceive they may object to it on grounds of present convenience. Now I know what is the real cause of the objection to this clause in many minds. It is because they do not wish to see re-established what they call the relation between landlord and tenant. You cannot get rid of the relation between landlord and tenant. Small owners are just as likely to let as big owners, and a great deal more. I was told this morning a fact I did not know before, that a large number of small peasant proprietors in Belgium combine together—perhaps 150 or 160 small proprietors—and they let their land to one man. There you have the relation of landlord and tenant re-established, though under somewhat different conditions. Therefore I say you cannot prevent that relation being re-established in Ireland, and you ought not to prevent it if you could. If that is the state of matters is it not better to say, once for all, that the new owners shall be free to contract on what conditions are suitable for both parties? I always feel in this matter that we are going back to the most ignorant times of the dark ages when the Legislature prevented two parties agreeing together on such terms as they thought expedient. It is the old story of trying to prevent usury, of trying to prevent forestalling and regrating. It is a policy, or rather an attempt, that is condemned by the first principles of political economy. When you are taking a new start, and starting men upon a new foundation altogether, when you have these new proprietors whose land will be free from all previous claims, upon whose properties you cannot say that anything has been done by anybody but the landlords, why is it that you should not start free? Why should you not start with these doctrines of free competition? As I said before, I do not wish to press this Motion if the Government are unwilling to accept it, because I am certain the result will arrive sooner or later if the Bill succeeds in producing a large crop of new owners. But I see there are other difficulties in the way. I will not assume that the Government are like the tenants in Ireland whom the noble Lord (the Marquess of Waterford) described to us the other night in his interesting speech. He said, "You are trying to provide for what is to happen 49 years hence;" and he said, "Why, to an Irish tenant 49 years is an eternity; they do not think of what is to happen 49 years hence." But, my Lords, are not we to think of what will happen in 49 years' time? The Marquess of Waterford said that when he spoke to his tenants about the 49 years they asked him, "Where shall we be 49 years hence?" My Lords, we may all say the same thing. That is about the period I have had the honour of being a Member of this House, and I hardly see a single face which I remember when I first entered it. We shall doubtless all or nearly all be gone 49 years hence; but we must remember that the deeds we do and even the words we speak, the doctrines we announce, the principles we lay down in our legislation will survive our individual lives; and I maintain that all of us, if we can, as Members of a House of Parliament, ought to try to establish a sound doctrine as regards the relation of landlord and tenant in Ireland, and not perpetuate the delusions and snares under which they now exist. I cannot help pointing out to the House the very different results which have come about from the land reforms in our legislation during the last ten years, and the results which have come about from the land legislation in Prussia. In the early part of the land agitation I used to hear a great deal about the doctrines of Stein and Hardenberg. They were quoted as an example for the Government to follow. They had to adopt a great reform in Prussia, and to deal with a state of affairs which was infinitely more complicated than we have had to deal with. But how is it they have succeeded in their legislation? Why has the German legislation been permanent. No similar or amended Act has been required there, and why was that? Because those German statesmen were not driven from pillar to post by the necessity of consulting the views of opposing political parties. They were not mere Opportunists, they were not men who were compelled to run in the line of least resistance, however foolish they knew that line to be. They studied the subject; they laid down abstract principles which they knew to be sound. Above all, they came to England and studied in this country our system of land legislation, and they determined that free trade in land should be established, and that all those restrictions which were inherited from the Middle Ages in Germany should be abolished. They made that the basis of their legislation, and they have succeeded. But what have we been doing? We have been going on from 10 years to 10 years "meddling and muddling," as the late Lord Derby said, unsettling everybody and everything, and settling nothing. Are we never to try to adopt those sound principles in this House which every one of your Lordships in private conversation admits to be sound, but dare not lay down or attempt to carry out in public? I earnestly commend this Motion to the decision of the House, and for the adoption of Her Majesty's Government; but I am pleased to think, whether you adopt it or not, that if you succeed in multiplying the number of owners in Ireland they will themselves see that they possess the perfect freedom which they ought to have over the property they have acquired.

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

The Duke of Argyll

Moved—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to provide that purchasers under the Act when they have completed their purchases, and when the last instalments of the said purchases have been discharged, shall be free to let their holdings so purchased, whether by lease or other tenure, on whatever terms may be agreed upon between the owner and lessee; and that contracts to this effect between such owners and lessees shall be binding on both parties; provided always, that all such lettings or contracts shall be in writing." —(The Lord Sandridge [D. Argyll]).

*EARL COWPER: My Lords, perhaps I may say a few words upon the subject of this Instruction. The object of the noble Duke's Motion, if it has any object at all, as far as I can make out, seems to be to restore the state of things which existed before the Acts of 1870 and 1881. In the first place I do not know whether it is advisable to legislate for anything 50 years hence. It does seem to me, considering how much legislation there has been, and is likely to be, on the subject of land in this country as well as in Ireland, it is rather unnecessary to look so far forward, but I should be sorry that anything went out which showed that it was our intention, however remotely, in passing this measure, that even at the end of 50 years facilities should be given for the establishment of a number of small landlords in Ireland, small landlords with complete power over their tenants, who would be unprotected by tenant right or anything else. There is a great deal to be said for the position of a large landlord, having a rental, it may be, of a thousand a year, for in this country, and even in Ireland, with all the restrictions which have been put upon him, he may be a blessing to the country. He may undertake improvements which cannot be undertaken by smaller owners or occupiers, such as carrying out systems of drainage which cannot be done by a number of small people without difficulty; he can regulate the right of cutting turf where such exists; he can benefit the labourers on his estate not only by giving them employment, but by way of charity also; he can watch over and care for the interests of his tenant, and if he feels that the tenant is in difficulties he may remit his rent or give him time. There is a great deal to be said for the large landlord, but we have deliberately decided that it is a good thing to afford facilities for getting rid of him. Surely, if this is so, everything that can be said in favour of getting rid of the large landlord can be said a hundred times more for not establishing a system of small landlords. The small owner is merely an encumbrance upon the land, and is no use to anybody. We can recall the times when landlords had it in their power, if they were inclined, to be arbitrary, though for the last ten years the landowners in Ireland have been much more oppressed than oppressing, and they have had great difficulty in collecting their rents; but there is no doubt that, even down to the recent times that I can remember, there was considerable oppression, giving a reason for the Land Acts which were passed; and I ask anybody who knows what took place then, whether it was not almost invariably the case that the worst acts of oppression were perpetrated by the small landlords, who could not afford to be generous, because they had only enough to live upon. If this Instruction means anything, it means that in 50 years' time facilities shall be given for the establishment of small landlords throughout Ireland, whose tenants shall, in fact, be entirely at their mercy, without the protection of the Acts of 1870 or 1881. Either this Instruction is perfectly useless—as I think it is, for it is nonsense to legislate for 50 years hence—or if it has any effect at all it will do harm, in showing that there is a mistaken intention on the part of Parliament; and I trust, therefore, that the Instruction will not be accepted. I will not venture to say more than these few words, as I do not desire to detain your Lordships.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): The speech of the noble Earl who has just sat down is a very remarkable one. It is the first declaration I have heard in Parliament in favour of maintaining large estates and large proprietors to the entire exclusion of small landlords. I used to hear of the country gentry as being of considerable value to the State, and our grandfathers were never tired of expatiating upon the advantages which such a class were to the State; but it is a proof of how very rapidly we are moving, and what strange fields we are invading, when my noble Friend denounces small landlords as being in themselves a positive mischief to the State. I do not in the least differ from my noble Friend in what he says as to the advantage of having large landowners. My noble Friend in his own capacity shows of what enormous value a large landowner can be to a country; but I think there is a danger in our present legislation and discussion of attaching too much value to laudable and philanthropic sentiments. After all, the mass of mankind must get on by bargain and sale, with a recognition, of course, of principles of justice as enforced by law; and, unless your system is such that it will work on the ordinary principles of self-interest which guide men, your system will break down. However much you may admire these noble sentiments of which my noble Friend has made himself the spokesman, they will not work the machinery of a State or of society. Your system must be such that the ordinary enlightened selfishness of mankind can work it, or else it will not answer. I have no objection to the principle of the noble Duke's proposed Instruction to the Committee, but I think it is outside the scope of the Bill, and would interfere with the passing of the measure. On that ground I should ask him not to press it. I am entirely of his opinion, that not only should the purchasers have the liberty, but that they will have the liberty he desires. The great advantage of economic laws is that they do not depend upon Parliament for their existence or validity; and if Parliament is misguided enough to think that its omnipotence can contradict economic laws Parliament will have a heavy fall, and economic laws will be the conquerors. The question of landlord and tenant is always argued in this country as if the landlord must be the big man and the tenant the small man; but that is not always the experience. The noble Duke alluded to the case of Belgium. I am familiar with the case of France. Everybody there, I think, admits that the system of small proprietorship is the sheet-anchor of the State, and that nothing could have enabled France to pass practically unscathed through the successive revolutions from which it has been her destiny to suffer but the enormous number of her small proprietors, who, whatever the administrations or the Governments might be, held on to the rudimentary principles of law and order and individual rights, and enforced them on their Governments. In France it is by no means the case that the landlord is the big man and the tenant the small one. There are, of course, plenty of instances of that kind, but there are plenty of instances of the opposite kind. It is the commonest thing in the world to find a whole tract of country held by one man, but it is owned by a countless number of owners, who all agree to be the landlords of that one man; and in that condition of things the most perfect freedom of contract between landlord and tenant is absolutely essential. And you will find in Ireland that in the long run, whatever you may declare in Acts of Parliament, unless you allow men to do as they like with their property they will neglect their property, and they will not put it to the best and most profitable use to which it can be put. I merely rose to notice the very remarkable development of opinion of which my noble Friend has made himself the mouthpiece. The doctrines laid down by the noble Duke are undoubtedly the doctrines of sound economical science. I believe when we have once established, as the last five years have greatly tended to establish, the restoration of the sanctity of contract and the maintenance of law and order in Ireland, these economic doctrines will have full play and will assert their supremacy, and men will do as they like with their own. My noble Friend alluded to the success of Stein and Hardenberg. No doubt they were able men, and their proposals were animated by a very sound view of political economy; but the real advantage which German statesmen have had is that a rigid legal contractual system has existed during the whole time that experiment was being tried. It might seem a paradox, but I would almost say that even the Act of 1881 would have succeeded if you could have enforced law and order in Ireland. People will fit and arrange themselves to any system of law, however absurd, and will make allowances to each other, if they are certain that they will be able to count on the prospect of their neighbours keeping their bargains, and upon the law enforcing those bargains if their neighbours refuse to fulfil them. That is the one necessity, and that is the essential foundation on which all civilised society must be based. If you provide that, I believe the sound economic doctrines which have been propounded by the noble Duke, which are merely the instincts of a sage self-interest, will grow up of themselves and establish themselves; and I have no doubt myself that if this Act succeeds, and a large number of proprietors exist in Ireland, they will demand and insist upon the common privilege of all free men to do what they like with their own.

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I beg to withdraw the Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

LORD CASTLETOWN: My Lords, as I was prevented from having an opportunity of speaking on the Second Reading, I may be pardoned for asking, by the courtesy of the Government, to be allowed to say a few words. The deep interest which I have taken in the land question must be my apology for trespassing on your Lordships' time for a few minutes. In 1884 I had the honour of moving a resolution in this House which had for its object very much what will be accomplished by the Bill now before the House. I predicted then that it was absolutely necessary and essential that a large and comprehensive measure, if possible, for land purchase should be introduced. I find that my prophecy is about to be fulfilled. I tried, when I did not succeed on that occasion, to induce the Liberal Government of that day to introduce a Bill dealing with this question, and I think I had nearly succeeded, as I believe my noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland of that time will admit, when unluckily that Government went out of office. Then

Her Majesty's Government, the Conservative Administration of 1885, introduced the Ashbourne Act. That Act has been an undoubted success. I myself have had many opportunities of seeing the success of the working of that Act. I have seen men who were thriftless and careless farmers become, under the operation of that Act, intelligent and improving farmers. I have seen agricultural improvements carried out under that Act which were never attempted under the other conditions which obtained before they had purchased their holdings. We know perfectly well—we have heard it in this House—it has been stated during the debate on the second reading—how punctually the payments have been made by the purchasers under that Act; and I am convinced that, unless some absolutely insensate act of folly is committed by some succeeding Government, the instalments under that Act, and under the present Bill when it becomes an Act, will undoubtedly be paid as punctually and regularly up to the end of the term. Now let me come to the Bill itself, and in the first instance let me ask Her Majesty's Government to consider one point. It may appear a trivial point, but it is in some respects an important one. I notice that in the Bill the Lord Lieutenant's name occurs in an enormous number of instances, and I cannot help thinking, when he finds all those numerous duties placed upon his shoulders, that he will find it difficult to discharge them all. There is only one person in history who reminds me of the position of the Lord Lieutenant, as that position will be under the present Bill, and that is the position of a Japanese nobleman, whose name and whose history is told in a very amusing opera called The Mikado—Pooh-Bah. He, unfortunately for himself, was entrusted with an enormous number of different offices, and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, under the present Bill, is entrusted with almost as many. He is almost Lord Chancellor; he is certainly the Lord High Executioner in case of default; he is the Lord High Almoner in case of distress; he is the Lord High Chairman of the future County Councils; and, in point of fact, he is the Lord High Everything of everybody inside and outside the Castle.

Lord Castletown

I would beg Her Majesty's Government to consider the question whether the Lord Lieutenant should not depute some of his numerous duties to some such body as the Land Commission, or the Privy Council, which, I believe, is one of the most valuable bodies in Ireland. Now I come to the Guarantee Clauses, and those I will touch upon very rapidly. They appear to me to be ample, clear, and almost superfluous in their multiplicity. They guard the British taxpayer in every way. But there is one clause to which the noble Lord (the Marquess of Waterford) referred, which may be called the Calamities Clause, and which will, I hope, be dealt with in the House to-night when we get into Committee on the Bill. Then I come to Clause 10, the classification of advances. On that clause, when we go into Committee, I hope I shall be allowed to say a few words; therefore, I will not detain your Lordships on it now; but I would ask the House to consider very seriously whether it would not be much wiser to leave to natural economic laws the distribution of the money which you provide under this Bill. There are amendments down in regard to this clause which I notice, and I cannot help thinking that one or other of those Amendments might meet the difficulties of the case, and might provide a more simple and feasible way of disposing of the matter. There is one power which I regret very much to see is not in the Bill, that is the power of paying Government charges with Government money. It looks rather as if the Government were a little ashamed of the paper they are going to issue to the Irish landlords. I am glad also to see the power given to the public to purchase in the open market, or through the Post Office, these Guarantee Land Bonds. The advantages which they offer are very great, and will popularise the Land Bonds, as the interest is higher than the normal rate; and that will rather induce men who have purchased these bonds—they will be principally Irish investors in the Post Office—to urge their relations and friends who may have purchased their holdings to pay up their instalments punctually. Now I come to one great blot, in my opinion, in the Bill, and that is the question of administration. If Her Majesty's Government had, in the other House of Parliament, boldly utilised the time which I must say was wasted upon a certain Amendment, in passing through that House the Land Department Bill, I fancy they would have found that the administration would have been very much benefited and very much improved; but what have they done at the present time? I want your Lordships to consider this point very seriously, because really, to my mind, the whole crux of the Bill is that they have imported into the Land Purchase Court the Fair Rent Commission. In my opinion nothing could be more unwise. The whole advantage, in my opinion, of land purchase, and I may say the one reason why I have advocated land purchase through thick and thin is, as the noble Duke has said, that in some respects it brings back voluntary agreement and freedom of contract. The Land Purchase Commissioners under the Acts of 1885 and 1887 have administered those Acts courageously, fairly, and conscientiously. I believe no one can say anything against the manner in which they have administered those Acts. They have refused in many instances—and that is one reason of their popularity—in cases in which I should be loth to term by too strong language, but which one may call jobbery cases—to act upon pressure. They have kept a clear, distinct line between freedom of contract and pressure. They have safeguarded the Treasury in every instance, and my belief is, if it can be possibly managed, it would be most valuable to keep the two sections of the Land Commission absolutely apart in the Bill now before the House. I should like to say one thing more upon this matter before I leave it. I noticed in the other House that a distinguished Baronet said the opposition that was raised to the Land Purchase Commissioners emanated from the landlord party. I do not think that is the case. I have myself sold under the Ashbourne Act, and I am convinced that nothing can be fairer or more conscientious than the action of those Commissioners. I think if there have been objections to them, they have emanated not from the landlord party, not from any landlords in Ireland, but from certain people who have found that arrangements which they wished to carry out under those

Acts have been thwarted by the conscientious management and treatment of the cases by those Commissioners. There are two or three other small points which I should like to urge upon your Lordships. What we want to do, and what I am convinced that all those noble Lords who have estates in Ireland are anxious to do, is to make the Bill which the Government have introduced a workable Bill. We do not want to find after a year or so that we have to come back immediately to Parliament for a further development of the powers contained in it. What we all desire to do is to make the Bill an easy working measure, and I believe that it will move without friction. For that purpose I will, with your Lordships' permission, introduce some Amendments, dealing partly with legal questions and partly with matters which will make the Bill feasible and workable. I think I have now spoken long enough, and I am certain your Lordships are anxious to get into Committee on this Bill. I believe that the passage of this measure, and its work, will—if your Lordships permit it and if Her Majesty's Government permit it to be made a workable and useful Bill—mark a great era in the history of my country. I believe you will find, and the English taxpayer will find, that my countrymen, when they have become possessed of their holdings—I am convinced of it—will pay their instalments regularly, if they are not egged on by statesmen or agitators to repudiate them, as they may possibly be. I believe your Lordships will find this Bill will meet the great want in Ireland at this moment, and that it will create not so much the small peasant proprietors as it will establish a large yeoman proprietor class, who will constitute a middle class and be a balancing power in that country. My countrymen, Irishmen of all views, are grateful to Her Majesty's Government for introducing this measure and for carrying it so far to an issue; but I think also that Her Majesty's Government owes in some measure a deep debt of gratitude to those Irishmen—and I would speak modestly on this point—who have urged in season and out of season that to facilitate land purchase is the solution of the land question. I think I may say that in my knowledge, with almost a unique experience, you have the first instance of the Imperial Government bringing in a measure for Ireland the initial sketches for which were furnished by Irishmen—a measure initiated by Irishmen, which I hope will be passed by Her Majesty's Government, as it will be passed with the good will and hardly with a dissentient voice among all classes in Ireland. There was, no doubt, friction in the other House; but there is no doubt that all sections of the Irish members were anxious that the Bill should pass into law. We have seen the same thing here, and I think I may say safely that if this Bill is made workable, as I believe it can be, and if Her Majesty's Government will permit us to do that, the Bill will have a happy and rapid progress through your Lordships' House.

Moved that the House do now resolve itself into Committee.

Agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Leave given to the Lord Tyrone (M. Waterford) to speak sitting in the said Committee, and to vote in the House.

Clause 1.

*THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): My Lords, I have to move in page 1, line 11, to leave out "landlord and tenant," and insert "vendor and purchaser"; and in line 17 to leave out "June and December," and insert "July and January," as the months on the first days of which the half-yearly payments of annuities should be made.

Amendments agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

Clause 4.

LORD CASTLETOWN: My Lords, the Amendment that is on the Paper in my name upon this clause provides for the following arrangements. The object of it is that in the purchase of a holding the purchaser who is inclined to do so shall be permitted to pay one-fourth himself; therefore the Government will only advance three-fourths of the whole purchase money. The State and the local Authority will, in this payment by the purchaser, have substantial guarantee in cash from the purchaser himself. This is an advantage. Again, the landlord, on his side, who is selling, will have to put down or to allocate no guarantee deposit. This is an advantage and will very likely facilitate sales. Again, the tenant in the case which is dealt with by my Amendment will be absolved. I ask Her Majesty's Government to absolve him, if he makes that advance during the whole period of 49 years, from the payment of the county percentage. I think that is a fair request to make. Finally, I think, so far as I have been able to study the financial scheme of Her Majesty's Government, the proposal which is here made does not in any way vitiate the financial scheme, but will work in with it. I therefore ask Her Majesty's Government to accept the Amendment, as in a great many cases it will be availed of in the future—not at first probably, but men will come to see the advantage of it. A man who has money to invest will say he would rather put down his one-fourth, and receive what would be practically 6½ per cent. upon it. Therefore it is quite possible in the long run that great advantage will accrue to the tenant purchasers, while, three-fourths of the money being advanced by the Government, it is an advantage equally to the State.

Moved, in Clause 4, page 3, after line 31, to insert as a new paragraph—

"Provided, nevertheless, that notwithstanding anything in the Land Purchase Acts or this Act, any advance made after the passing of this Act which shall not exceed three-fourths of the price paid for a holding, shall be repaid by an annuity of three pounds fifteen shillings per cent. on the amount of such advance for forty-nine years, and no payment shall be made to the Guarantee Fund by way of county percentage in respect of any such advance."—(The Lord Castletown.)

*EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, I personally, and I think I may say so on the part of the Government, have no objection whatever to the Amendment which the noble Lord has moved. In my opinion it is calculated to encourage purchase on the part of the tenants. I do not know that any appreciable risk would be incurred by adopting the Amendment, and, therefore, I am prepared to assent to it.

Amendment agreed to.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: My Lords, I have an Amendment with regard to the guarantee deposit. The object of this Amendment is to provide, in cases where instalments of annuity are in default and are declared to be irrecoverable by ordinary process of sale in the open market. The owner of the guarantee deposit may elect to have the whole amount of such debt transferred from the deposit to the land purchase account, on condition, of course, that the owner is put in full and immediate possession of the holdings subject to the payment of the annuity. Your Lordships are aware under the Act of 1885 the Land Commission may interfere in those cases, and impound the whole of the guarantee, but the original occupier might still be left in possession. It is true that a nominal charge is created on the holding, and the occupier is required to pay 3 per cent. in addition to his annuity; but I doubt very much whether my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor of Ireland will be able to tell your Lordships of any cases where the tenant has been able to pay off the charge. Under this Clause 4 of the Bill greater advantages are offered to the owner of the guarantee deposit, because in the event of the debt being adjudged irrecoverable only half is taken from the guarantee deposit, the other half will be borne by the guarantee fund. It is quite true it is open to the owner of the guarantee deposit to repurchase the holding in hard cash, but I submit it is hard to ask him to do this, when he has in the hands of the Land Commission land stock for the purpose of meeting such a case as this. I have endeavoured to put the case from the point of view of the owner of the guarantee deposit. It is only optional with him to put it in force, but I should like to put it in the point of view of the public purse. The guarantee fund under my Amendment would be absolutely untouched. Another advantage is that, instead of insolvent, you will get solvent occupiers, and the balance of the guarantee deposit would be left untouched as a safeguard against any possible future default. I have the honour to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Moved, after line 43, to add—

“Where the Land Commission have declared the whole or any part of an instalment of the purchase annuity to be an irrecoverable debt, they shall, on the application of the owner of the guarantee deposit, transfer to the land purchase account, from the guarantee deposit, the full amount of such irrecoverable debt, and put such owner into possession of the holding, subject to the payment of all future instalments of the purchase annuity.”

—(The Lord De Vesce.)

LORD CASTLETOWN: I cannot for myself see how in any way this can militate against what is the immediate object of this Bill, which, as far as I can see, is to create a greater number of solvent landlords. It is quite clear this provision will not come into operation until all the security which the tenant has paid for is exhausted. If that is so, they would be at a deadlock, and it would be a great advantage to the landlord if he would be able to take up the transaction by making himself liable not only for past deficiencies but for those occurring in future. I was much struck by what fell from the noble Marquess at the head of the Government. He said that he hoped that landlordism would still continue in Ireland, and it might be of great importance to a landlord where such a case arose close to his own domain or adjoining his own farm that he should get possession of the property rather than it should lie idle. I trust, therefore, Her Majesty's Government will say that it is in their power to accept the Amendment.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: My Lords, as I understand, the object of this Amendment is to enable the landlord to get into possession of a holding where the debt has been declared irrecoverable without having any processes of public sale or public auction. As I understand, that is the object of the Amendment. It is desired that, when the debt from a purchaser to the Land Commission is declared to be irrecoverable, a landlord whose deposit might be come down upon for a portion of that amount may say to the Land Commission, “I desire to stand in the position of the defaulting purchaser in respect of the irrecoverable debt; I ask to go into possession of the holding, and to become liable for all the instalments.” The object of the Amendment is to do that at once without the intervention of the present machinery of a public sale.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: No, if I may be allowed to explain, it is the sum due. The Land Commissioners will not declare it to be an irrecoverable debt until they have exhausted all means of obtaining payment by public sale. They will then call upon the owner of the guarantee deposit, and state that they will have to impound it.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: Then I am afraid I do not quite follow the objection, because, if this is a procedure after the sale, ex hypothesi there must have been a sale advertised which the landlord could have attended and bid at, where he could have bought in for a less sum than the amount of the debt; and, what is of perhaps greater importance in these proceedings, the public could have seen that it was a perfectly open transaction before the world between the defaulting purchaser, the landlord, and the public, and that if a low price only was bid for the property that was the fortune of the sale, while if on the other hand a substantial sum was bid in advance the State and the landlord as well would get the benefit of it. I do not think it would be expedient in the administration of the Act and in the interest of public policy to substitute for this perfectly open and above-board proceeding one that might become a private one, and one that would probably lead to suspicion, and I do not see that it would be for the benefit of the landlord, in whose interest the Amendment is presented to us by the noble Viscount, because at present they can go into the market and buy at whatever price they can according to the chances of the market, and I think that is an adequate protection.

A noble LORD: Will the noble and learned Lord inform the House whether the guarantee deposit is first of all called upon, or whether the sale is the first protest where the debt is pronounced irrecoverable, because it all hinges upon that.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: All the processes are to be exhausted by procedure against the tenant by sale before the other machinery of the Act comes into operation.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I think the noble and learned Lord is wrong on this point. He has pointed out to your Lordships that the landlord can buy at a less sum than the amount of the debt which is due, but how could he? The Land Commission inevitably bids up the price to the amount of the instalments which are due by the tenant, and therefore it would be impossible for the landlord to buy at a less sum than the amount which is due. I would put this to the noble and learned Lord: Suppose it is an ordinary transaction, if anything valuable is put up for sale by the noble and learned Lord or anybody else, I have no doubt he would himself attend, or would send a representative to bid up the property to its value. The Land Commission is not different in that respect. They will, of course, protect the estate, and I entirely agree with all the noble Lord has said as to the Land Commission having managed admirably under the provisions of the Purchase Act during the six years they have been acting. They have managed extremely well, and they have protected the estates in every way in their power. Under this Amendment, which I hope Her Majesty's Government will see their way to adopt, it is an absolutely simple matter. It only proposes that this shall be done after every means have been exhausted which could be adopted, including sale before the debt became absolutely irrecoverable; that the landlord should have his guarantee deposit—the whole instead of half the guarantee deposit, and should be put into possession of the holding subject to the annuity which is due to the Government. That would place the landlord in possession. It would not prevent him having to attend at the sale and bid against the tenant purchasers, who, I assume, your Lordships are most anxious to encourage. He would only come in if there was no tenant purchaser at all, and I think it is only fair to ask that he should then be put into possession of the holding without all the machinery and expense attaching to a sale. He will have to pay everything that is due to the Government. This is an Amendment which was proposed in another place by an extremely Radical Member. It is not only to protect the guarantee deposit, but to protect the guarantee fund as well; but there is, in addition to the half sum of the guarantee deposit, another half added, which if the Bill were left as it is would come out of the guarantee fund; therefore, I trust Her Majesty's Government will see their way to accept this very reasonable Amendment. It can only come into operation after every other process has been exhausted, and that being so it is only reasonable to ask that the Government should turn to the only purchaser they can find, who is the landlord.

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not profess to understand this matter very deeply, but, as I gather, before being declared irrecoverable every means must be exhausted to recover the debt, one of which means is sale. The noble Marquess says the Land Commissioners will put a price upon it which will not be less than the amount remaining due; but supposing they do not find a purchaser at that price, I apprehend they would still have the sale and make the best terms they could, and if they found they could not get any purchaser at the amount of the instalments remaining due, they would have to take something less.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: They never do take anything less; they are bound to insist upon the whole of the money being paid.

LORD HERSCHELL: If they can get it, no doubt; but if they cannot, they must do their best to sell the property, and I suppose the former landlord then can buy it for less.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Does my noble Friend's proposal mean that if the Land Commissioners buy in, which I do not think is very regular, they will then remain proprietors of the estate, and not sell it?

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: They will certainly attempt to sell it, and will do their best, no doubt; but in certain districts the only possible purchaser will be the landlord.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Then what is the use of the clause?

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: Because it places the landlord in the position of having half the fund taken. It protects the guarantee fund as well as the guarantee deposit.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: As the noble and learned Lord has admitted that they are bound to put up the property at the price of the whole debt, they cannot sell it for less, and it is only after that that they declare it an irrecoverable debt. It is only then that this clause can come into operation when the sale has become an abortive sale. What I wish to put forward is that when the Land Department come to the owner of the deposit and say, "You must either purchase or not and forfeit half of the deposit," he can say, "Do not do that; take it out of the land stock and put me in possession;" but the debt must have been adjudged irrecoverable at first.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I do not think the noble Lord has realised that there must be a sale. That is, a sale which is to get rid of the holder. Anyone can bid at the sale, and the old landlord can go in and buy if he likes. He can bid to the amount of the irrecoverable debt, or as he pleases, and then it is for the Government to say what they will do. But the fact is, the landlord can go in and buy. He becomes the purchaser, and it is sold to him. It may be a question of practice and procedure, but I know of nothing to prevent its being done.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: I doubt very much whether he is allowed to tender land stock under the clause. If he goes into the open market he should be in a position to say, "I offer you the land stock which is in the hands of the Commission," but that the Bill does not allow.

Amendment negatived.

Verbal Amendments made.

*THE EARL OF KINGSTON: My Lords, I have an Amendment upon this clause to insert a new section. I do not think it will be necessary for me to say more than a few words upon the Amendment which stands in my name, because I believe that your Lordships will see it is necessary, not to say vital, to the whole working of the Bill in certain districts in Ireland. Some of your Lordships may be aware, though others may perhaps not be so well aware, that in Ireland there is a considerable mining interest. There are large fields of coal, large deposits of iron ore, which under actual experiment and analysis has been proved to be second to none, if not superior, perhaps, to any iron ore in the United Kingdom. Besides the coal and iron there are extensive quarries of granite and limestone; and there is also fireclay in large quantities; but I will not impose upon your Lordships a list of what there has been discovered, and certainly not of what has not been discovered; but we may take it that hidden under the surface of Ireland there are probably many millions' worth of mineral products. Those districts where the minerals occur are scattered pretty widely over the whole of Ireland. They exist in the north, in the south, and in the west, and I have had a hint that, to some extent, they exist also in the east. I think I am correct in saying that in those mining districts the population is pretty thick, so to speak, and chiefly composed of small tenant farmers, all of whom would come under the action of this Bill which every Member of this House is so anxious to see passed—and not only passed, but to see it become a success and a blessing to Ireland. But a difficulty arises in the fact that owners of land will be quite unwilling to part with it unless their mining rights be reserved to them. They understand perfectly well that those mining rights grow. They are perhaps not very valuable at the present moment, they may not perhaps be very valuable to themselves, even in the future, yet they may be very valuable to the district. At present they may not gain very much by the possession of those rights; but in the future they or their successors may hope to do so; and they know perfectly well that, if they part with their lands and the rights in connection with them, what may be useless enough to them now would be perfectly and utterly useless to the purchasers, because it would be impossible to suppose that any company formed either by local enterprise, or, what would be still better, by the introduction of English capital into Ireland, would be, if I may so term it, mad enough to attempt to prospect or to develop any mining industry, if they had to face the necessity of buying the right of mining from perhaps some hundreds of small owners. It is difficult enough even now, I am told, to get mining leases from owners under present circumstances. ~ Now, I will say very little more about the Amendment; but what we ask is that the mining rights should be reserved to the vendor in the agreement of sale, and in such a manner that those rights may be shown on the face of the vesting order. The other rights which are mentioned in the Amendment I will not touch upon, because some of them have been reserved under the existing law, and others may be reserved by the consent of the Land Commission. I believe that to negative this Amendment would be to put a fatal stumbling-block in the way of the operation of this Bill in Ireland in certain mining districts which I have mentioned; and the result would be one of two evils: first, to cause the failure of the measure by owners refusing to sell; or, if they did sell, and the Act did succeed in its operation, then you would debar for ever any local enterprise, and prevent the offer of any inducement to the entrance of English capital. Those two things—local enterprise and English capital—are what are most wanted in Ireland. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Moved, after Clause 6, to insert as a new clause—

“The vesting order shall be binding upon all persons claiming any estate or interest in the land comprised in the holding, including Her Majesty the Queen, and shall be effectual to vest in the purchaser, and charge the purchase annuity on, the fee-simple and inheritance of the holding described in the order, subject to such exceptions and reservations (if any) in favour of the landlord or any other person, as to mines, timber, and fishery or other rights or easements, as may be specified in the order, in pursuance of the agreements, or otherwise, and subject to any public rights affecting the same, and to the provisions of the section respecting the tenants' interest, and respecting easements, but to save as aforesaid, discharged from all estates, charges, interests, and encumbrances whatsoever, as well of Her Majesty as of all other persons whomsoever.”—(The Earl of Kingston.)

*EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, the chief objections that I entertain against the new clause which the noble Lord has moved is that it is really absolutely unnecessary. The noble Lord moves to insert in the Bill that the landlord may make reservations, and they may appear in the vesting order; but that can be done under the present law, and therefore there appears to be no reason for inserting a clause to that effect in this Bill. That is done under Section 8 of the Ashbourne Act. By that section all rights are reserved, and the Ashbourne Act, it is provided here, is to be read in with this Act. Therefore I think this clause is unnecessary, and I hope the noble Lord will not press it.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I should like to ask the noble Lord why, if this clause is unnecessary, it was introduced in the Land Department Bill which was brought forward, though I am sorry it did not come to very much, in another place. If it was unnecessary, why did the Government introduce it there? I myself think it is necessary. I think there ought to be powers given to the landlords to reserve all these different rights. Your Lordships are aware that over a great part of Ireland where these purchases have taken place the tenants have been cutting down timber in the most frightful way. Members of your Lordships' House cannot but be aware what happens to a country which becomes denuded of its timber; and when £33,000,000 of property has been bought in the country I believe the whole of the timber in Ireland, or almost all of it, will be swept away. This clause would enable the landlords, by agreement with their tenants, to reserve timber, fishery, and other rights; and I think it is a reasonable clause to be inserted. Of course, if the noble Earl can point out to me that it is really reserved under the Act of 1885, and I can obtain a legal opinion from the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor of Ireland)—he ought to know all about it, for it is his own Act—I will be satisfied; but I do not believe it is there; for, if it had been there, I am quite certain the Chief Secretary would not have introduced this section into his Land Department Bill.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: The noble Lord has said that this proposed clause would only enable it to be done by agreement; but I do not so read the clause. The words are, "By agreement or otherwise," which I confess I do not understand.

A noble LORD: I might perhaps be allowed to say, as Chairman of a Commission which dealt with these matters, that we examined very competent witnesses, who stated that under the existing law these rights had been reserved to the landlord.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: The position of the matter, I think, is this: The noble Lord who has moved this Amendment has taken it from a portion of another Bill introduced by Government last year. The noble Lord leaves out a certain part of the context which precedes and follows it. That will be found, I think, to be the case; and one of the objections to it is that he has taken it out in such a way as to put the recovery of Crown and quit rents in a very precarious position. In the Bill from which the Amendment is taken there was a clause to transfer the obligation of paying Crown and quit rents out of the purchase money. That shows the great difficulty and danger of attempting to add largely to such a Bill as this by taking clauses out of another Bill; because it is quite impossible to add largely to this Bill by such a process. My noble Friend, the Lord Privy Seal, indicated that a great portion of this clause could be worked out quite independently of this provision under the existing law; and I think that is a perfectly accurate statement, because if the landlord is owner of these rights before he makes this agreement, it would be perfectly competent for him to deal with them as he might think proper. Certainly I do not think it either expedient or wise now to overload the Bill by putting in a clause of this description, which would undoubtedly require additions in order to enable it to be worked out, and which would constitute a complicated code; and it might be possible that those additions could hardly be made here, having regard to the privileges of the other House of Parliament.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: This clause seems of very little importance to many Irishmen at present, because so few minerals have been found that are workable in Ireland; but all those Peers who come from mineral districts must know that very valuable minerals may, exceeding the value of the land itself, have been discovered; and when the properties have been sold the mineral rights, having been retained, have produced large fortunes to others than the holders of the land. In Scotland I know that to have been the case. It has happened in Ayrshire, and I know in that way minerals of very large value have been retained, and are now being got by one person while the ownership of the land lies in another. I think the noble Lords on the Front Bench do not object to this; but, on the other hand, the noble and learned Lord who spoke last does not tell us quite clearly that the landlords selling under this Bill have any facility for retaining those mineral rights. I think if the noble Lord (Earl Cadogan) would tell my noble Friend here that he will introduce a clause himself which shall make the minerals perfectly safe, so that they shall not be sold with the land, that would quite satisfy the fair and just desires which he conveys in this proposed addition to the clause.

Amendment negatived.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: My Lords, I have got another Amendment on the Paper for the insertion of a new clause here, and this Amendment, I may say, was taken very largely from the Government Land Department Bill. I sincerely trust, as my noble Friend has rejected one Amendment, he will not reject this Amendment as well. I have altered it in one respect, and I had better describe to your Lordships what the Amendment is. Under the Ashbourne Acts there was power for a landlord, and that power was very fairly given, to recover 4 per cent. on the purchase money pending the time that the sale was passing through. If a landlord had not that power, he naturally could not have sold, because some of these sales take two years and more. It is a very lengthy thing to prove title in Ireland, and therefore the landlord had power while the sale was being carried out to collect 4 per cent. on the purchase money. That was pending the completion of the sale. The tenant then came under what I may call rent or interest to the Government, but if there was not a clause in the Act of Parliament enabling him to collect that 4 per cent., he would have been out of pocket from the time of the arrangement for the sale being made until such time as his lawyers, who would be carrying it through, should enable him to complete. There was great difficulty found about collecting this interest. The tenants refused to pay, particularly where they had impoverished landlords, and the procedure was very expensive. You had to proceed to recover the debt as if you were an ordinary debtor, and it was very easy for the tenants to avoid those liabilities. I am sorry to tell your Lordships that many landlords who sold, hoping to better themselves, have put themselves in a worse position. They are very much worse off, because they have been a long time in getting the purchase money paid over to them, and during the whole of the time they have been unable to collect the interest from the tenants. You will remember that the landlord has ceased to be a landlord. I do not know that landlords in Ireland are able to collect rents very freely, but they are able to collect them better than they collect these debts. Now this proposal which was brought forward by Her Majesty's Government in the Land Department Bill merely arranges that the Land Commission should collect this interest. Your Lordships must know it must naturally become due, and it cannot be said to be an excessive interest, because the Land Commissioners would send down to value the holding. They would not sanction it if they found that the tenant could not provide sufficient security, and therefore you may naturally imagine that the interest would be reasonable interest. It would be materially lower than the old rent. It must be at least 20 per cent. lower if the tenant buys at 17 years' purchase. I am sure your Lordships and Her Majesty's Government will not stand in the way of this absolutely fair charge. Nobody can say that the late tenant does not owe it, or that he objects to its being collected by Her Majesty's Government. I have put in a clause here—perhaps it was rather wrong for me to interfere with a Bill drafted by Her Majesty's Government—but I have put in a clause which I think will be fairer, not, I may say, to the landlord, but to the tenant. This clause provides that if the landlord creates delay—which is sometimes the case, for if landlords do not their lawyers very often do—the interest after two years shall be reduced to three instead of four per cent., and it provides that the extra 1 per cent. shall be supplied by them in payment or reduction of any instalment of purchase money falling due by the tenant. That is, to my mind, a fair proposal, and I hope Her Majesty's Government will see their way to accept it.

Moved, after Clause 6, to insert the following new Clause:—

"(1) Where, after the commencement of this Act, the Land Commission shall sanction an advance under the Land Purchase Acts for enabling a tenant to purchase his holding from his landlord, the tenant shall not be liable for rent accruing after the previous gale day for the rent; but the tenant shall not be liable to pay interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum on the purchase money as from that gale day until the first gale day for the payment of purchase annuities which occurs after the date of the vesting order; and for the purposes of this section the previous gale day for the rent shall be the gale day next before the sanction of the advance, or, if the advance is made on a gale day, then that gale day. (2) The said interest shall be payable to the Land Commission half-yearly, on the first days of May and November, and shall be recovered by them as if it were an instalment of a purchase annuity charged on the holding, and when received shall, after deducting expenses, be paid by them to the landlord or other person entitled thereto. Provided, however, that the landlord shall only be entitled to receive interest at 3 per cent. on the purchase money, after the expiration of two years from the gale day preceding the sanction of the advance; and the difference of 1 per cent. (after deducting expenses therefrom) shall be thenceforward retained by the Land Commission, when received from the tenant, until the application is disposed of. If the vesting order is ultimately refused such 1 per cent. (less expenses) shall be paid over to the landlord, who shall allow credit to the tenant for same as if it were on account of rent paid by him; but if the vesting order be ultimately made the excess over 3 per cent. which the Land Commission may have received from the tenant as aforesaid shall (after deducting expenses) be applied by them in payment or reduction of any instalments of the purchase annuity falling due by the tenant after the making of the vesting order. (3) If the vesting order is refused the agreement for sale shall become void, or if the agreement has become void from any other cause the tenant shall be liable to pay his rent in like manner as if the agreement had never been made; but any sum paid to the Land Commission for interest by the tenant in pursuance of this section shall be allowed by the landlord to the tenant as if it were on account of rent paid. (4) Every vesting order made after the commencement of this Act on a sale by a landlord to a tenant under the Land Purchase Acts as regards any holding shall vest the holding in the purchaser, and charge it with the purchase annuity, and the first instalment of such annuity shall, if the vesting order is made on a gale day for the payment of purchase annuities, be paid on the next such gale day, and in any other case be paid on the second such gale day, which occurs after the making of the vesting order."—(The Marquess of Waterford.)

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

*EARL CADOGAN: I am bound to confess, when the noble Marquess first put his Amendment on the Paper, I should have found some difficulty in accepting it, but the addition which he has made in the paragraph beginning "provided however that the landlord," which he has very clearly described in our view, takes away the main objections to his clause. It is quite obvious, if it may be said without offence, that if there had been no such provision for lowering the interest it would have been to the advantage of any unscrupulous landlord, supposing there be any such in Ireland, to prolong and delay the completion of purchases. Under those circumstances, I am glad the noble Marquess had drafted the final paragraph, and with that addition we are prepared to accept it. There is a paragraph at the end of the noble Marquess's Amendment beginning with the word "notwithstanding." I do not know whether he includes that.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I may tell the noble Earl that I put these Amendments on the Paper as two separate clauses or sections, but I was informed by the Clerk at the Table that it was proper that they should be put down as one.

THE CHAIRMAN (the Earl of MORLEY): As I understand, there are two clauses moved. One is Clause A, which I will put first, and then comes Clause B, which I will put afterwards.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: Quite so. It is Clause A that I am moving now.

Amendment agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD Then, my Lord, comes the next Amendment which the noble Earl has called Clause B. By the Act of 1887 there was a power given to the Commissioners to issue a vesting order without the landlord having proved his title. Your Lordships may not, perhaps, have followed what a vesting order is. A vesting order places the purchaser in absolute possession at once. It never can be rescinded, and a landlord who has become a vendor might be in this position: he might have agreed for a sale with his tenant, and the Commission, acting upon that agreement, might issue a vesting order placing the tenant purchaser in possession; but, after all this had been done, other claimants might come forward. The landlord has not proved his title, remember; and if anybody else comes forward to claim the purchase money, or if the landlord does not succeed in proving his title, the money would be hung up, and yet he would not receive back his holding. He would have parted with his property in the land, and would not have received the purchase money for it. We thought, therefore, it would be very fair if Her Majesty's Government would agree to put in this clause merely with regard to the vesting order, and say it should be made after the investigation of title. The whole Amendment that I want to have made really hangs upon that—that the vesting order shall not be made until after the landlord's title has been investigated, because we hold that it would materially affect the landlords and prevent their selling, if they desired afterwards, so that there might be the chance of their parting with their land and receiving nothing in lieu of it. I do not think many of your Lordships would part with land on those conditions, and I do not believe that Irish landlords would be inclined to do so. I therefore hope the noble Earl will accept this Amendment, because I think it really only turns on the investigation of title before the vesting order is made out.

Moved, to insert also after the Clause last inserted, the following Clause:—

“Notwithstanding anything in any of the Land Purchase Acts, every sale agreed to be made under the provisions of the Land Purchase Acts, instead of being carried into effect by conveyance or assignment, shall be carried into effect by vesting order in the prescribed form: but no vesting order shall be made by the Land Commission until after due investigation of title, and, being satisfied therewith, unless with the consent of the vendor.”—(The Marquess of Waterford.)

*EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, I am quite willing to accept the first portion of the Amendment which the noble Marquess has moved, certainly down to the word “form” in the fifth line of the paragraph, but I am not able to agree to the further provision that no vesting order shall be made by the Land Commission until after due investigation of title. I think it would necessitate an undue delay. There appear to be many reasons for ensuring that the vesting order should be made as quickly as possible if the agreement has been sanctioned, and if I may refer the noble Marquess to the previous part of his Amendment by which he provides that the Land Commission are to undertake the collection of the interest during those earlier years, surely it is in the interest of the noble Marquess and his friends themselves that the order should be made as soon as possible. Therefore, I hope he will agree to the omission from his Amendment, after the word “form,” of the rest of the paragraph. I would also point out that the last line of this Amendment only requires to be read in order for the House to see that it would be impossible to accept it. It runs thus—and then comes a pregnant proviso—

that is to say, a landlord with a bad title who might naturally be disinclined might give his consent, and I think your Lordships would hardly be inclined to agree with that proviso. I trust, therefore, that the noble Marquess will be satisfied if we take his Amendment down to the word “form.”

LORD HERSCHELL: I should like to ask, before that Amendment is put, what the reason is for preventing the transaction being carried out by conveyance if both parties so desire? It seems to me this section is intended to prevent it even if both parties should desire that to be done.

*EARL CADOGAN: The answer, I think, to the noble and learned Lord's question is that the conveyance would not give an indefeasible title, and the vesting order would do so.

A noble LORD: I should like to ask the noble and learned Lord what position the landlord would be in supposing possession were given of a certain farm and yet he is unable to prove his title? It seems to me that he would either have to lose his money or his farm.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: He ought not to have done it.

*EARL CADOGAN: He would have his rights against the purchaser.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I suppose under the existing Act, which is to be read with this, there is an established practice about the investigation of title, and if there is I do not understand why at present you should add anything to that.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: The existing system of purchase has been found to work very smoothly and satisfactorily, and those who are most conversant with the Act and its working desire that the machinery should be by vesting order, which has worked well and cheaply hitherto without any hitch or inconvenience. As has been mentioned by the noble Lord, the landlord enters into the agreement with his eyes open; the Land Commission, who have a good staff of capable lawyers to advise them, make the vesting orders, and no hitch has taken place hitherto. Of course, the purchase money is there to take the place of the land, and the landlord is there, too.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: In answer to the noble and learned Lord (the Earl of Selborne) who asked a question, I may perhaps say that I believe the Land Commission have not made these vesting orders in any number before the investigation of title. I myself have sold perhaps as largely as any landlord in Ireland, and there never was such an idea in my mind as parting with my property before the title had been investigated. I can quite understand the noble and learned Lord asking the question, because I think it would horrify anybody to imagine that a man should be placed in the position of having parted with his property, and yet that it should be absolutely impossible for him to obtain the purchase money.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: What I cannot understand is why it should be assumed that the vesting order will be made before there has been such an investigation of title, as there ought to be, or why it should make any difference whether there is a vesting order or a conveyance. In substance, I presume that the course, as to investigation of title, will be the same as under the existing Act.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: There is a clause in the Act of 1885 allowing vesting orders to be made after investigation of title; but this clause in the Act of 1887 was, I know, purposely put in to enable the vesting order to be made without an investigation of title. I do not think the noble Earl could have been in the House when that clause was passed. I am quite certain I was not, or I should certainly have objected to it. I am afraid I cannot accept the noble Earl's suggestion. Instead of leaving out the words which he suggests should be omitted, I would rather omit the whole section.

*EARL CADOGAN: I cannot accept the latter portion of it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 6, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I now move to leave out, in Clause 7, the words "the interest which the tenant agrees to buy in," and I do so for this reason: Those words do not appear in the Act originally; they are not in my noble and learned Friend's Acts—that is the Ashbourne Acts—and they will cause the most terrible mischief in the tenants' minds in Ireland. Your Lordships are aware that a tenant at the present time purchases under the existing Ashbourne Acts. He pays to the landlord so many years' purchase upon the rent, and in the Definition Clause, Section 36, your Lordships will see it is arranged that the annual value is to be assessed upon that rent, with certain provisions; but here there are brought into the Bill words which are absolutely unnecessary, and which will only create the utmost confusion in the minds of the tenants, and will be a fruitful source of trouble. The tenant, no doubt, buys the landlord's interest. It is true that the landlord's interest is not very exorbitant now in any holding; but it is supposed to be rent which the tenant pays, and that rent has generally been carved down to an uncommonly low figure under the Act of 1881. Still, that is what the tenant buys. Now, why bring in his interest? What will be the result of it? I do not think that some of your Lordships know Irish tenants as well as I do, but an Irish tenant is the most litigious man in the world. He will, when purchasing—I will suppose from one of your Lordships—arrange as at a price to be fixed and ascertained upon his rent. He will find that he gets a large reduction, and he will be perfectly satisfied; but some attorney, who thinks he can make a little money out of the transaction, will point out to him these words, and say, "You have never had your interest ascertained; what have you bought at?" And the tenant will say, "I bought at the landlord's rent." Says the attorney, "Well, your interest ought to have been deducted from the rent before you purchased." Those are the words in Clause 36, which will come hereafter, and, therefore, I will not refer to them now. I do really beseech Her Majesty's Government to accept this Amendment. I have sold thousands upon thousands of acres of property, as I may say, over the table, to these tenants, and I know exactly what they do. They come to me and ask, "What is to be the rent." That is the question. Of course, they mean the instalments to be paid to the Government, and they come with no other idea in the world. But if they have this before them they will say, "Before we fix what I am to pay you must take off something for what my grandfather did; my grandfather made so many drains, my father made so many fences, I have built so many houses, and all these things must be ascertained." At least they will try to ascertain them. But they would not be ascertained in the Court, because that has nothing to do with them, and under Clause 36, with regard to the tenant's interest, when the application goes into the Land Commission, what will happen? The Land Commission is to ascertain and define "the annual value." There the words appear in the clause again. What will the tenants do? They will write up to the Land Commission and press them to death to define the tenant's interest, because they will say, "We have purchased at a certain price, but we have never had our interest ascertained; this Bill points out that our interest is to be defined." I say it is absolutely useless. And let me point out to your Lordships another thing: there are certain clauses which, after a time, will invite repudiation, though those clauses come later. What will happen with regard to this is that the tenant who becomes pressed will say, "I have paid so much for my holding, but have never had my interest ascertained;" and, therefore, he will repudiate his payments, and will give that as a reason. It was pointed out in another place that the tenant ought to have his interest ascertained before he purchased. The tenant does not buy his own interest; he only buys his landlord's interest; and I hope the noble Earl will not lay up such a frightful store of trouble for the Land Commissioners to deal with.

Moved, in page 7, lines 21 and 22, to leave out ("the interest which the tenant agrees to buy in.")—(The Marquess of Waterford.)

*EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, if the acceptance of this Amendment would prevent the "laying up a frightful store of trouble," as the noble Marquess has said, I confess I am very much prejudiced in favour of accepting it, and I may at once say that the Government are prepared to accept the Amendment of the noble Marquess. I think I ought to state at once the reason why the words were inserted with regard to the interest which the tenant agrees to buy is that the holding, as bought by the tenant, is a holding, the interest in part of which already belongs to the tenant, and that is the reason why, as a mere matter of drafting, it was necessary to put in "the interest which the tenant agrees to buy," because it was part of that interest which he has agreed to purchase. I do not think the Amendment of so much importance as the noble Marquess appears to think is to be attached to it, but I am prepared to accept it.

LORD HERSCHELL: Would it not need some little alteration? because if these words are left out it will be simply twenty times the annual value "as in this Act defined," and there is no such definition.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: The definition will have to be amended.

LORD HERSCHELL: What I was going to suggest was, would it not be better to put "the annual value of the holding as in this Act defined"?

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: There is a definition in Clause 36.

*EARL CADOGAN: The noble Marquess will find the definition there.

LORD HERSCHELL: But the clause gives a definition which is the thing to be struck out; that is "the annual interest of the tenant in the holding," which the noble Marquess objects to. That is going to be left out, and of course the definition must be made to agree with the clause. It is only the annual value of the holding. I simply desire to make the two things correspond.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: We can consider that when we come to the Definition Clauses.

*EARL CADOGAN: While we are upon this I should like to have the point which has been raised by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell) cleared up. Surely the words with regard to "twenty times the annual value" apply to the holding "as in this Act defined." There we have the holding mentioned again.

LORD HERSCHELL: But when you have a Definition Clause it is desirable to have the very words in the section itself. If you do not have the words in the section as defined exactly the same there may be a question about it afterwards. However, it can be amended at a later stage.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: By my Amendment I leave out those words, "the interest which the tenant agrees to pay," but I leave in the word "holding."

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: It will be very easy to make the clause agree with the definition as amended, on Report; therefore, it is not worth while, I think, to discuss it now.

*EARL CADOGAN: There is just one slight amendment which I think ought to be made. It ought to read "the annual value of the holding as in this Act defined." I beg to move that the words "as in this Act defined" stand part of the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is also moved that the words "the interest which the tenant agrees to buy in" should be omitted.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I beg pardon for interrupting, but I understood there was a prior Amendment by the noble Earl in charge of the Bill to put in the word "holding" after "annual value" in line 21.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already omitted those words. It will, I assure you, come exactly to the same thing. The question is to omit the words "the interest which the tenant agrees to buy in."

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: If I may be excused, it will not read in that form. It will read "the annual value the holding." That will not do. You must put in "of," otherwise it will be perfect nonsense.

THE CHAIRMAN: It will read "the annual value of the holding as in this Act defined."

*EARL CADOGAN: I think the only difference between us now is that the word "of" has not been supplied.

THE CHAIRMAN: The word "of" is already in the clause.

*EARL CADOGAN: Yes, it is in another place.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Before the Committee leaves the consideration of this Sub-section 1, I should like to call your Lordships' attention to the principle of annual value which is laid down in the sub-section as the basis upon which all the calculations of the payments to be made by the purchaser are fixed. I think there are objections to this principle of annual value, and I think it would be easy to substitute a more clear and a more definite principle upon which you might base the payments to be made by the tenant. What is the annual value? That is defined, as your Lordships will find, in Clause 36, the Definition Clause. It is as follows:—

"The annual sum which at the date of the application for an advance under the Land Purchase Acts, is the rent of the holding in respect of which the advance is made after deducting therefrom the average amount of abatement allowed by the landlord, the average amount payable by the landlord during the five years next before such date for poor rate and Grand Jury Cess and for Tithe Rent-charge."

Then annual value is a thing which might have to be settled by the Land Commissioners. It will influence those three calculations, and until those calculations are made no intending purchaser or vendor can know what the annual value means. That, then, is the first objection which I think there is to accepting the principle of annual value; the tenant who intends to purchase his holding cannot sit down and say, "Well, I know I have to make a certain payment for so many years; I am told by the Act that I shall have to make a payment for the first five years of 80 per cent. upon the annual value of the holding; I do not know what that annual value is, and, moreover, I cannot know until the Land Commissioners have had time to make these calculations." But one of the elements is the amount of the abatement which has been made by the landlord during the five years preceding. It is conceivable—I do not say it is probable at all, but it is conceivable—that the landlord and tenant might perfectly well agree between themselves for the purposes connected with the Insurance Fund to represent these abatements as being of considerably larger amount than they really were. In that case the calculation of the annual value would be very considerably affected. The second objection there is to this principle is that it would throw a large amount of work on the Land Commission. The Land Commission would have to determine in every single case of sale these items in order to be able to inform the purchaser what the annual value is. The principle which I would suggest to your Lordships is also to be found in the Bill. It is to substitute for "annual value," "rateable value." If your Lordships will look at the definition of rateable value on the same page, in the paragraph just preceding, it says—

"The expression 'rateable value' when used in relation to any hereditament or area means the annual rateable value under the Irish Valuation Acts of such hereditament or of the hereditaments comprised in such area."

The Poor Law valuation is a thing which is perfectly well known to everybody in Ireland, and if the intending purchaser wishes to know what he has got to pay, he has merely to look at the Valuation Roll and he will know that he has to make a payment which will not exceed 80 per cent. of that valuation; and therefore he obtains, without the necessity of consulting the Land Commissioners or anybody else, the means of finding out what obligation he would be under if he were to endeavour to complete the purchase. This suggestion does not at all proceed, I may say, from myself, but from persons who have been connected with the working of these Acts, and in their opinion the substitution of the words "rateable value" for "annual value" would be a very great advantage for the reasons which I have given to your Lordships. I have not put it down as an Amendment; but if that opinion should find any favour in the House I shall propose an Amendment when this Bill is reported, and in the meantime I should be very glad to have the general opinion of the Government upon this point as to the necessity of retaining the words "annual value."

*EARL CADOGAN: I do not understand that the noble Lord has any Amendment on the Paper in accordance with the remarks he has just made; and I would suggest to him that it would be generally more advisable that he should defer any further discussion on the point he has raised until he moves the Amendment which I understand he intends to do on Report. More than that, I hope the noble Lord will allow me to say that I think the discussion would come more properly under Clause 36 than under this clause. Under this clause the words occur accidentally, and I think the discussion had better be taken under the later clause.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I am perfectly content.

Verbal Amendments agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: My Lords, there are two more Amendments here, one of which, of course, I must take first, but they are both on the same lines in Clause 7. I troubled your Lordships the other night with some remarks upon these calamity clauses, which I am afraid will cause terrible confusion, because they invite the Irish tenant to create the calamities. The Irish tenant is never backward in taking hold of such invitation. Under the Ashbourne Acts there was no such clause, and that is the reason why the Ashbourne Acts have worked so marvellously well. Your Lordships have taken credit to yourselves for the way in which the Ashbourne Acts have worked. Her Majesty's Government, both in this House and in another place, have taken credit to themselves for the brilliant way in which those Acts have been carried out; but why have they worked so well? Because the tenant purchasers understood that they were to be paid for the value. They quite understood that there was a very great difference between paying to the Government and paying to the landlord, because the Government would allow no arrears. It was understood by them and indelibly impressed upon their minds; but once you put in these clauses you practically say to the tenant purchasers "you have only got to show under this clause that you have suffered some loss;" if, for instance, any individual purchaser has lost a cow, or has come under distress, or has had sickness in his family, or anything of the sort, he is not to pay his annuity, but it is to be deducted from his Insurance Fund. I am sorry to say that I am afraid many peasant proprietors who have purchased under the Ashbourne Acts, and paid their instalments regularly, will be induced by these clauses to find out that they have come under some terrible calamity, and not only that—not only will it prevent the working of this Bill when it becomes an Act—but it will have the most disastrous effects in other ways. I shall not detain your Lordships upon this point, because I tried to explain it pretty fully to the House the other night. It is not a very complicated point. Your Lordships know what Irish tenants are. They are the pleasantest people to live with and to deal with in the world as long as you do not ask them to pay you any rent; but when you do that they are not so pleasant. They used to be as pleasant as possible, even when you asked them to pay rent, but I do not think they are quite so pleasant now, though they are getting pleasanter under that operation every day, thanks to the action of the Chief Secretary. I hope Her Majesty's Government will accept this Amendment, for it will save them terrible trouble in the future, and particularly in another place where every Irish Member will be asking questions on the subject. If Pat so-and-so has not been allowed to take certain money out of his Insurance Fund, the amount of correspondence that will go on between the House of Commons and Dublin Castle on such matters will be something terrible to contemplate. I hope, therefore Her Majesty's Government will agree to the omission of this section.

Moved, in page 8, line 27, to leave out Sub-section (6). — (The Lord Tyrone [Marquess of Waterford].)

*EARL CADOGAN: I am very sorry the noble Marquess has shown by the proposal contained in this Amendment that he intends to carry into effect the opinions he expressed in the Debate on the Second Reading. Her Majesty's Government, rightly or wrongly, are of opinion that in any legislation of that sort it is of the very highest importance that some provision should be made against cases of exceptional calamity and distress in Ireland. That is a policy which they have laid down, and from which they have no intention of departing; and I am only sorry the noble Marquess does not see the necessity of some such course being adopted. I think it might, perhaps, to some extent soften the asperity with which the noble Marquess looks on legislation of this sort if he would thoroughly realise, as perhaps he does, though I do not gather it from his remarks, that this matter is not at all a question between landlord and tenant. It is a provision as between the State and the tenant. Under the present law, as your Lordships are aware, there is no provision, as I have said before, for temporary calamity or distress, and the Land Commissioners, without some provision of this sort, would have no option but to sell the tenant up; and in that case it is possible to conceive that one year of potato famine might destroy practically the whole object and effect of the Bill. This is a matter which we conceive to be one of policy, and which we also adhere to as of extreme importance. I have little to add to that. It enables the tenant to borrow from his insurance money in case of need; and I am bound to say, inasmuch as it does not interfere in any way with the relations between landlord and tenant, I think the noble Marquess's argument falls to the ground, that is to say, that it will provide the tenant another means of being in arrear with his payments to his landlord. I am afraid it is impossible for me to accept the Amendment proposed.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: My Lords, I would venture to appeal to the noble Marquess not to persist in this Amendment, that is to say, not to leave out this sub-section. It is, as the noble Earl has pointed out, purely a matter between the purchaser and the Land Commission. The only thing that is impounded is his insurance money; and it is only in exceptional cases that the person himself would be affected. He might lose his cattle, and this provision would then become very valuable. I am bound to say I shall support the noble Marquess in regard to the succeeding clause if he divides the House upon it; but that is a different matter.

LORD CASTLETOWN: I would also appeal to the noble Marquess not to press this Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I will not trouble your Lordships with a Division upon this particular clause, but I should like to answer one point which has been raised by the noble Earl. He states that if there were a potato famine it would be very hard to have to sell a man up; but that could be dealt with by another clause. This clause is only to deal with insurance. In answer to the noble Lords who have asked me not to divide on this point, I think they are not quite accurate as to the effect of this clause, because, as my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal states, it is not only a question between the landlord and tenant, but it goes much deeper. It is a question between the State and the tenants I should say. Still, I think the landlord comes in in this way; he is to provide a guarantee deposit of one-fifth, and if the tenant runs in arrear, as I say this clause will encourage him to do, the result will be that the landlord's security will be lost. I think these calamity clauses are most dangerous with regard to the future security of the landlord's claim, because, as we know what the state of a tenant is who gets into arrear, if he once gets into arrear, if he once gets into debt he gets hopeless and helpless, and gradually goes down an inclined plane, and ends by repudiating his debt altogether. As I stated just now, the Ashbourne Acts have worked splendidly, and if my noble Friend can state at the end of six years that this Bill has worked anything like as well as the Ashbourne Acts, I shall be quite satisfied; but I can tell him that the reason they have worked so well is because they have no such clause in them. I shall not trouble your Lordships to divide on this clause, although I think I shall have to trouble the House to go to a Division on the next one, unless the noble Earl agrees with me that it is, as I consider it to be, an absolutely necessary Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Verbal Amendment made.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: My Lords, I move now to omit Sub-section 7 of Clause 7. I think Her Majesty's Government, although, as my noble Friend opposite said, it was perhaps reasonable for them to refuse my other Amendment for the omission of the other sub-section, will consider that my Amendment with regard to this sub-section is really necessary, because the operation of this sub-section will be far worse. It not only induces individuals but a whole countryside to create calamities. It is a curious provision, and I desire to particularly call your Lordships' attention to it. It is a very peculiar division indeed that is put in here, because it provides—and I think your Lordships will agree it is a most extraordinary provision—that the tenants are to borrow from the Reserve Fund in order to enable them to pay the Government what is due. I have placed my objections before your Lordships as well as I could already as to these calamity clauses, and I can only repeat that I think they will be a terrible bugbear to any Government in the future. I am certain that they will be most injurious; they will invite tenants in large districts to create bogus potato famines, and not only that, as I stated to your Lordships the other night, they will also invite the tenants who are still liable to the landlords to join these purchasers. It will be found that they will not be backward in joining the purchasers for the purpose of creating what may be called a calamity under this clause in the district. I hope Her Majesty's Government will think better of it at the last moment, and agree to amend the clause in this particular, because I am forced to say that if they do not I shall be obliged to divide the House upon it. I hope those Peers who are connected with Ireland will follow me if we are obliged to divide the House, because by doing so they will be able to take credit to themselves in the future for having prevented Ireland having ten times more calamities, and ten times more famines than she has ever had in the past.

I therefore move to reject that subsection.

Moved, in pages 8 and 9, line 42, to leave out Sub-sections (7.) and (8.)—(The Lord Tyrone [Marquess of Waterford].)

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, I have very few words to say in suggesting to the House that the proposal of the noble Marquess shall not be accepted. The clause seems to have all the safeguards which, at all events, such a case will admit of. It does not depend upon the action of individuals, or any number of individuals, but as your Lordships see, it must appear to the Lord Lieutenant and not to him only, but it must be shown by a Report of the Land Commission and of the Local Government Board, that there is exceptional agricultural calamity existing, and then this clause will operate. I will not enter into the question whether there might be arguments urged against putting any provision of this kind into a Bill of this description, rather than leaving such a state of circumstances to be dealt with whenever it may arise. I do not deny that there are reasons of weight against excepting such a state of agricultural distress or calamity as is contemplated here from the general operation of the Bill; but what I want to put to your Lordships is this: the Government upon their own responsibility, and in what they have considered the best interests of this measure, and of the country, have thought it best to provide for such a state of circumstances; and we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that it is not an imaginary state of circumstances or one which could be created in a fictitious way; it is a state of circumstances which, as we all know, has occurred before, and may, unfortunately, occur again: and after the Government have put in a clause providing for that state of circumstances and the House of Commons has passed it, I cannot but think that the evils which would follow from your Lordships rejecting it are much more certain and serious than any which can result from its adoption.

*EARL SPENCER: I should like to say a few words upon this Amendment, as I have considerable sympathy with the noble Marquess in the proposal he has made. Everybody who has to deal with the Government of Ireland will know perfectly what enormous pressure may be brought to bear upon the Government on particular occasions and I confess I should be glad to see less mention of the Lord Lieutenant and the exercise of his discretion, for I know full well what an enormous amount of pressure can be brought to bear upon him. I remember the case of the seed rate, which was imposed in 1882. There was considerable difficulty in some parts of Ireland in collecting it. I received deputations on the subject, and I had great difficulty in resisting the prayer of those deputations. I therefore have considerable sympathy with the noble Marquess in the proposal he has made. At the same time, I think what fell from the noble and learned Lord (the Earl of Selborne) has great weight. This clause is not an unguarded clause; it is very carefully guarded, and the Lord Lieutenant cannot move without receiving two independent Reports from two Departments of the Government. The Reports are to be laid, before they can be acted upon, for a certain time on the Tables of the Houses of Parliament, and I think great care has been taken to guard against the difficulties to which I have referred. Therefore, though I have great sympathy with the noble Marquess in his endeavour to prevent this pressure being brought upon the Government, and to prevent this temptation to tenants not to pay their instalments, I should not like the responsibility of voting against the proposal which Her Majesty's Government have made.

*THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: I had not intended to take any part in the discussion on the Amendment moved by the noble Marquess, but as it is the first occasion on which I have had the painful duty to vote against the Party of which I am a Member, I think it is incumbent upon me to say a few words. I endorse what has been said by the noble Lords who have spoken, and I can assure Her Majesty's Government we have no want of confidence as Irish landlords in the action which may be taken by the Lord Lieutenant in dealing with these calamity clauses. However, I think with my noble Friends that advantage would be taken of them by tenants urging bogus calamities, tenants who are really suffering from no calamity whatever. I am proud to think that I am landlord of a tenantry of whom any landlord might be proud, either in England, Ireland, or Scotland, and I know that no calamity cry will be raised by them; but I think it is in the interest of the Government themselves to enter my most earnest protest against the line of policy they have taken in forcing this clause down our throats. I really, therefore, feel bound to record my protest, so that in years to come, when we find these calamity clauses are taken advantage of by bogus tenants, we shall have at least the poor comfort and satisfaction of turning round on Her Majesty's Government and saying, "We at least told you so."

*EARL FORTESCUE: I, too, earnestly hope your Lordships will not be persuaded into passing these clauses, which I consider as a mere advertisement to tenants to put forward bogus calamities—mendicancy. Applications for relief are catching. If one district gets it, and my noble Friend Earl Spencer has told us what pressure Governments are subject to—and we know what sensational appeals can be got up—other districts will be inventing similar calamities. Other districts will follow, and we shall find, from one county to another, especially if any General Election is impending, applications being made for exceptional assistance, and the danger is, in all cases of this kind, that the exception will become the rule. I earnestly hope that Lord Waterford will persevere in his Amendment, and that, notwithstanding the opposition of the Government, he will go to a Division upon it. Let us protest against legislation which is liable, as the recent Lord Lieutenant (Lord Londonderry) has said, to be fraught with disastrous consequences to the country. My fear is that if these clauses are passed, the exceptional applications will be few in the first instance, but that they will go on multiplying and spreading from county to county throughout the country.

LORD CASTLETOWN: My Lords, I desire to say a few words, speaking not from the landlord's point of view, but from the point of view of the British taxpayer. If you keep these clauses in, and you have, as I have no doubt you will have, applications under them to remit the instalments, you will find after a time that if you want to extend the operation of the Act, as you will require to do, the British taxpayer will say, "I am not going to allow that, because these gentlemen in Ireland are continually making up bogus calamities and asking for the remission of their instalments." Why should not the Government have put in the words which exist at present in the Acts of 1885 and 1887 for the Land Commission to give such relief in the event of any individual defaulting on his instalment, or any number of individuals defaulting on their instalments in any particular district? If time is given, it is perfectly easy for the Land Commission to earmark the defaulting instalment as an arrear, and to collect it, say, in the following six months, but by this Bill you altogether fail to guard against the possibility of bogus calamities being put forward.

*LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE: I merely wish to call the attention of the House and of Her Majesty's Government to a recent case which occurred in the Westport Union. No doubt there was some distress there—I think it was only two or three years ago—and there was an unlimited power of levying rates. I believe money was advanced by the Government, and they sent a Commission to inquire into the way in which this money was grossly misused. I have not the Report of the Commission before me, but I have seen it, and I believe the Commissioners found there were numbers of people receiving relief under the rates who were in possession, not only of considerable portions of land, but of large numbers of stock, and were, in fact, not at all fitting subjects for relief. I think it was under the present Government, and the noble and learned Lord opposite (the Lord Chancellor of Ireland) must remember the case I am referring to. A greater abuse of relief or a falser cry as to the real needs of the people at that time could not be conceived. If your Lordships pass this Act the tenants will seek to take advantage of it when there is the least failure, such as there has been this year—though there is really very little distress in any district from a partial potato failure—I think your Lordships will not only be adopting a wrong course, but you will be creating difficulties in the other House of Parliament, if not in your Lordships' House, and such demands as have been referred to by noble Lords who have spoken will be forced upon the Government, whoever they may be, who are then the Executive.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I wish to remind noble Lords connected with Ireland that by the adoption of the Amendment they would sacrifice £40,000 a year that is to come from the British Treasury. This is the Exchequer contribution that is to be paid every year into the Reserve Fund to be specially applied to this purpose, and if the Reserve Fund is not kept alive, of course the £40,000 will not be paid. I doubt whether they are performing the part of patriots in sacrificing a sum so liberally offered. But I think there is a graver reason again for not adopting this Amendment. None of the noble Lords who have spoken in support of it seem to me to recognise that there have been occasions in the social history of Ireland of great calamity when money could not be paid. I do not suppose that anybody doubts that at these times money cannot be paid, and what is to be done then if there is no Reserve Fund? Throughout you have gone on the hypothesis of the extreme weakness of the House of Commons and the British Government. Let us test that proposition—that whenever distress occurs pressure will be put upon the House of Commons and that the Government will yield. If there were a Reserve Fund the worst cases would be taken off, and the greatest source of pressure would be relieved, and there would be less influence brought to bear upon the feelings and assumed weakness of the House of Commons. If there is really a case for remission, if it is impossible that the instalments due can be paid, do you imagine nothing will be heard of it? Nothing would be easier than to exert pressure upon the Government, through the House of Commons, to remit these instalments, whether there was a Reserve Fund or not. But what would happen if there was not a Reserve Fund? An Act would be passed to suspend the payment of all these instalments. It would operate in Ireland precisely as the Bank Charter Act has operated in the City, only in the City they are a very different set of people to the Irish tenants. The result of breaking through the Bank Charter Act because no loophole was left and no elasticity allowed has been that whenever difficulties arose to a certain point everybody looks for the Bank Charter Act to be suspended by the arbitrary action of the Government; everybody counts upon it, and it is impossible to refuse it. The same thing will happen if in this case you provide no elasticity, no loophole. Calamity will come; Irish tenants will say they cannot pay; their complaints will be echoed with all the Parliamentary pressure at their disposal, and the practice will be established of suspending the payment of instalments whenever there is famine or distress; and you will produce a worse manufacture of calamities and a worse prospect for the ultimate payment of these annuities to the British Exchequer than if you had allowed the elastic resource which at no very great expense this Bill proposes to furnish.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I would point out to the noble Marquess the Prime Minister that by this Amendment we should not lose the Reserve Fund if there were no calamities. There is a provision in the Act that if it is not used for this purpose it may be used for labourers' cottages.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: You will not keep that.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: Of course, if the noble Marquess states that, I have no more to say; but this clause does not provide with regard to the Reserve Fund. It is another clause which provides with regard to that. As calamities have occurred in the past they may well occur in the future; but in the past Acts of Parliament have been passed to meet them, and if there is a calamity in the future this clause will not provide for all the tenants of Ireland. This clause provides only for the purchasers of holdings. I would ask the noble Marquess whether it is not the fact that the Chief Secretary has this year got up a very large subscription to deal not with the purchasers, but with the tenants. I think that such a thing as a calamity ought to be dealt with by Act of Parliament, because you do not know how it may arise, and you will require distinctly, if there is a calamity or famine in any district, to pass an Act of Parliament to meet the case. What is the objection, then, to bring in the tenant purchasers as well as the tenants themselves? I cannot see, myself, the distinction. With regard to what fell from the noble and learned Lord opposite, I am not in the least afraid of the Land Commission, or the Lord Lieutenant, or the Local Government Board, doing anything wrong. Noble Lords from Ireland who object to this clause are not afraid of that. What they are afraid of is that calamities will be produced in the various districts in order to play upon the Lord Lieutenant and the Land Commission. We are afraid of the effect upon the people in the districts and of their refusal to pay rent in the districts. We are not afraid that the Lord Lieutenant or either of those two excellent bodies will do what is wrong. We have, in addition, the protection of the other House of Parliament. There are all those protections, and we are quite sure calamities will not be described as calamities by those authorities unless they really exist. But we are holding out this "bribe," I might almost say, to the small tenants in Ireland to establish calamities in order to get out of their liabilities and guarantees; and I was very glad to hear what fell from the noble Earl opposite (Earl Spencer), who has had such enormous experience in Ireland. He knows what would be the Lord Lieutenant's position under these clauses. Why, the Lord Lieutenant's life would be unbearable, and the Land Commissioner's life would be unbearable. There is no doubt that these calamities will crop up every day, and, worse than that, the Chief Secretary's life will be unbearable in the House of Commons, if he is still Chief Secretary of Ireland, as I hope he will be, because there will be questions put to him in Parliament every day with regard to the condition of the farmers in certain districts. I hope sincerely Her Majesty's Government will re-consider their decision with regard to my Amendment.

On Question, That Sub-sections 7 and 8 of Clause 7 stand part of the Clause,

Their Lordships divided:—Contents 114; Not-Contents 68.

The Marquess of Waterford

Clause 7, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8.

Verbal Amendments made.

LORD CASTLETOWN: My Lords, the Amendment I have to propose on this clause is one which I confess I would rather have had come from some other noble Lord, because I have myself sold under the Act of 1885, and it might appear that I was anxious to continue the sales under that Act. But my object in putting this Amendment down is to sustain agreements which have been partially entered into by tenants and landlords under the provisions of that Act, and so to keep up the sequence, as it were, between that Act and the Bill now before your Lordships' House. It would be a very great advantage if this result could be arrived at, because otherwise it would be quite possible after this Bill has passed into law, which I hope will be the case, that agreements entered into some time ago would have to go back to the tenants and landlords for revision, and possibly there might be delay and friction between the two contracting parties. There is also another point I should like to bring before your Lordships, and it is this: that under the Ashbourne Acts the advances were to be paid in cash, and therefore arrangements might have been entered into by Trustees and others for the receipt of that money so provided in cash. Under the present Bill that would be done by guaranteed Land Stock, and therefore there might be difficulties in that way. I do not press the Amendment very vigorously on Her Majesty's Government, but I trust they will consider it in a friendly spirit.

Amendment moved,

In page 10, after line 30, to add as a new subsection "In making advances out of the money so available, the Land Commission shall prefer applications for the purchase of holdings upon estates any portions of which have, before the passing of this Act, been sold or agreed to be sold under the said Acts."—(The Lord Castletown.)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I think this Amendment which has been moved by the noble Lord might very seriously hamper the discretion of the Land Commission and interfere with the operation of the Bill. To present it to your Lordships in its own words, I think, would convey to anyone plainly who listens to them how it might largely interfere with the working of the Bill and with the proceedings of the Land Commission in matters within its fair scope. They are—

“That in making advances out of the money so available, the Land Commission shall prefer applications for the purchase of holdings upon estates any portions of which have, before the passing of this Act been sold or agreed to be sold under the said Acts.”

Why should that preference be given? What reason does the noble Lord suggest for its being given? Take it this way: Suppose that some years ago, after the passing of the Act of 1885, one or two holdings on an estate had been bought, and had been left there ever since; or that half of the holdings on an estate had been bought with public money. In either of those cases, which would represent a wide class, why should they have any preference over other properties which for the first time seek the benefit of the Purchase Acts? What legitimate ground of preference can be suggested in either of the two cases I have mentioned? I suppose the noble Lord may have some particular cases in his own mind which have induced him to put down this Amendment; but I do not think it is right to interfere with the legitimate discretion to be exercised by the bodies mentioned in the Bill.

LORD CASTLETOWN: I do not admit what has been said by the noble and learned Lord. I have explained already to the House that it is in the interest of those who have entered into agreements that this Amendment is proposed. The object is that those agreements which would not have to go back to the tenants and landlords, or vendors, as they are called in the Bill; but that there should be a sequence in the passing of property under the Acts of 1885 and 1887. My arguments are, I am sure, perfectly logical and perfectly sound; but, of course, if the noble and learned Lord thinks I should interfere, if the Amendment is passed, with the working of the present Bill in any way, I should be very glad to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 8, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 verbally amended, and agreed to.

Clause 10.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: My Lords, I stated the other night that, in my opinion, this clause would destroy the effect of the Bill, and I then stated to your Lordships that the aggregate valuations should be placed in the Bill instead of the numbers. As the Bill now stands it is only the number of the holdings that are to be ascertained. I put it before your Lordships, then, that that is an inaccurate return to the Government, because the same man is very often returned five or six times on the books as being in possession of different holdings, although really they are the same holdings. All those separate holdings are to be counted as against the occupiers above £50. Now, that is certainly very unfair, and it ought to be put right. By this Amendment it is put right. You would take the aggregate valuations instead of the numbers, and divide the money between them according to what the county can supply as a security. I put it before your Lordships that it would be £16,000,000 against £13,000,000, and £16,000,000 is more than I believe the small tenants will ever take up. I see on the Paper two other Amendments down for this clause. I cannot say I like either of them as well as my own; but, at the same time, if the noble Marquess beside me (the Marquess of Londonderry) is very keen about bringing his Amendment forward, I will not stand in his way. I do not know whether it will commend itself to the Government more than my proposal. In fact, I think my own proposal is the simpler; but if the noble Marquess prefers to press his clause I will not put the Amendment that stands in my name, hoping that your Lordships will agree to accept the Amendment that stands in the name of my noble Friend, although, as I say, I do not think it is at all as good as mine.

Amendments moved, in page 10, line 39, before (“total”) to insert (“aggregate valuation of the”); and, in line 14, to leave out (“number”) and insert (“aggregate valuation.”) — (The Lord Tyrone [Marquess of Waterford].)

*THE EARL OF ERNE: My Lords, I entertain a very strong objection to this clause as a whole, and I am sorry the Government did not abide by the Bill as introduced last year. By a sort of afterthought they imposed restrictions which I think will have a bad effect upon the working of this Bill. Whatever the effect of this Bill may be, I entirely coincide with what the noble Lord opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) said the other day, that this Bill means the extinction of landlordism. I go further. I think it means the extinction of small landlords whose present slender margin, the difference between the charges they are obliged to pay and the rents they receive, will be swept away. If this is the sacrifice you are called upon to make for a Bill of this kind, which you think is going to restore peace and prosperity to Ireland, it is incumbent on you to see that it is not rendered nugatory by the insertion of provisions which are calculated to destroy your object. Nobody who knows anything about Ireland can have any doubt that large farmers of over £50 valuation, whether they live in Ulster or Munster, whatever their politics or their creed may be, are the only men who by any possibility can make satisfactory peasant proprietors under this measure. It is quite absurd to say that small peasants living in mud hovels in the mountains of Connemara or Kerry can be so. They will inevitably fall into debt, and will become the prey of the gombeen men or usurers. It will be merely knocking down one set of landlords in Ireland to set up another, who will be far worse than any of the present class of landlords have been. I can conceive no more thoroughly Irish proposal than to pass a Bill professedly to benefit a country, and then to proceed deliberately to throw hindrances and impediments in the way of those men coming under the provisions and taking the benefit of the Bill who are best calculated to make it a success. I can only account for this action on the part of Her Majesty's Government, or rather on the part of those of them who are connected with the Government of Ireland, by supposing that they have imbibed those influences which are supposed to permeate the atmosphere of the country, and have been led into the perpetration of an Irish bull on the largest scale. As I said before, I should like to see this clause knocked altogether out of the Bill, and that the Bill should be restored to its original shape; but if that cannot be, either by the acceptance of the Amendment which has just been moved by the noble Marquess, or by that which stands in the name of the noble Lord the Marquess of Londonderry, some modification at all events of what I consider to be a great evil and blot in the Bill should be made.

*LORD MORRIS: My Lords, I regret on this occasion that I am obliged to differ very much from the views which have been expressed by the noble Lord who sits below me, and by the noble Lord who has just spoken. I give the Government the greatest credit for the tenacity with which they have stood by these clauses against so strong an opposition. My noble Friend is opposed to the small landlords. Well, the class of small landlords are not represented in your Lordships' House; the great noblemen, the men of great territorial possessions, are. I represent at all events, as an individual, the small landlords, and by an accident I am a Member of your Lordships' House. Therefore, to some extent, I may speak for the class to which I belong, a class of men who are entirely and wholly unrepresented in this House, and also in the other House. In speaking for them I do not speak merely of my own individual opinion, although I do not think I am very egotistical in saying that no man alive ought to know public opinion in Ireland better than I do, if mixing in various classes of society, living there all my life, going through the country following my profession, and sitting for 23 years as a Judge, can enable any man to know it. I would ask any of the noble Lords present whether they have been in every one of the 32 counties of Ireland, and whether they have stood on every five square miles of Irish soil. Therefore, in some respects, I feel in an especially qualified position to speak, both as a Member of your Lordships' House and in another capacity. As I understand the purpose of this Bill, and what gives the Government its justification in calling upon us to give this State assistance, is the disorder that has arisen in Ireland. That disorder has arisen from causes which it is unnecessary for me to inquire into particularly, or to delay your Lordships by entering into at this late period of the evening; but it is now suggested that that disorder will be lessened by allowing this £30,000,000 to follow in the same route that the great bulk of the £10,000,000 did under the Ashbourne Acts, that is to say, by assisting purchases by tenants over £50, men who are as well able to purchase without the assistance of the State at all, as any other portion in the community. Should it not be the great object of the State to assist the smaller tenants, who are the great cause of the disorder? The impossibility of a landlord recovering his rents from small tenants, because the expense would have been so overwhelming that he would not undertake it, is admitted; but, supposing he was fool enough to embark on such a crusade, he would find his estate boycotted, and the State put to the enormous expense of bringing police and troops to carry out the decrees of Her Majesty's Courts of Justice, and to protect life and property on the spot. If that state of things is to be put an end to, will it be put an end to more effectually by allowing these comparatively wealthy tenants to carry off the great bulk of this £30,000,000? The matter has been spoken of as if the £30,000,000 was like an inexhaustible bottle that could be continually drawn upon. It has also been suggested that the tenants over £50 are excluded from the operation of the Bill. I find no expression of it in the Bill. I only find this: that wanting everything for themselves they are obliged to divide with poorer men, and the smaller tenants, who have got nothing, comparatively speaking, under the Ashbourne Acts, I submit should not now be left to the discretion of the Commissioners, who will be placed in a difficult position. If I were one of them myself I should be obliged to say we must lend this money on the best security. They will naturally lend the money again, as they did before, under the Ashbourne Acts, or the bulk of it, to the wealthy tenants, who cause no difficulty in the repayment of it. If the manager of a bank had only a certain amount of money in which to cash bills, of course he would give all the money to the excellent good securities, and he would be quite right from a financial point of view; but, as I understand, this money was not to be lent from a financial point of view, because if that had been the case the money ought not to be lent at all. It is lent in order to assist the poorer class of peasant proprietors, not the men of from £100 to £300 a year. It is very hard to define what is a peasant proprietor, but he is, I suppose, a man who is working his farm himself. The question is, whether these people should not get some of this money? I have made a calculation which shows that if the £30,000,000 travels in the same direction as the £10,000,000 did, that one-half of the larger tenants over £50 would be bought out, while only one-eighth under £50 would be bought out. So that your Lordships are asked to buy peace in Ireland by leaving seven-eighths of the smaller Irish tenants without any power of purchasing their holdings. There would be a feeling of injustice, a sense of wrong, which ought not to be induced in the smaller tenants at seeing their larger neighbours walking off with the substantial part of the fund, and seven-eighths of them necessarily left behind. This is the last of a series of Acts of Parliament which have been brought in, prophecies were always made on the passage of each of them that that was to be the last Bill on the subject, and that we were to have a millenium immediately afterwards. We were told that the landlords security was now impregnable. That if the rent was reduced so much the rest of it would be made so secure that it almost amounted to Consols, and that it would bring 33 years' purchase. Well, now we are called upon to sell it with something like 13 or 14, notwithstanding all the prophecies. I like politicians, but I dislike their prophetic utterances. My noble and learned Friend the other day stated that he did not think the landlords were going to live out of the country, but that they would live among their quondam tenants, who had become so fond of them that they were obliged to get rid of them; in fact, they would become villa proprietors. Noble Lords have given their opinion, and they are, of course, as much entitled to give their opinions as I have to give mine upon this matter, but I have not been satisfied with my own opinion alone, I have gone for information to my own County Galway. A meeting of the Landlords' Convention of that county was called a short time ago. At a meeting of the Landlords' Association held in Galway on the 30th of May last, it was unanimously resolved that the power of purchasing the holdings under the Land Purchase Act as proposed should be adhered to. The Secretary was desired to forward copies of that resolution to the General Landowners' Convention in Dublin, and to the right hon. A. J. Balfour. Therefore, my Lords, I can speak having the opinions in my hand of the landlords in the second greatest county of Ireland, and I do not know that any noble Lord has given much more than the expression of his own individual opinion, no doubt honestly entertained and strongly expressed. This is the last of these Acts, it is an Act of a description which we are not likely to see again soon. We are not likely to get £30,000,000 readily again. This Bill is nominally permissive; it is really compulsory. When a landlord has property in one particular portion of the country, and has sold, and annuities are payable in respect of purchases, the tenants of a neighbouring proprietor will ask what his brothers or cousins or friends are paying, and he will naturally say he will not pay any more rent than they are paying, as annuity—that is not a theory of mine, but it has happened in a most remarkable way in Ireland. One owner in a Barony sold; the other owner did not; and the tenants insisted that the rent should come down to the level of the annuity which was payable to the Government. During the last 25 years since I was a Member of the other House prophecies have always been made, and have always, without exception, turned out to be delusive and false, and to recall them strongly reminds me of a farrier's bill which I once saw in my younger days, for "Curing your Honour's horse till he died."

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: My Lords, I should like to say a few words upon the discussion which has been raised in answer to the noble and learned Lord opposite; before I do so I may be allowed to say that I understand the noble Marquess will withdraw his Amendment in favour of that proposed by the noble Lord the Marquess of Londonderry.

Lord Morris

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I will withdraw it.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: What I desire to point out is, that this Act is retrograde. One of the principal objects of the Act of 1887 was the admission of leaseholders to the benefits of the Act of 1881; and I say, with great confidence, that I believe the majority of those leaseholders who were admitted to the benefits of that Act will be excluded if this clause is left as it is now. There is one point which I think is a mistake. It is the practice of noble Lords inside, and of people outside, this House to speak of this Act as an Act for the creation of a peasant proprietary. I look upon it equally as an Act to form a strong yeoman class. It is from this class of occupiers in Ireland of over £50 valuation that will come the elected representatives on the County Councils if this Bill is brought into operation, for that is the only really educated middle class outside the towns in Ireland. It is from this class that a great number in the ranks and professions are drawn; and certainly the great majority of the Roman Catholic clergy come from it. I would press upon your Lordships whether it is really worth while to create a strong adverse feeling among that class, which, I am sure, will be the case if this clause is not amended in the way suggested.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I have only to say one word in answer to what has been said by the noble Marquess behind me. I think my noble Friend stated to your Lordships that the purchasers under £50 do not get nearly as much money as the purchasers over £50 valuation under the Purchase Act. My noble Friend has evidently not referred to the return I moved for a short time ago, and which lies on your Lordships' Table. If he had done so he would have seen that the purchasers over £50 had got £2,716,000, while the purchasers under £50 got £3,528,000 odd. Therefore, your Lordships will see that there is a great deal more given to the purchasers under £50. Then, again, my noble Friend seemed to think that the purchasers under £50 would be excluded unless this clause as it is at present were retained. But there is nothing to prevent the purchasers under £50 coming in and buying under the Ashbourne Act. Of those below £50, about 13,700 bought under the Ashbourne Act, and about 1,500 over £50. I think, therefore, my noble Friend cannot have studied that return, for he could not have made the statement he did to your Lordships if he had done so. There is nothing to prevent tenants under £50 buying under this clause. They can still buy—but I will not detain your Lordships longer. I beg, as my noble Friend is anxious to move his Amendment in substitution of mine, to withdraw the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY : My Lords, in the observations which I addressed to your Lordships on the Second Reading of the measure before you, I threw out a suggestion that if the money allocated to the occupiers of holdings under £50 were not taken up within a certain period, that sum of money should be available to occupiers of over £50 valuation. The noble Lord below me, in the course of his most able speech, assured me that if I would bring the matter forward in Committee it should receive the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. On this ground, I have placed on the paper the Amendment which I now propose to submit to the House. I have been told by numerous friends that my Amendment is of a somewhat complicated character, and, therefore, I shall ask your Lordships' permission to make a few remarks in submitting this Amendment, which will go to the foundation of the measure, and to put as simply and briefly before you as I can what I mean by my Amendment, and what I ask Her Majesty's Government to accede to. Your Lordships are well aware that the guarantee fund in each county represents one-twenty-fifth part of the capitalised sum granted by the Government for the purpose of enabling occupiers of holdings to become owners of those holdings. You also know that this capitalised sum is divided in two parts, to be distributed in various proportions to occupiers of holdings over £50 and under £50. I knew before the noble and learned Lord (Lord Morris) made his most excellent speech that a certain number of Irish landlords agreed entirely with the clause as it stood, while my noble Friend on my left (Lord Waterford), and I think an overwhelming majority of the Irish Members of your Lordships' House, disliked that clause, and, indeed, had a great idea at one time of throwing it out. I trust that the Amendment that I am going to submit will receive the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and that it will also receive the assent of noble Lords on behalf of the small landowners in Ireland, whom the noble and learned Lord (Lord Morris) so ably represents. I think he informed your Lordships that he was the representative of the small class of owners in your Lordships' House, and that you will agree with me in saying that I doubt whether any class is more ably represented. The object of my Amendment, which I wish to convey to your Lordships, is this. I wish at the end of each year that a calculation should be made in each county of the sum of money which has been allocated in that county, and which has been taken up by the occupiers of land both over and under £50, and I should then desire that the balance that accrued each year—mark you, each year—should be converted into a common fund available to both classes of tenants, those over £50, and those under £50, to be administered on the same provisions as the Ashbourne Acts have at present. Of course, I need not remind your Lordships that this Act is entirely different to the Ashbourne Acts, inasmuch as stock, and not cash, will be the payment. I noticed that my noble Friend (Lord Morris) remarked upon the manner in which the noble Lords on the two opposite Front Benches emulated each other on Monday last in attempting to exercise the gift of prophesy. I will not attempt to emulate them in prophesy, for I take it it is impossible for any one to attempt to prognosticate as to the amounts in which this sum will be taken up. I have heard from some friends in Ireland the opinion that the money will be speedily taken up, and from others that they think not; but time will prove. I think we can form a very safe idea as to the manner in which the money will be taken up by taking the annual average of the advances under the Ashbourne

Acts as taken up by the tenants both under £50 and over £50, and comparing those returns with the money allocated to the different districts in Ireland, as proposed to be distributed to tenants at valuations both over and under £50. It would be perfectly possible for me to deal with those figures, either by dealing with the capitalised sum, or by taking the annual guarantee fund in each county; but as the figures in the annual guarantee fund are smaller—and I wish particularly to impress upon your Lordships that it is only fair that this surplus should be at the disposal of the larger tenants—I propose to deal with the smaller figures. I propose to bring under your Lordships' notice two representative counties, in each of the four provinces, in order to show you how, under the present Bill, the money has been applied to the two classes of tenants; and I wish also to show you the manner in which advances under the Ashbourne Acts have been applied for, and the amounts of money advanced to both classes of tenants, under and over £50, in those counties. I shall ask your Lordships to allow me to submit to you, at the end of the statement, the surplus sum which would be available, if the same line is pursued in the future as in the past, and which will be at the disposal of both classes of tenants at the end of each year. The statistics are as follows:—In the province of Ulster I take the two counties of Donegal and Down, and I find that the estimate of the annual share in the guarantee fund for the county of Donegal is £39,823; the estimated proportion of share in the county guarantee fund, according to the Bill in its present form, to holdings of over £50 is only £846. I do not think my noble Friend can say that the substantial tenants have been over well treated in that county. Now, the occupiers of holdings valued at under £50 would receive no less than £38,977. Now I come to the annual advances which have been made under the Ashbourne Acts in respect of these holdings. In the county of Donegal to holdings of over £50 the amount is no less than £13,370 as against the £846 which I quoted a moment ago. Now for holdings under £50 the amount is £27,598, which has been taken up. Consequently, in the county of Donegal, according to my

Amendment, they would take from the general fund £11,379. Assuming that tenants under £50 did not purchase at a faster rate under this Bill than under the Ashbourne Acts, there would each year be available for the purchase of holdings of over £50 valuation that additional sum of £11,379. I now go on to the County Down, and I find there, again, that the annual share of the guarantee fund is £59,814, of which, to the owners of holdings over £50, £5,339 would go, and £54,447 to holdings under £50; whereas, under the Ashbourne Acts, £6,840 went annually to tenants over £50, and £6,687 to tenants under £50. Therefore, in the County of Down, there will be left for the general fund at the end of each year no less a sum than £47,788. I will not trouble your Lordships at length with the figures for the Province of Leinster, where the numbers work out in much the same way, though not to the same large extent, but I will turn now to the County of Galway, where my noble Friend says the small tenants have been badly treated, and the large tenants favoured. I find there that the additional sum would be £49,959. There the amount is £61,252 to tenants over £50, and £2,763 to those under £50, which would leave no less than £58,459; while under the Ashbourne Act has been taken up for holdings over £50, £11,868, and by tenants under £50, £8,480. Therefore, according to my computation, at the end of the first year there would be a surplus from the amount of money due from the tenants under £50 of no less than £49,959. In Leitrim, again, we find the same thing. I know my noble Friend (Lord Harlech) takes great interest in that county, and he thinks the small tenants have not received their fair share. There the sum is £19,916 for holdings over £50, and only £246 under. That would be £19,715. In Leitrim the surplus after the first year would be £9,820. I do not think I need trouble your Lordships at this late hour of the evening, when there are so many more amendments for your Lordships' consideration, by going through more statistics upon this point. I think I have shown sufficiently that the Amendment I have advocated, while it will benefit—for no doubt it will benefit—

this class of tenants to whom, I maintain, the Government ought to give every advantage, that is, the tenants over £50, it will in no way militate against the tenants under £50, whom my noble Friend supports. Your Lordships will see that not one shilling is taken away from them, because the very amount which is taken away is at their disposal also. Then I cannot see why it should not be at the disposal of the larger tenants if the smaller men did not use it themselves. I cannot believe that the smaller tenants will be such dogs in the manger as to say that because they do not want this money, the bigger men shall not have it. It might be possible, it has been pointed out to me, for the large tenants to combine to persuade the smaller ones to take a particular course. I cannot believe in that theory, but, supposing that is so, the smaller tenant is only to be duped for one year, and even if he is duped for one year, he is on perfectly fair and equal terms with the larger tenants at the end of it; and therefore I do not think it is possible that there could be a combination to prevent the smaller tenants applying, or any combination to prevent their obtaining their just rights. Before I resume my seat, I would ask the noble Lord, the Lord Privy Seal, to give this Amendment his careful consideration. I have tried to prove that there will be no hardship upon any class of tenants, and we think, as the clause exists, there is great hardship on the very class of tenants whom the Bill is intended to encourage. In general, with few exceptions, Irish Members of this House are unanimous in repudiating and denouncing the clause as it stands, and in supporting the Amendment which I now put before you. I should like to hear what my noble Friends behind me have to say, and I shall be glad if I can to answer any objections they may make, but I would ask your Lordships to consider another place, the House of Commons, in regard to this matter. I think I am correct in saying that this clause has been denounced in public and in private on every occasion by every single Irish supporter of Her Majesty's Government. Under these circumstances I do trust your lordships will consent to passing this Amendment. I have already explained with what pain I move it against Her Majesty's Government. It would be at any time very great pain to me to lead a revolt against Her Majesty's Government, but feeling that Irish opinion should carry some weight in this House, I do ask, if necessary, my noble Friends which come from Ireland to support me in doing so.

Amendment moved, in page 11, line 11, to leave out Sub-section 3, and insert the following:—

"The share of each county in the guarantee fund shall be determined for each financial year by the Lord Lieutenant, and apportioned in the proportion above mentioned, between the class of holdings above and the class of holdings below £50, and if the amount of advances applied for in that year for the purchase of either class of holdings is less than the proportion of the guarantee fund so apportioned to that class, a sum equal to the balance shall be deducted from the proportion available for such class of the total amount to which advances can be made in the county, and carried to a common fund to be available for advances for both the above-mentioned classes of holdings in that county."—(The Earl Vane [Marquess of Londonderry].)

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN: My Lords, I hope there may be no revolt, but that there may be a unanimous feeling in support of the clause proposed by the noble Marquess below me. I am one of those who sympathise with the smaller class of tenants in Ireland, and also with those proprietors on whose property these small tenants live; but, at the same time, I have strong sympathies with those tenants in the North of Ireland who are comparatively excluded from the provisions of this clause. I regret sincerely that the clause was ever introduced, though, at the same time, I can fully appreciate the reasons which induced the Chief Secretary to introduce it. I imagine he was anxious that every possible facility should be given to the poorer class of tenants to take advantage of this Bill; but at the same time, in doing so, I think he possibly overlooked the serious damage which might accrue to this class of tenants in holdings above £50. Those tenants are highly respectable and loyal men; still, they have but human nature, and it might possibly occur to them to ask—"Why are we excluded from the provisions of this Bill? Is it because we are so respectable and so loyal that the Government are seeking to bestow further advances upon the smaller tenants in the South and West of Ireland?" I do not say that such threats, as they might almost be called, would suggest themselves to these men, but it is possible; and in passing such a Bill as this, which everybody praises, and which even in this House has met with comparatively so little condemnation, it is only necessary and desirable that every tenant in Ireland should greet it with approbation and hope. With regard to the Amendment of the noble Marquess below me, it appears to me to be a very sensible one, and to touch upon a very important point. If we are not able to get the clause entirely excluded from the provisions of the Bill, we should endeavour to obtain as great advantages as possible for tenants above £50. The noble Marquess has stated that it is an intricate clause, but I think if noble Lords study it they will find that is not the case. A certain sum, as your Lordships are aware, is allocated to each county each year, and of that sum the tenants below £50 receive a certain share, and the tenants above £50 receive another proportional share. According to the provisions of the Amendment of the noble Lord, if the tenants below £50 do not take advantage of all the amounts allocated to them in one year, that amount, together with the amount which may accrue from the share of the £50 holdings, will become a lump sum from which either class of tenants can draw in a future year at their own will. Therefore, if the tenants below £50, the smaller tenants as they are called, who according to these clauses will have every opportunity of getting advances, should take up all that is allocated to them, the holdings over £50 will suffer; but supposing they do not, the remaining amount will be left unused, and will in future years be at the disposal equally of themselves and of the holders above £50. It appears to me this Amendment is the most feasible one that could be adopted. I sincerely hope Her Majesty's Government will give their sanction to it, for if they do I hope and believe that the sore feeling which might be caused by this part of the Bill will be removed.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: I quite agree with one of the remarks which have fallen from the noble Lord, the late Lord

The Duke of Abercorn

Lieutenant. He said that the opinions of Irish Peers would have weight, but it is sufficiently evident that their opinion is not unanimous, because we had a very eloquent counter statement of opinion from the noble and learned Lord (Lord Morris) on the other side of the House, and I suppose very few of us could boast, as the noble and learned Lord was able to do, of having been in every country and district in Ireland. To estimate this matter accurately, we surely must look at the proportion between the two classes of tenants. I think it was stated in the other House of Parliament that the proportion of tenants over £50 purchasing is 92 per cent. Now that figure, I think, itself gives a notion of the comparatively small number who are excluded by the operation of the Bill as it stands. I am afraid that the logical sequence of the passing of this Amendment would be to provide more money for them. Personally, as a strong believer in the principle of land purchase, I, for one, should not object to such a provision, but it is obvious in the present state of public opinion that an addition of, say, £30,000,000 to the present provision would be impracticable. I have no doubt that every Member of this House wishes to see this Bill passed into law without any undue limitation or restriction; but still the main object of the Bill is, as was stated by the Prime Minister the other night, to facilitate the creation of a peasant proprietary. It can hardly be said that the provisions in this part of the Bill are inconsistent with that purpose. I quite agree with what was said by the noble Marquess opposite on Second Reading, that in Ireland a great many of the smaller tenants would be influenced by the action of the larger tenants. I have noticed the same thing in Scotland, where we have often a number of smaller tenants holding round the larger farmers. But there is one point on which they will not, I think, be influenced, and that is upon any question affecting their pockets, and if the smaller men see that it is to their advantage—and they will no doubt do so—to purchase under this Act, I do not think the action of the larger men will seriously influence their operations. Therefore I cannot but think that the opinion given by the noble Lord opposite as regards this Amendment is one which will have great weight, and therefore I am prepared to support the Government.

LORD MORRIS: Having spoken very strongly in favour of tenants of the smaller class, I may say that I have no objection to the Amendment proposed. I do not think that either class of tenants will act quite as a dog in the manger. As I understand, there is a certain allocation for the tenant under and over £50. If the tenants under £50 do not come in, why should not the tenants over that valuation come in and get it? And e contrà, if the tenants over £50 do not come in, which possibly they may not in certain places, then their share should go to the tenants under £50. As far as I have any voice in the matter I shall join in the application of the noble Marquess who sits below me to Her Majesty's Government to accept the Amendment. My noble Friend the Marquess of Waterford said I made some confusion of figures, or rather a misstatement of them; but I am sure I made none, and that none of the figures to which the noble Marquess referred touch mine. I said that if the £30,000,000 travelled in the same route that the £10,000,000 did under the Ashbourne Acts, it would buy out one-half of the larger tenants in Ireland over £50; but that it would only buy out one-eighth of the tenants under that valuation. I therefore suggested that it would leave seven-eighths of the smaller tenants in Ireland discontented, whereas you would only leave half the tenants over £50 discontented. The noble Marquess asked: "Are the loyal men over £50 to be excluded?" My answer is that they are not excluded: but those under £50 want to be included, because hitherto they have been excluded, and if I know anything of them—and having gone Northern Circuits for years, I think I ought to know something about the loyalty of the population of Ulster—I can say that their loyalty is not connected with the land. The most loyal portion of the people in Ulster hold no land at all. Loyalty in Ulster, as far as my experience goes, is not connected with land. They are a loyal and contented population, and as this Amendment is intended to assimilate the rest of the people of Ireland to them I have no objection to it.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: I should like to ask the noble Earl one question. I thought he rather inferred that if my Amendment were carried it meant more money for these purchases, but I am prepared to prove that, so far from any more money being required, this money, if not taken up, will be sufficient.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: It is rather to the principle of the clause that I was referring. I quite see the point which the noble Marquess puts, and if it is taken according to the limit of time that would be so in effect. I was rather speaking upon the principle of admitting these tenants. I presume the noble Marquess means that it should be made a practice in perpetuity that the money would be required for the larger tenants.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: No; I am afraid I have not explained my proposal very clearly. It is only with regard to the surplus money; if it is not taken up, allocated to the guarantee fund—not that it should be fresh money supplied—that the fund should be available to both classes of tenants, that is to say, only whatever money remains annually—the surplus each year. If the money were not taken up in one year it would not go on to the surplus in the next.

LORD HARLECH: The noble and learned Lord, having alluded to me in regard to this clause, I cannot but remark that I certainly was very much in favour of the Government clause. I thought it was very desirable that as many small tenants should be induced to purchase their holdings as could possibly be found. It appears, however, from the statistics which the noble Marquess has read to the House, that already the small tenants had had a great deal more allotted to them than they were willing to take up, and that the surplus money beyond what they were willing to take up is of no practical use whatever. Now I desire that the fund should be made use of as far as possible. It has gone as far as the smaller tenants have been disposed to take it, and if they will not take it, I think it is only right the tenants above £50 should, if they please, have the opportunity of making use of it. It is no use leaving it idle and lying where it will be of no use to mortal man. Therefore, after giving the smaller tenants every chance of making use of it, I would devote the surplus to the use of tenants over £50 if they are willing to take it.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: I only wish to say one word in support of the clause which the noble Marquess has moved. I was not so strongly opposed as was the Marquess of Waterford to the £50 Clause, and although I should probably have supported him had he gone to a Division, I confess I would very much rather not have voted against the clause in the Bill; but I think the Government will do well if they accept this proposal of the Marquess of Londonderry, because, on the figures he has given, it is evident that, in the County of Donegal, the proportion for the £50 men, as the matter now stands, would not enable one single man above £50 to buy unless he gave not more than about 17 years' purchase — I think the figures were £841 against a good many thousands. I do not think that can be the intention of the Government; but if this clause which has been suggested by the Marquess of Londonderry comes into operation after the first year, there will be, probably, enough money to enable as many £50 holders to buy as wish to do so. From the Returns which are already before the House it is evident that a great number of the £50 holders have bought out their farms, and I cannot help thinking that in a few years the matter will work itself out, and that there will be no friction whatever.

EARL SPENCER: Before the noble Earl who has charge of the Bill rises to reply to the remarks which have been made, I should like to say two or three words. I entirely agree with the statement made by the noble Lord (Lord Morris) as to the great importance of encouraging the smaller tenants to become proprietors. I myself think it is very important that those under £30 should become proprietors; and, certainly, if we look to the returns which have been given, there are very few under £30 in comparison with those which have bought under the Ashbourne Act above £30. As far as I can understand the Amendment of the noble

Lord Harlech.

Marquess, who was formerly Viceroy of Ireland, if is carried, the operation of the Act, as intended by the Government, and the advances made between the £50 occupiers and those above will be really very limited for the first year. After the first year the surplus which remains will be paid into a common fund, and then the small tenants and the large tenants will be benefited alike. That is how I understand the matter. Therefore, I believe if the noble Marquess's Amendment is carried, it will practically limit the operation of the clause as at present drawn, giving a larger sum to the smaller tenants the first year. As I was strongly in favour of creating as many small owners as possible, and as I believe that the arrangements in the clause will prevent any hardship to landlords on account of the discretion given to the Land Commissioners to sell estates, notwithstanding this clause, if it is found necessary to increase the number of large tenants, I should be sorry if the Amendment were accepted. There might be cases where the proportion would be so large of the small tenants that the landlord would be unable to sell his estate. That is met by the Government clause. Therefore, I should be extremely sorry, as this possible hardship has been stated, to hear that Her Majesty's Government are going to alter the clause, for I believe it would only limit the operation of it to one year instead of extending it over a longer term, which I should like to see.

*EARL CADOGAN: Without entirely agreeing with all the remarks which have fallen from the noble Earl who has just sat down, while adhering to the principle of proportion, I feel, on behalf of the Government, that we cannot, in face of the unanimous opinion which has been expressed, resist the Amendment. Undoubtedly our chief reason for coming to the conclusion that some such provision for the proportionate distribution of this money was necessary was that the statistics of purchase under the Ashbourne Acts, to which allusion has been made by noble Lords in the course of this discussion, did undoubtedly show that the proportion of money allotted to tenants above and tenants below the value of £50 was entirely incorrect and inadequate. Therefore, although we still adhere to the principle of proportion as found in the clause in the Bill, yet at the same time I am bound to admit that in face of the almost unanimous opinion expressed by noble Lords on both sides of the House we feel that we cannot resist the Amendment which has been moved by my noble Friend (Lord Londonderry). My noble Friend explained the meaning and intention of his Amendment, which perhaps at first sight cannot be very clearly understood; but he expressed it with so much force and so much ability that I do not think there is much more for me to say. It appears to me that it does provide a compromise between the wishes of noble Lords behind me and our own policy, and that it involves no loss of principle whatever. And I may here remark that although during the debate upon the Second Reading the speeches of noble Lords behind me pointed to a strong difference between us as to the question of proportion, yet this Amendment itself does admit of a distribution of the money in the same proportion as that which we indicated in our own clause. All it does is this: it adopts the principle in our clause, and it provides, in addition, for the case of any sum of money being left unapplied for by any other class, and for the creation of a fund to which such unapplied-for money should go, to be divided in equal proportions or to be divided as may be directed, but not in the proportion originally provided for by the clause. Therefore, taking all the circumstances into consideration, and observing as I do with considerable pleasure that the tone of noble Lords on both sides with reference to the general principle of this clause has been very favourably modified on this occasion, and also taking into consideration the reasons which have been so ably put forward by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Morris) I am enabled to inform the House that the Government will assent to the Amendment of my noble Friend.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I am sorry I was not here whilst the noble Earl was speaking, but I regret to hear from his last words that the Government are about to agree to his Amendment. It seems to me that the result will be to neutralise altogether, or to a very great extent, the effect of the clause which was introduced by the Government itself in the House of Commons. I do not know what the pressure upon the Government may have been, but it seems to me that after having so strongly advocated this clause in the House of Commons it is somewhat surprising that they should now support it in this House. The Amendment of the noble Lord seems to me to have this effect, that practically, instead of the operation being carried on for a series of years, and therefore the proportion being continually applied to the different holdings as was intended by the original Amendment, its operation will be confined now to one year, and the result may be that, if there is not application for a sufficient amount of the small holdings to come up to the whole amount allotted to them in the first year, the amount will then be transferred to the larger holdings. Am I right in that assumption?

*EARL CADOGAN: No, the clause is—

“A sum equal to the balance shall be deducted from the proportion available for such class of the total amount to which advances can be made in the county, and carried to a common fund to be available for advances for both the above-mentioned classes of holdings in that county.”

I understood the noble Earl to say that it was for one year.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The noble Lord is quite right in correcting the exact words I used, but it does not affect my argument at all. It will be carried into a common fund, that is to say, it will be carried to an account that will not be subjected in any way to the operation of this provision. The result of that will clearly be to a great extent to nullify the whole operation of this Act. What is the object of the clause? As was admirably pointed out by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Morris) who spoke a little earlier in this discussion, the object was that you should secure that there should be a certain portion of this money allotted to the small holders in Ireland. Now, you secure it for one year only. This operation is to come on not only for a limited number of years, but if the Act should take effect in the way which is desired the fund will be renewed from time to time, and this operation may go on for a very long time. The result will be that in any given year, if the whole amount is not applied for by the tenants of the small holdings, so much will be deducted from the fund, as available for those small tenants, and will be thrown into a common fund to be made available for both the smaller and the larger tenants. I say that that must to a very considerable extent nullify the operation of the clause. I am surprised that that course should have been taken by the Government, because this clause is in point of fact a matter of principle, if it is worth anything at all. The principle of the clause is that when you are advancing a large fund for the purpose of creating an extensive peasant freeholding class in Ireland you should take care that the small holdings obtain their full share of this money in proportion to the number of those holdings, but if you depart from that principle then it seems to me that you give up as it were the whole object and aim of the clause. No doubt something will remain of the clause, but it is comparatively but a shred of it; and I must say that I think the decision of the Government will be received with very great surprise, and I anticipate that it will not by any means facilitate the ultimate passing of the Bill.

*EARL FORTESCUE: I rejoice extremely that Her Majesty's Government have yielded to what seems to me to be a most reasonable request very powerfully urged by the noble Marquess (Londonderry). The great object of this Bill is not to secure the existence or the creation, if you may say so, of a certain proportion of small proprietors and a certain other smaller proportion of large proprietors. The great object of the Bill generally is that it should come into extensive operation as early as possible, and that you should have in Ireland a greatly-increased number of landed proprietors. It seems to me that the main object of the Bill is far better secured by enabling the money allotted by Parliament for the purpose to be utilised in a reasonably short time than, for the sake of an arbitrary proportion, keeping back much of it unused for the chance of a number of occupiers under £50 a year ultimately taking it up; the occupiers of lands above £50 a year being all that while deprived, or the larger proportion of them, of any chance of buying the estates they had occupied. My impression is that the essential object of the Bill, as distinguished from the much smaller object of this particular clause, is far better carried out by the clause suggested by the noble Marquess, and acceded to by the Government, than by a rigid adherence to the imperfect clause as it was passed.

*EARL CADOGAN: I should like to say a few words in reply to the noble Earl opposite (Kimberley). My remarks may perhaps rather take the form of a question to him, as I am not sure whether I understood his objections clearly. The noble Earl said, I think, that the operation of this clause would take place not annually at the end of the year, but at the commencement of each fresh year. I do not know if that was it?

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: No; the end of the year.

*EARL CADOGAN: What I understand is proposed to be enacted by the Amendment of the noble Marquess is this: that the proportion is to be decided for each year, and that at the end of the year, when it is ascertained how much of the money provided for under the clause remains unapplied for, the money so unapplied for is carried to a fund. Then I understood the noble Earl to say that the following year, when the apportionment is again fixed, that apportionment will be fixed having regard to the sum unapplied for in the previous year. That I do not understand to be the meaning of the clause.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I did not mean to say that.

*EARL CADOGAN: If so, will the noble Earl explain how he can justify his argument that under this clause its operation would only last one year, because, as he explained, I think, in the following year the apportionment would be altered, whereas the object of the clause is that at the commencement of each year the proportion should be fixed, and it is only in the case of any portion being unapplied for that any of the money goes to the common fund?

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am afraid I did not explain myself with perfect distinctness. I understood the operation of the clause to be precisely as has been most clearly explained by the noble Earl opposite. The operation of the Amendment would be this, that at the beginning of each year the apportionment would be made in accordance with the principle of the original clause, and then at the end of the year, if any balance remained over and above the amount which had been applied for under either of the separate heads, that balance would be carried to a common fund. But, then, I understood that the same operation would be pursued in the following year—that is to say, the amount would be apportioned, and if there was any balance it would again be carried to the common fund. Then what I say is this, that you would be, as it were, whittling away the fund year after year. Instead of the whole of the fund being available in every year for the exact proportion into which the original clause divided the classes of holdings, you will have a sum carried to the common fund every year, and that sum, therefore, will be abstracted every year. Supposing that the effect will be—of course I have assumed all through the argument that it will be—that the amount for the small holdings is not entirely applied for, and that the large holdings get the benefit, it is possible that that result may not take place; of course if there is no balance I entirely admit that I am only saying that you run a risk, and I think a very serious risk, of considerably weakening the effect of the clause. I had not the advantage of hearing the previous arguments, but I really do not see what the object of the Amendment is, because if the original clause was rightly framed the principle of it was that it was desirable that these small holdings should obtain a certain proportion. Why, because they do not apply in any particular year, you are to carry over a certain portion of the fund to be applied for a purpose which at all events when you proposed the clause you did not approve of, namely, the giving it indiscriminately between the larger and smaller holdings, I am quite at a loss to understand. The only thing I can hope is that the operation of the Amendment may not be very extensive. I am quite willing to admit that it is possible that that may result, and, of course, if it is not very extensive the injury, according to my point of view, will be comparatively small. What

I regret is that when there was a sound principle which had been laid down in the clause, the Government, as it seems to me, without any good reason, now depart from it.

*THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: My Lords, I am afraid I have not adequately explained the effect of this Amendment as I understand it. The noble Earl opposite talks about whittling away the money. There is no whittling away of the money at all. The sum of money to which I allude, which is to be taken into the common fund for the use of both classes, is the guarantee fund which is annually derived from each county, and it is only the surplus which is not taken up that I propose to distribute amongst both classes of tenants. I cannot think that the noble Earl wishes any amount of money to lie absolutely idle. Yet, according to his proposal, so far from whittling away the money, he would have the surplus lying absolutely idle. The noble Earl further says that the larger tenants will derive the benefit. I deny that. The Amendment simply provides that the money which is unapplied for by one class in one year shall not remain absolutely idle. If the noble Earl has not understood the effect of the Amendment, I fully allow that it is due to my inadequate explanation of it; but the case really lies in a nutshell, and is perfectly capable of any explanation that the noble Earl may choose to ask for.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I may have misunderstood it. Is it the fact that, if any surplus remains in any given year over the amount that may be allotted in that year, that surplus is entirely lost to the fund? I cannot think that that is the case. This is an aggregate sum of money of so many millions which is voted by Parliament, and I apprehend that the sum will have to be entirely expended and exhausted; if not spent in one year it will have to be spent in another year. Then how can it possibly be said that this surplus is to be lost? It cannot possibly be lost; it will be carried on to another year, and then be expended. I really do not understand what the noble Marquess means at all.

*THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: I mean as far as the large tenants taking it up it will be lost. I proved that by the figures that I quoted. The guarantee fund goes on annually.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 10, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 11.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: In the temporary absence of my noble Friend Lord Castletown, I beg to move the Amendment which he has placed on the Paper. Its object is to provide that, if a landlord and tenant so agree, stock may be advanced to enable the tenant to fine down his rent to such a fee farm rent as shall not exceed 50 per cent. of the rent which, in the opinion of the Land Commission, would be a fair rent of the holding. The tenant would thus pay a very greatly reduced annuity as representing the half that is wiped out. The advantages on the part of the vendor would be these. There may be, and probably are, cases where a landlord who has charges on his property wishes to realise sufficient to pay off such charges. He would, under this scheme, be able to do so, while, at the same time, he would remain on and hold very much the same position, and retain very much the same influence that he has hitherto held in his county and in the district. Another advantage is that there would be reserved absolutely and unconditionally to the landlord all the royalties, such as minerals and turbary, sporting rights, and so forth attaching to the holding.

Amendment moved, in page 12, after line 7, to add, as a new Clause—

“(1.) Where a sale of a holding is about to be made by a landlord to a tenant in consideration of the tenant paying a fine and engaging to pay to the landlord a fee farm rent, the Land Commission may make an advance to the tenant to the amount of such fine, provided that the fee farm rent shall not exceed 50 per cent. of the rent which, in the opinion of the Land Commission, would be a fair rent for the holding.

“(2) The provisions under this section for securing advances for the purchase of holdings, and for the repayment of same, and for distribution of purchase money, shall be mutatis mutandis the same as those in reference to cases of purchase and sale by tenants of their holdings under this Act.

“(3.) Where any advance has been made to a tenant to fine down his rent under the provisions of this section, no guarantee deposit shall be retained by the Land Commission out of such advance, but the purchase-annuity payable to the Land Commission in respect of any such advance shall be a charge upon the holding in priority to the landlord's rent, and shall be collected from the tenant by the landlord and paid over by him to the Land Commission.”—(The Lord de Vesoi [V. de Vesoi].)

*EARL FORTESCUE: There is one other advantage that would accrue. The advance made by the Government would be halved, and therefore the fund available for the purchase of land would pro tanto be increased.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: The object involved in this Amendment is one with which we are all familiar. It has from time to time been brought before the public in articles and pamphlets and in speeches in the other House of Parliament, and sometimes in this. But it is obvious that it represents a very wide scope of operation and that it does not fall within the scheme of the present Bill. I do not say that on its merits there is not a great deal to be said for the considerations involved here, and that I have not myself heard very powerful arguments in support of schemes for fining down rents. It is an argument with which everyone in Ireland who has at all considered this question is tolerably familiar. This Amendment presents the question quite fairly, and anyone who can read it can understand the topic. But, after consideration, the Government here, as they were obliged to say elsewhere, do not see that they can accept it. It might open up a wide field of operations, and it would not fall in with the general scheme of the Bill, which proposes to create tenant proprietors by enabling them to buy their holdings out and out, rather than having a kind of half-way house such as is proposed in this Amendment. I do not myself wish to say anything that would prevent fair consideration being given to these proposals when my noble Friend may think proper to present them, but I do not think that they are in harmony with the scope of operations of this Bill. They have been fully considered elsewhere and here by the Government, and I regret that it is impossible for me on their behalf to say that we can assent to the Amendment of my noble Friend.

LORD CASTLETOWN: After what has fallen from my noble Friend opposite I have, of course, no course left but to withdraw the Amendment, although I confess that I am very sorry that that course has been forced upon me. The Amendment was moved on the assumption—and I believe the assumption was well grounded—that, owing to what has transpired in another place, something of that kind might be accepted. The object of the Amendment practically is, as my noble Friend says, to fine down rents. It would benefit four parties. The tenant would become practically owner under the fee farm rent, and therefore would be able to deal with his holding in whatever way seemed best to him for the advantage of his family and others. The Government would be assisted in the disposition of the money, because half only would be advanced instead of the whole. The taxpayer would get a better security, because there would be two things to go against—the interest of the tenant and the interest of the landlord in the holding—and I am told that it would be very largely availed of in the North of Ireland, where it has been thoroughly understood, and has been already acted upon. And I would also draw attention to this cardinal point, that the principle of the Amendment is contained within the Land Act of 1881, in the purchase clauses, Section 24, Sub-section 1 (b). It was not availed of very much under that Act, but it was in certain instances, and in the Amendment as drafted the working of the arrangement has been materially improved. I regret that the Government do not see their way to accept the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 12 amended and agreed to.

THE EARL OF ARRAN: I need hardly detain your Lordships with any observations upon the Amendment which stands in my name. I propose to insert a clause which provides that as long as any of the instalments due by the purchaser remain unpaid he shall be prevented from performing certain acts, and shall be obliged to do certain other acts which are enumerated; and if, after due notice has been given by the Commissioners, he persists in contravening the provisions of the Act, the Commissioners shall have the power of selling the holding. With your Lordships' permission, I will omit Sub-section (3) as it appears on the Notice Paper, and on Report I will bring up either another sub-section or another short clause to enable the Land Commission to bring the offending tenant before a Court of Petty Sessions, and, if his offence is proved, to have him fined a sum not exceeding £5. I may add that this clause is taken almost verbatim from the Land Department Bill, substituting the words "Land Commissioners" for the words "Land Department." I hope your Lordships will see that this clause does nothing more than prevent, as long as possible, a purchaser doing anything that will injure either the neighbouring occupier or the neighbouring owner, or doing anything to decrease the value of his holding as security for the advance made.

Amendment moved, in page 12, after line 27, to insert as a new clause—

"(1) A holding, while subject to a purchase-annuity under the Land Purchase Acts, shall, as between the Land Commission and the proprietor for the time being of the holding, be subject to the following conditions of purchase, that is to say, to the conditions specified in section thirty of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, and also to the following conditions:

- (a) The proprietor shall not, without the consent of the Land Commission, do any act which, if done by a tenant at will, would as between him and his landlord be waste.
- (b) The proprietor shall keep all main drains and water courses upon the holdings at the date of the agreement for sale in good order, repair, and condition.
- (c) The proprietor shall permit any person authorised in that behalf by the Land Commission at all reasonable times to enter upon the holding and ascertain how far the several conditions of purchase are being observed.

(2) Where the proprietor persistently, after written notice given by the Land Commission requiring him to observe the same, contravenes any of the conditions of purchase which are set out in this section, or where the holding is liable to be sold for a breach of any of the conditions of purchase specified in section thirty of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, then, without prejudice to any other remedy, the holding shall be liable to be sold under this Act."—(The Lord Sudley [Earl of Arran].)

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN: It appears to me that this clause is a very reasonable one. It will provide that the proprietor shall act reasonably as regards his neighbours, and not allow water-courses to get blocked up, or keep his drains in bad order. A proprietor or a tenant may have a holding or a small property under purchase on the side of a hill; there may be a water-course or a small stream running through it; if he is neglectful and careless, that stream may get blocked, very much to the injury of his neighbours above and below. I hope that the Amendment will meet with the approval of the Government.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: This is an Amendment which has been presented to your Lordships most fairly and concisely by my noble Friend. It is a clause which, in substance, is found in the Land Department Bill, and I may say that in substance I am personally very friendly to it. My noble Friend says that he would wish on Report to alter Sub-section (3), and he explained the kind of change that he intended. It might also be expedient to consider the words of Sub-section (a); and if it would meet the views of my noble Friend, I should be glad if he would postpone the whole clause until the Report stage. In the meantime, I shall be very glad to speak to him.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 13 agreed to.

Clause 14.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: The Amendment which I rise to move is one which I hope will meet with acceptance by your Lordships. A similar Amendment was proposed in the other House, but exception was taken to its form, and a high authority connected with the Government stated that, probably if the drafting was improved, it would be favourably considered in your Lordships' House. The Amendment is a very simple one. There is nothing obligatory about it. It is to enable trustees of incumbrancers and others, if they so desire, to agree with an owner to take the incumbrancer's share of what arises from the sale of the property in guaranteed land stock at par. There are a great many properties at this moment which an owner could not sell unless some arrangement of that sort was made. At present the trustee's hands are entirely tied; he cannot in the position he holds consent to take this stock in payment of what is due to his cestuis que trusts unless some special enactment is made for that purpose. It is very likely that a great many properties would have to remain out of the market for this very reason. Therefore, the Amendment is calculated to foster and encourage the objects which this Bill desires to promote. I cannot see any objection to the clause, and I hope my noble Friend will assent to it. The second part of the clause is to have the same effect with regard to sales in the Land Judge's Court, in which cases also there is at present no power to enable the Land Judge to accept Guaranteed Land Stock in payment.

Amendment moved.

In page 13, after line 8, to add the following new sub-section:—("The trustee or trustees for the time being of any incumbrance, charge, or annuity, or rent, with the consent of the person or persons for the time being entitled to receive such annuity or rent, or to the interest on such incumbrance or charge (notwithstanding any provision to the contrary contained in the instrument creating the trust), may at his discretion accept or agree to accept in payment of such incumbrance or charge, or of the capital value of such annuity or rent, a sum of guaranteed land stock equal in nominal amount to such incumbrance or charge or capital value. Where a holding or holdings or an estate are sold by the Land Judge to the tenant or tenants thereof, the Land Judge shall be empowered to accept guaranteed land stock at its nominal amount in payment from the Land Commission.")—(The Viscount Hutchinson [Earl of Donoughmore].)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I think this Amendment will be a great improvement to the Bill, and I very readily accept it. I am not quite sure that there may not be a slight drafting Amendment still to be made, but that can be effected at a later stage of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 15 agreed to.

Clause 16 amended, and agreed to.

Clause 17.

Amendment moved, in page 15, line 1, leave out ("or to any annuity created under this Act.")—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I must object to this Amendment. I think it is most unreasonable, because it is depreciating the stock which we Irish landlords are to take in payment for our land. In the Bill as it comes up from another place, it is provided that the stock shall be taken in payment of certain charges, such as instalments or annuities in respect of the purchase of tithe rent-charge under the Irish Church Act, 1869, or the Irish Church Amendment Act, 1872, and various other things, and it is arranged, very fairly, I think, that it is to be taken in payment "of any annuity under this Act." Now, consider the position. We are anxious, and I think all your Lordships will be anxious, to encourage the purchase of this stock as much as possible. You want to keep this stock up to par, and a tenant might very reasonably wish to buy this stock and to pay his instalments in it. Further, as some of my noble Friends have pointed out to your Lordships, a landlord may be obliged very much against his will to buy a holding upon which there has been default. He will then have to pay the instalments on that holding for the future; surely he ought to be allowed to pay them in this stock, in which you have paid him. It seems to me an extraordinary thing that, having paid him in land stock, you should refuse to take the land stock from him in payment of the charge which has been created. I hope my noble Friend will not press this Amendment, because it seems to me to be really most unfair. I pointed out to your Lordships on the Second Reading that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had refused to take this stock in payment of debts due to the Government. This is carrying it still further. It is refusing to take stock which was created to purchase a certain holding if the landlord has to pay the instalments instead of the tenant.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I do not think I quite follow the objection of my noble Friend, although he has spoken so clearly. This does not appear to be a clause which deals with the acceptance or the refusal of Irish Land Stock. It is one dealing with settled land, and the powers of Trustees with regard to settled funds. It is dealing with cases of settled lands, and the powers of Trustees in reference to those sales and of binding trust funds.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: It speaks of "an annuity created under this Act." How can the noble Lord say that that applies solely to trust funds?

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I am afraid I have not made my meaning plain. The clause as it stands in the Bill says—

"When any land, being settled land within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882, is sold under the Land Purchase Acts as amended by this Act, and such land is subject to—"

Then it names all these things—

"It shall be lawful for the trustees of such settled land, or other person to whom the purchase-money thereof is payable, to apply the same in the redemption of any such instalment mortgage, charge, instalments, or annuity, as aforesaid, or such part of same as may at the time of such sale be apportioned in respect of the land sold."

It deals with the powers of Trustees under the Settled Land Act. The earlier part of the Bill shows the necessity for the Amendment. However, my noble Friend can consider it before Report, and I shall be very glad to speak with him if he desires it.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: Can my noble Friend tell me why this clause is brought into the Bill? because it must have been put in for some purpose.

*EARL CADOGAN: There can be no sale under any annuity created by this Act. If the noble Lord will look at page 10, Sub-section 4, he will see—

"An advance shall not be made under the Land Purchase Acts as amended by this Act for the purchase of any holding for the purchase of which advances have been made under the Land Purchase Acts, whether before or after the passing of this Act, and whether under this Act or otherwise, until the entire annuity for the repayment of such advances has been paid or redeemed."

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I will leave the matter over till Report.

Amendment agreed to.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: The next Amendment which stands in my name also relates to this 17th clause. The addition which I propose to make to the clause is designed to carry it to its logical conclusion. I believe the history of the clause is this. It was not in the Bill as it was originally introduced into the House of Commons, but it was accepted by the Government in Committee. Owing to some conflicting decisions in the Irish Courts, doubts had arisen as to whether in the case of terminable annuities representing the old tithe rent-charge, where it had been commuted on any particular estate, the Trustees of a settled estate were at liberty to apply the purchase money in the redemption of those annuities; the alternative, of course, being that the tenant for life had to redeem out of his own private funds, or else that the sale should take place subject to the payment of the tithe by the tenant-purchaser, which is, of course, an inconvenient and objectionable mode of carrying out a sale. The Government have accepted the clause which now stands as Clause 17 in the Bill, and have removed any doubts as to what may be done in the future. But it is the fact that a great many redemptions of this kind have, with the sanction of the Court, already been carried out. The object of the words I now propose is merely to prevent any questions or difficulties arising with regard to the application by Trustees of this money. This money, I may observe, is, of course, in the hands either of the Court or of the National Debt Commissioners, and is capable of being followed up; but it is really matter of procedure more than of principle, and I hope my noble Friend will agree to accept the addition which I propose to the clause.

Amendment moved,

In page 15, line 6, after ("sold") to insert ("and where any such instalment, mortgages, or charges have been redeemed out of the proceeds of any settled land prior to the passing of this Act, the provisions of this section shall apply in the same manner as if such redemption had been made after the passing of this Act.")—(The Earl of Belmore.)

EARL CADOGAN: I must ask my noble Friend to allow this to stand over till Report. It is a Treasury matter.

THE EARL OF BELMORE: The Amendment was not put on the Paper as early as some of the others, and it must stand over if the Treasury have to be consulted; but I hope they will agree to it. I do not think really it affects the Treasury very much; it really affects the powers of Trustees.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: The Amendment I propose to move is not new to the Government; it is a clause in their Land Department Bill.

The Earl of Belmore

Under present circumstances a tenant for life is placed on a very disadvantageous footing as compared with a tenant in fee. A tenant in fee is able to sell his estate and invest the money as he thinks fit; a tenant for life can only invest the money at 3 per cent. Naturally this must militate very strongly against sales under the measure now before us. Where a tenant in fee is able to sell at, say 4 per cent., he is able to take, say 18 years' purchase, while the owner of property of equal value, who is only allowed to invest at 3 per cent., must necessarily sell at 24 years' purchase, to be placed on an equal footing with his neighbour. Moreover, I think it presses extremely hard on what I call the good regular paying tenants. There are many landlords in Ireland whose rents are paid regularly, and who utterly decline to sell to their tenants the holdings for money which they would have to invest at 3 per cent., when they are receiving even more from the tenants themselves. The Amendment which I have the honour to move merely proposes to free trustees from all liabilities with regard to the investment of the purchase money of their estates—of course, subject to the concurrence of the tenant in remainder. This will enable moneys to be invested in any security approved by those interested, whilst at the same time it is provided that the section shall not authorise an investment in any security specifically forbidden by the settlement. I cannot think that my noble Friend will object to this very simple Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 15, after line 6, to insert as a new Clause—

"(1.) Where the land comprised in a holding sold to a tenant is settled land within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1887, and the purchase money for such holding is received by the trustees of the settlement, those trustees, according to such direction and subject to such consent (if any) as is required by the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1887, may in their discretion invest the money not only in any security authorised by the settlement for any trust fund comprised therein, but also in any other securities the investment in which is consented to by the person who next after the then tenant for life, and his or her wife or husband, is entitled to the money for his life or for any greater interest, and if such person is under disability, the consent may be given in manner provided by section seventy-three of the Landed Estates Court Act.

(2.) Where the persons so entitled are trustees they may give the said consent without incurring any liability, and may give it before the agreement for sale is made, and where the persons so entitled are entitled as tenants in common, a majority of the persons representing more than half the value of the whole of the property of such tenants in common may give the said consent.

(3.) In the case of settled land, if there are no trustees of the settlement, trustees may be appointed under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, before any such agreement for sale is made, and the trustees of the settlement may, before any such agreement for sale is made, consent to the securities in which money arising from any sale is to be invested.

(4.) This section shall not authorise an investment in any security specifically forbidden by the settlement, but shall have effect notwithstanding any general prohibition of investing in securities not mentioned in the settlement."
—(The Earl Vane [Marquess of Londonderry].)

*LORD HARLECH: I confess that when I read this clause I was rather alarmed as a Trustee that such a wide difference in the existing law should be allowed to pass, and I still think that we ought to put some limit upon the securities permitted. According to this Amendment, the money may be invested in any security authorised by the settlement for any trust fund proposed therein, and also "in any other securities." That allows a very wide margin. It might be that the owner and remainderman might invest in Argentine Waterworks, or Mexican Tramways, or any other such rubbish. Therefore, I hope the noble Marquess will not object to adding after the words "also any other security" the words "approved by Parliament." I beg to move that as an Amendment.

Amendment moved to the proposed Amendment, after the word "securities," in line 8, to insert the words "approved by Parliament."—(The Lord Harlech.)

LORD CASTLETOWN: I hope the noble Lord who has just spoken will reconsider his suggested Amendment. The great object, as I take it, of the Amendment moved by the noble Marquess is to enable those landlords who are dealing with settled estates and selling them to their tenants, to come to an optional arrangement with their Trustees, and make such provision that they will be enabled when the sale is effected to have almost, if not quite, as much income from the investment as they have at the present time from the land. I confess that I attach very great and grave importance to the Amendment. I believe that if it is carried in the form drafted by the noble Marquess it will assist materially in effecting purchases, as many landlords who are at present hanging on to what may be called the margin that is left to them will be enabled to invest in securities which will be perfectly safe. I cannot agree with the noble Lord who has just spoken, that there is danger of investment in rubbish because the arrangement will have to be entered into between the Trustee, the tenant for life, and the remainderman if any. Therefore, there are three parties to the bargain, and it is not likely that they would invest in Mexican Trams or Argentines.

*LORD HARLECH: But the Amendment absolves the Trustee from all liability; therefore, he may be as reckless as he pleases, and invest in the rubbish that I spoke of.

LORD CASTLETOWN: Not if the remainderman and the tenant for life are dealing with the matter, because it is to their advantage to see that the trust is properly administered. If the Amendment moved by the noble Lord (Lord Harlech) is carried, it will simply put back the arrangement of a trust fund to the ordinary Trust Act, which is limited to about $3\frac{1}{2}$ or $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.

LORD HERSCHELL: As I understand the view which forms the basis of this clause, it is this, that in reality the land which is sold cannot be regarded as a security of the same class as the securities in which alone the money can be invested; that is to say, that the person entitled to the income suffers by reason of the increased value of the security, if the securities are limited in the way in which they would be limited at present according to the law. Therefore, the idea is that you may perfectly justly permit a wider range of investment, which would increase the income of the person entitled to receive the income, and at the same time give quite as good a security as is given by that which is exchanged for the money to be invested. That is the principle which is embodied in this clause. Those who are entitled after the existing tenant for life are sought to be protected in this way. Of course the existing tenant for life, it may be said, may induce the Trustees to embark in an investment, producing a high rate of interest, but the security of which is infirm. But then, he cannot do that of himself; the person next entitled after him, who is looking forward to the future, who has no present interest, who does not at the moment benefit in the least by the increase of income, must give his consent. Therefore, the idea of the clause is that you may reasonably apprehend that he will not give his consent to a security from the increased income from which he gains no immediate benefit, unless he believes that that security is a sound one, and will preserve to him the capital at the time when he comes to receive the income of it. Now, I cannot help thinking—it may be that it needs further safeguarding—that those views suggest a very considerable argument in favour of a clause such as this; that it does avoid certain injustice which would otherwise result from a compulsory increase of the security, coupled with a compulsory diminution of the income; whilst, on the other hand, it is so safeguarded as reasonably to secure that, if the income is to be made somewhat larger than it otherwise would be, the security shall not be diminished substantially or to a dangerous extent. I should be happy, therefore, to see some provision of this description added to the Bill, even if it needs further safeguards to be provided hereafter.

EARL CADOGAN: I think the noble and learned Lord has given the best possible reasons for passing this new clause without the Amendment suggested by my noble Friend Lord Harlech. My noble Friend's view apparently was that the clause as it stood would allow too large a latitude for the investment in securities which he very properly called rubbish; but the responsibility for the rubbish would be shared by those holding the next interest after the tenant for life, and I think the security, therefore, is ample. The clause is, indeed, one which appeared in the Government Bill which was dropped in its passage through the other House, and the Government are prepared to support the Amendment of the noble Marquess.

LORD HARLECH: I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Lord Herschell

Amendment to the proposed Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Original Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF BELMORE: I rise to move another new clause, which I will explain in a very few words. The object of it is to extend the powers of apportionment of redemption, given by the sections of the Act of 1887, to superior grants or leases. It is thought that this will be of advantage to all parties concerned, and I hope the Government will agree to it.

Amendment moved, after Clause 17, to insert the following new Clause—

“Where any tithe rent-charge, annuity, rent-charge, or rent, or any apportioned part thereof, is ordered to be redeemed pursuant to the provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, the Land Commission shall have the same powers in respect of the purchase money thereof as are contained in Section 14, Subsection 1, of the said Act, and the provisions of the sixteenth section of the said Act shall apply to any superior rent affecting such tithe rent-charge or rent, or to any fee-farm grant or lease reserving the same.”—(The Earl of Belmore.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: The Government assent.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 18, amended, and agreed to.

Clause 19, amended, and agreed to.

Clause 20 agreed to.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI: My Lords, I have to move the new clause standing on the Paper in my name, which I propose to alter by prefixing the words—

“The Land Commission, while any such sale is pending, and also if unable to sell, or if they think it useless to attempt a sale, shall temporarily let or manage the holding for such time, and in such manner as they think expedient.”

This clause is practically a Government clause. It was inserted in the Bill of last year, and again in the Land Department Bill of this year. Its object is to enable the Land Commission to take possession of the holding through the Sheriff as soon as they think fit, as a prior matter to taking proceedings for the recovery of the annuity.

Amendment moved, after Clause 20, to insert the following new Clause:—

“The Land Commission while any such sale is pending and also if unable to sell or if they think it useless to attempt a sale, shall temporarily let or manage the holding for such time and in such manner as they think expedient.

For the purpose of the sale or of the management of a holding under the Land Purchase Acts, the Land Commission may issue an order declaring the holding to be vested in them, and directing the Sheriff to put them or their agent or nominee into possession of the holding, and thereupon the holding shall vest in the Commission as if possession of it had been recovered in an action for the recovery of possession on the title at the suit of the Commission, and the order shall be executed by the Sheriff in the like manner as a writ of possession after a judgment recovered in such an action."—(The Lord de Vesoi [Viscount de Vesoi].)

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I wish to say one word upon this Amendment. Probably Her Majesty's Government are not aware of the present procedure when a man purchases a holding. Of course the Government look forward to the future in the working of these Acts in the hope that the tenantry of Ireland will come forward and purchase their holdings. They are the only purchasers really possible in Ireland. Occasionally you will have a landlord who will buy, in order to avoid losing his guarantee deposit, but it is to the tenant purchasers that you must look really to work these Acts, because no matter how many safeguards you may put in they will be broken—in Ireland as elsewhere—I do not say largely; I hope it will not be; but you must expect occasional defaults. In England you have continually tenants breaking. Therefore, it is to the tenantry of Ireland that you must look when such time comes. As a matter of fact, the agitation is now dying out. Peasants are already taking evicted farms and working them all over Ireland, and we may look forward with assurance to the time when the agitation shall have entirely ceased, and tenants will be prepared to buy any farm that is put up for sale. Now, I want to point out some of the difficulties of the present system. I myself have bought some farms; not many—three or four—but I have been obliged to buy them because the tenants defaulted. The first thing I was told to do was to ask the tenant whether he would give me possession. I have a bailiff, and I sent my bailiff; but the poor tenant farmer, or the big tenant farmer, who will become a purchaser will not have a bailiff, he will have to go himself. I ask whether your Lordships think tenant farmers will go to a man and ask him to give possession? You have to send to the Land Commission the answer which the tenant gives, which is generally not a very civil one. That will, in the first place, prevent the tenant farmer buying. Then, after giving the tenant three weeks or so rest, you again are told to ask him to give possession, and he again refuses. The tenant farmer would have to go himself—I sent my bailiff. After having got possession, you have paid your money down—everything is as you might wish it to be—and the Land Commission order the Sheriff to place you in possession. Well, the Sheriff will not remove the tenant's effects—it is not his duty to do it; he will give you possession provided you remove them. I ask your Lordships how many tenants are there in Ireland who could if they wished to do so, or would do so, in any circumstances, go to the farm of a man who had defaulted and turn out his effects on to the road side? It is a most invidious position to ask him to take. It is an impossible position; he will not do it. Therefore he is being excluded by the Act as it is at present from purchasing. He is your only tenant, and you are excluding him from purchasing. If he decided to remove the effects on to the side of the road, he would have to employ emergency men, and tenant farmers in Ireland are not very fond of employing emergency men. I will relate to your Lordships the experience of a friend of mine in my own district. This gentleman's tenants defaulted. The farm was put up for sale and he purchased it from the Land Commission; he paid his money down. When the Sheriff was directed by the Land Commission to eject the tenant and place my friend in possession, the Sheriff went, and found the poor old woman who was in possession was dangerously ill with a bad heart. The Sheriff refused to give up possession. The Sheriff was perfectly right; no man who had any humanity in his disposition could wish a poor old woman of that description turned out. But see the position my poor friend was placed in. He had paid his money down; he was then refused possession of the holding.

He asked the Land Commission to refund his money. They said, "Nothing of the sort; you have bought the farm." But worse than that. The first instalment came due. My friend had been, of course, unable to work the land or do anything with it, and he refused to pay the annuity. The Land Commission said, "You have bought, and you are bound to pay the annuity." My friend still refusing, action was brought, and the decision was given against him; he had to pay up all the instalments of the annuity. At last the poor old woman died, and so relieved him from the intensely awkward and disagreeable position in which he was placed. But if the woman had continued to live for a lengthened period my friend would still be paying the annuity, although receiving nothing whatever in exchange. I think, therefore, my noble Friend ought to accept this Amendment, which will prevent such a ridiculous state of circumstances arising in the future.

*EARL CADOGAN: We are prepared to accept the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Clauses 21 and 22 agreed to.

Clause 23.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: The Amendment which stands in my name is practically to re-constitute the Land Commission, especially in regard to its being a Court of Appeal. I would remind your Lordships that the first two lines of the clause as it stands state that—

"From the commencement of this Act the Land Commission shall be perpetual, but it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor to remove, for inability or misbehaviour, any Commissioner other than the Judicial Commissioner."

I propose to insert after the word "perpetual" the words

"And shall consist of two land judges and four land commissioners," and so forth. Now, to put it shortly, the object of this Amendment and of the subsequent ones that I have put on the Paper is to constitute a thoroughly satisfactory Judicial Court of Appeal upon all points that may arise under the Acts of 1881 and 1885. I will detain your Lordships only a short time while I remind you of the principal

Acts of Parliament affecting Irish land. First, there is the Act known as the Encumbered Estates Act of 1849. The next is the Landed Estates Court Act of 1858, and that Act was amended, I believe, by the Court of Judicature (Ireland) Act of 1877. These Acts constituted what is called the Landed Estates Court, which is administered by a Judge of the High Court under the name of the Land Judge. I need hardly remind your Lordships of the high reputation enjoyed by the present occupier of that office, and by his distinguished predecessors. Passing over the Acts of 1860 and 1870, which latter Act contains the germs of purchase in what are known as the Bright Clauses, we come to the Act of 1881, the principal object of which was the settlement of judicial rents. That act is administered by a Commission consisting of a Judicial Commissioner with the rank and status of a Judge of the High Court, assisted by two Land Commissioners, who by Sub-section 3 of the clause we are now discussing are to hold office by the same tenure as a County Court Judge. In addition to these three Commissioners, there is a staff of Sub-Commissioners. The Judicial Commissioner and the two Land Commissioners are the first, and in most cases the only, Court of Appeal in all matters arising out of the decisions of the Sub-Commissioners. Then there is the Act of 1885, which is the first real Purchase Act that we have to do with, dealing solely with purchase, and administered by two more Commissioners, who are appointed solely for the purpose of purchase, and added to the Commissioners under the Act of 1881. Therefore, the principal persons who administer the Land Laws of Ireland are the present Land Judge of the Landed Estates Court, the Judicial Commissioners, and the two Land Commissioners under the Act of 1881, and two more Commissioners under the Act of 1885. This, my Lords, is the personnel which the Amendment proposes should constitute a perpetual Land Commission. If the Amendment is accepted, there is a further Amendment on the Paper in the name of my noble Friend sitting below me (Lord Castletown) dealing with the manner and method of procedure in appeal cases.

My Lords, you have got a Land Judge with very full knowledge of all transactions affecting the sale and purchase of land and the clearing of title, and therefore fully capable, I submit, of dealing with all cases that may arise certainly under the Purchase Act or the Act of 1881. The converse applies to the Judicial Commissioner, who belongs to the Land Commission. Then you have the four Land Commissioners, who have all had full experience in their several Departments. Apart from the question of appeals, which is a very important part in the constitution of this Court, I submit that all rules of procedure and of policy in regard to the administration of the Act should only be adopted after very careful deliberation and consultation, and on the responsibility of highly trained and capable Judges; they ought not to be the outcome of mere obiter dicta on the part of individuals, such as were so severely and strongly animadverted upon by the Marquess of Londonderry in his speech on the Second Reading. I need hardly remind you that agriculture being the paramount industry of Ireland, the decisions of a Court like this are of paramount interest to the people of that country. This Land Court, if it is re-constituted, will be to all intents and purposes a Division of the High Court, administering the laws affecting landed property throughout the country. Is it politic or is it just that such a tribunal should be controlled by persons less qualified than Judges of the highest experience and standing? In the interests of landlords as well as of tenants who wish to have their rents fixed, in the interests of vendors and purchasers who wish to agree upon a transfer of land, we desire above all things to have a strong Court, commanding public respect, and above all suspicion of being the nominees of Political Parties or of any particular interest. I acknowledge that the operation of the Amendment will probably be to absorb into the Land Court the greater part of the staff, and probably also to transfer a good deal of the business of the Landed Estates Court to the Land Commission. And not the least recommendation that I have for the Amendment is that it entails no extra cost on the Treasury. I would remind your Lordships of a section which is proposed by the Government, that—

"If and when at any time the judicial commissioner is temporarily unable to attend, or his office is vacant, the Lord Chancellor may nominate a judge of the High Court to act temporarily in his place."

That would strengthen the Court in the event of inability on the part of any individual Judge to go about the country hearing appeals under the Act of 1881. All appeals liable to arise under the Act of 1885, or any of the Purchase Acts, would probably be heard, naturally, in Dublin. I think it is only convenient to state just now that I shall propose, whenever the term "judicial commissioner" occurs in this clause, to substitute for it the term "land judge." They would be practically Judges of the High Court of Justice. It is a simpler term, and more easy to be understood. The term "judicial commissioner" is extremely cumbersome, and I think hardly suitable. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment moved, in page 17, line 2, to leave out ("but") and insert—

"And shall consist of two land judges and four land commissioners. The land judges shall be the persons who are, respectively, at the commencement of this Act the land judge under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (Ireland), 1877, and the judicial commissioner of the Land Commission appointed under the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, and their successors duly appointed from time to time.

The land commissioners shall be the persons who are, at the commencement of this Act, the commissioners of the Land Commission appointed under the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (other than the judicial commissioner), and the additional commissioners of the Land Commission appointed under the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, and the persons who may from time to time be duly appointed as successors to any of such commissioners."—
(The Lord de Vesci [V. de Vesci].)

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I think it must be obvious to anyone who has studied this Bill carefully, and considered its history and its progress elsewhere, that it would be impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment which has been moved by the noble Viscount. It seeks to make an absolute change in the governing tribunal under the Bill, and it seeks to cast upon a Judge, who is not bound to accept them, duties of a very high and important character. Mr.

Justice Monroe, who is the present Judge of the Land Court, is sought to be brought per saltem into this tribunal, without any statement from him on the subject, or any communication. It is obvious that that cannot be done. The Government, of course, very fully considered every bearing of this most important question, of what was to be the constitution of the Land Commission, and it would be impossible for them now, at this stage of the Bill, to make such a wide change as that proposed by the noble Viscount.

LORD CASTLETOWN: I regret exceedingly to hear what the noble and learned Lord has said, and I must traverse very clearly and distinctly his statements. I do not at all agree with what he has said as to the inability of the Government to re-constitute the Court if they choose. If they do not choose, it is a very simple thing to say so. What we have tried to do is to make a really strong Court, a really valuable Court, and one that will deal fairly and properly with the distinct questions which are placed before it. What the Government have got now is a Court that is mixed up with Fair-Rent Judges and Land Purchase Commissioners, and what you are going to do is this: you are going to have a Fair-Rent case dealt with by a Land Purchase Commissioner, who absolutely can know nothing about the matter, and who will import into it other questions which he ought not to deal with, and vice versa; you are going to have a Land Purchase case dealt with by a Fair-Rent Commissioner, who will import into the whole question the fair rent arguments and conditions. My noble and learned Friend said that the Landed Estates Court Judge was going to be brought in at a jump; I cannot see any objection to that being done. The Landed Estates Court Judge at the present moment has to deal with the very questions that will come under this particular Bill, and why he should not be utilised in the Land Commission Court I cannot see. Then, again, he says that my noble Friend would upset the arrangement under the Bill. Surely it would be very easy, if it were desirable to do so, to slightly re-model those arrangements.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I would like to ask my noble Friend how suitors are to decide as to what are questions of law and what are questions of fact. The Judicial Commissioner has to decide questions of law, and the other Commissioners have to try questions of fact. Are suitors before this Court to have two separate suits—in the first instance a suit to find out what are questions of law and what are questions of fact, and in the second instance the suit to actually ascertain their rights?

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: A Judge of the High Court is the head of the whole tribunal. There has never been the slightest difficulty in the matter. Suitors have only to express to the lay Commissioners the slightest desire to have a question of law argued, and it is reserved at once for the Judicial Commissioner, and can be taken straight from him to the Court of Appeal.

Amendment negatived.

LORD CASTLETOWN: I must apologise for trespassing so much upon your Lordships' time, but the Amendment which I have now to move is one upon which I believe I am justified in saying a few words. I do not intend to go into the question deeply, nor do I desire to press it, but I want to ventilate what I think I may safely call a certain grievance. The intention of this Amendment is to regulate to a certain extent the salaries of those gentlemen who are administering the Acts of 1885 and 1887, and who will administer the Bill that is now before your Lordships. I would venture to put before your Lordships very shortly indeed, what was said upon this question in the other House, and I think it will guide you to what may be a proper view to accept in this House. With reference to the salaries now paid to the Commissioners under the Act of 1881, those gentlemen receive £3,000 a year. The Commissioners under the Land Purchase Act receive £2,000 a year, without pensions. What I would venture to suggest, not only in the interests of the gentlemen who are now administering the Acts, but also in the interests of the taxpayer in the future, is that the salaries as now paid should be equalised between the four Land Commissioners, so as to place them on an equal footing, and that when any resignation or death occurs among those who are now in office the salaries should be reduced. In order to show that this question was thoroughly gone into, and that propositions were brought forward which I think might be successfully brought to an issue by suggestions from this House, I would read to your Lordships a few observations that were made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the other House—

“The right hon. Gentleman suggested as a measure of conciliation that the matter should be postponed until next year, when the Chief Secretary will introduce the Land Department Bill.”

The Land Department Bill, as we all know, is dead; therefore I would venture to suggest that the moment is ripe when this question of “conciliation,” as the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, might be dealt with. But then, again, the Attorney General for Ireland was asked by Mr. Dixon in the other House whether the Government had taken any steps to provide for a revision of the salaries of the Land Commissioners—

“The Attorney General for Ireland said that his right hon. Friend recognised the principle that equality of duties involved equality of remuneration. It was his intention next Session to introduce a measure embodying that principle.”

After such a statement from the Representatives of the Government in the other House, I do not think I am asking your Lordships too much if you will let me suggest that, having ventilated this question, it might be dealt with in some manner or other during this present Session. It would undoubtedly prevent a great deal of friction and a great deal of unpleasantness that may otherwise result, and I would most respectfully urge Her Majesty's Government that they should take up this question and deal with it. We have no fault to find with those who have worked the Land Purchase Bills during the last four or five years; we have no fault to find with those who have worked the Fair Rent question during the last eight or nine years. We simply ask that all shall be placed on an equality—that all shall deserve well of the country for having worked well for the country. It is not, perhaps, now my duty to go into the question of the future, but I may suggest this: that it would be very advisable if some arrangement could be come to now as to the position and the duties and the salaries of the present tenants of office under the Land Commission, because that would undoubtedly facilitate future arrangements, and the taxpayer would be advantaged, in that he would obtain the services of gentlemen best qualified to act under these Acts. As a last point, I would venture to draw attention to this: that unless some arrangement is come to, and if Mr. Wrench and Mr. Fitzgerald, who are now the Fair Rent Commissioners, were to resign or die, there is no provision as to whether or not their successors should be appointed at the same salary of £3,000 a year—in my opinion too high a salary.

Amendment moved, in page 17, line 12, to leave out from (“Fund”) to the end of the sub-section and insert—

“(a.) Each of the existing land commissioners other than the judicial land commissioners shall be entitled either to a salary of two thousand five hundred pounds and the like pension or superannuation allowance as if his service as land commissioner under any previous Act and under this Act were service in the permanent civil service of the State within the meaning of section seventeen of the Superannuation Act, 1859, or to a salary of three thousand pounds without any pension or superannuation allowance.

(b.) Subject to the provisions of this Act with respect to the existing land commissioners, each of the land commissioners other than a judicial land commissioner shall be appointed by Her Majesty, and shall hold his office by the same tenure as if he were a county court judge, and shall receive such annual salary, not exceeding two thousand pounds, as the Treasury may assign.

(c.) Service as a land commissioner other than a judicial land commissioner shall, in the case of a commissioner appointed after the commencement of this Act, be deemed to be service in the permanent civil service of the State within the meaning of section seventeen of the Superannuation Act, 1859.”—(The Lord Castletown.)

*EARL CADOGAN: The noble Lord wishes to ventilate this matter, and I was extremely anxious not to interrupt him in any way, but I may be allowed to remark that there is some limitation to the clauses which it is within the power of this House to discuss. There are, as the noble Lord well knows, certain privileged clauses, as they are termed, relating to questions of salaries and so forth. With matters of salaries, superannuation pensions, and so on this House is not competent to deal. I, therefore, trust that the noble Lord will not persevere in his Amendment.

should re-consider this matter, and, if necessary, deal with it on Report.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I do not think that what my noble and learned Friend anticipates would probably occur, because, at the end of the clause, provision is made for cases where the judicial rent is not fixed.

*LORD MORRIS: The judicial rent, in many parts of the West of Ireland, has been a mere matter of book-keeping, and has had no practical effect whatever.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: Your Lordships were told in this House that a judicial rent was going to be paid. I am sorry to say that that is not the case, but we might anticipate that the judicial rent would at any rate be a reasonable rent. There has, no doubt, been a tremendous carving down of rents. Where a judicial rent has not been fixed, we may take it that the rent is fair. And remember, the tenant is getting, at any rate, 20 per cent. reduction for the first five years, and the landlord must be a very liberal man who will give him, on a judicial rent, 20 per cent. reduction. But if there is not a judicial rent fixed, this clause arranges that the purchaser can apply to the Land Commission to determine what the annual value is to be. It is not in the interest of the landlord that I am moving to omit these words; it is, I think, in the interests of the tenant, because, though great pressure may be brought upon him, and offers made to him of an immediate advantage during the five years, which after the five years he would be put to great inconvenience, he will only get his annual value fixed for five years; and if there is collusion between the landlord and tenant, the latter will, after all, pay a higher price at the end of the five years; he would come under what is called the "normal annuity."

*LORD MORRIS: The omission of these words will be practically another way of arriving at the judicial rent.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: The judicial rent is not the matter we are upon. The question before the House is to leave out the words "the average abatement allowed by the landlord." I am sure all your Lordships will be of opinion that the speeches we have heard show that the annual value is a very difficult thing to understand, and that certainly this particular element in the calculation is open to a great many objections. One objection is, as has been said by both the noble Lords opposite, that there is opportunity for collusion. I would like to repeat what I said before, that I hope the Amendment will be deferred, so that we may discuss the whole matter on Report.

EARL CADOGAN: I beg to join in the advice which the noble Earl opposite has given. I certainly myself was disposed to favour the Amendment of my noble Friend, and I still think that, on the whole, his argument will probably prevail; but I am bound to say that after the speech of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Morris) it is obviously necessary that this House should take further time to consider the matter. I trust the noble Lord will not object to withdraw his Amendment, and let it be discussed on the Report stage.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am very glad to hear the noble Earl say that this is a matter which requires further consideration. I really think the point raised by the noble and learned Lord opposite, which had occurred to myself, is a very serious one. Of course, if there is danger of collusion, that is not to be lightly set aside, I admit; but, on the other hand, it certainly has been the opinion of many competent persons (though I am not going to raise that argument now) that under Clause 7 the payment for five years will press hardly upon the tenant, and tend to impede sales. That seems to me to be a most cogent argument. It is impossible, I think, to deny that the noble and learned Lord made a very serious objection when he said that under the operation of this Amendment the annual rent—I do not mean the rent nominally due from the tenant, but the rent which he actually pays—would not be taken into account, but that his nominal rent would be reckoned for the five years, so that, instead of having to pay less, as you intended, he would have to pay more. If that be the operation, I am quite sure that noble Lords who wish well to the Bill—including the noble Marquess himself—would hesitate before they would introduce such an Amendment. I am certain that the noble Marquess, as well as any one else, desires that there should be nothing to impede the operation of the Bill, and that, as far as possible, we should ensure that both members of the permanently organised staff, why should they be cut out?

LORD HERSCHELL: I, of course, entertain great respect for this proposed Amendment, inasmuch as it is inspired by the Treasury—it is at any rate a Treasury Amendment. My difficulty is in understanding it from a Treasury point of view. There must be, no doubt, an explanation of it. But, as under this provision the Treasury is one of the parties to determine that these persons are necessary, and the best qualified to be appointed to the permanent organisation of the office, and none of these persons can be appointed unless the Treasury think them necessary and the best qualified, why the Treasury should have any objection to a provision which never can come into effect unless they think somebody to be a necessary person for a post, and the best qualified for it, I am rather at a loss to understand.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: Suppose the words from “including” to “1885” in the second and third lines of Sub-section 7 were omitted, your Lordships will see that would be the normal scope of the clause. Then it would read—and so on. That would be its normal operation. The reason that it is proposed to be altered is one which will be readily understood by the noble Earl opposite, who was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The Land Commission, although employing the Assistant Commissioners, do not appoint them; they are appointed by the Lord Lieutenant. Therefore, there was a question as to whether the Assistant Commissioners who were so employed would come within the definition; and to meet that it was thought wise to say, “including assistant commissioners,” to avoid all possibility of doubt. Then I think an hon. Member in the other House suggested to add other gentlemen, as to whom they were there was no vestige of doubt as to the fact that they were employed under and by the Land Commission. It would be inexpedient not only from the Treasury, but from another, point of view to go on adding names without any necessity, when there are a great number of other classes who are equally entitled to be named as the Inspectors. It is not suggested or intended to give an exhaustive list of those whom it may be necessary and desirable to be employed by the Lord Lieutenant and those whom he consults; and the only reason for naming Assistant Commissioners here was to prevent the possibility of a vestige of doubt under the circumstances. It is obviously not desirable to pick out one class like the Inspectors and place them on some special pinnacle apart from others; that would lead to exaggerated hopes in their minds and great depression in the minds of others who are left out.

“Such of the persons employed by the Land Commission as the Lord Lieutenant, the Land Commission, and the Treasury determine to be necessary, and best qualified for the permanent organisation of the staff.”

LORD HERSCHELL: If that is the object, it could have been made perfectly apparent by a little difference in the drafting. If these persons are not employed by the Land Commission, it seems to me very inappropriate to say—who are not employed. One would think it would have been all straight and intelligible if it read—and so forth.

“Assistant commissioners and inspectors, and such of the persons employed by the Land Commission,”

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: As an irenicon in this somewhat heated Debate, may I suggest to your Lordships that this is a purely financial clause, and that we cannot deal with it at all?

*EARL CADOGAN: After what my noble Friend has said, I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

*THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: The Amendment standing in my name is one that will be appreciated by those noble Lords who, like myself, have occupied the post of Representative of Her Majesty in Ireland, and who are, therefore, fully cognisant of the difficulties that occur with regard to the patronage belonging to that office. I am sure they will endorse my remarks when I say that it places the Commissioners in an extremely unfair position to ask them to perform the somewhat invidious task of making selections from men with whom they have been associated, and with whom they are working.

Amendment moved, in page 17, line 34, to leave out ("the Land Commission.")
—(The Earl Vane [M. Londonderry].)

*EARL SPENCER: I am not sure whether the remark of the noble Marquess the Prime Minister applies to this Amendment as well as the other, though it is in the same clause. I do not agree with the noble Marquess who has just spoken, for I think it would be exceedingly unjust to the Land Commission if they were not allowed to be consulted with regard to the organisation of the staff of which they know all the members. The Land Commissioners are probably the only people, or very nearly the only people, who are cognisant of all the merits of the individuals, and I believe in all matters of organisation it is usual for the heads of the Court to be consulted as to the members who work under them. I therefore sincerely trust the noble Marquess will not press this Amendment.

*EARL CADOGAN: The noble Earl has said that it would be very unjust to the Land Commission that they should not be consulted. At the same time, I think it would be equally unjust to impose upon them what would evidently be very invidious duties. That is the view that was taken by all those who had the best opportunity of expressing an opinion. I shall advise the House to accept the Amendment.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I would like to have heard whether this was the view of the Land Commissioners themselves. I never before heard of a Department objecting to have cast upon them the duty of selecting the staff they shall employ. If the Land Commissioners themselves think this would be an invidious task, which they would rather not have to perform, that might be some reason for the Amendment; but unless we are told that that is so I agree with the noble Earl (Spencer) that it would be a most extraordinary thing to pass them over; it would be contrary, I should say, to all established practice, and most unfair.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: I hope the noble Marquess will not press this Amendment. It would be an invidious thing that the Land Commissioners should be deprived of a voice in the selection of the staff.

*LORD MORRIS: I think the clause as it stands would be unworkable. Suppose the Land Commission and the Treasury differ, what is to happen? I do not know that other Public Boards—the Local Government Board, for instance—are entitled to decide upon the selection of their officers; that is done by the Chief Secretary and the Lord Lieutenant, who, of course, are governed very much by the representations of the Department responsible for the business. It would be very hard, I think, on a representation being made to the Lord Lieutenant by a Department, that they wanted particular officers appointed, if the Lord Lieutenant were not to give full weight to that representation. But it is quite another thing that the Land Commission should be placed on an equal footing with the Lord Lieutenant. I hope the noble Marquess will persevere with his Amendment.

LORD HERSCHELL: If I am rightly informed, this provision was in the Bill as introduced by the Government and read a second time last year. It did not appear in the Bill as introduced this year, but it was proposed on the Report stage of the present Bill, and accepted by the Government. I trust that the Government will not take a different course in this House from that which they took in the other House, and accept an Amendment to strike out that which in the other House they accepted an Amendment to put in.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: Whatever took place between the other House, I take it that the matter is now before your Lordships to be considered on its merits, and your Lordships will decide what in your view is the best way of making this a workable clause. My noble Friend (Lord Morris) has given very powerful reasons why the Amendment should be adopted. As my noble Friend said, if there is a difference of opinion between the Land Commission and the Lord Lieutenant and the Treasury, is there to be a deadlock, or what is to happen? Surely the Lord Lieutenant, with those who advise him, is quite competent to receive any representations from the Land Commission, and then to act upon his own responsibility. I feel sure that it would be the feeling of the Land Commissioners themselves that they should be spared the very invidious task of making selections from men who have been their colleagues and working under them.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I observe that the noble and learned Lord did not say that he knew, but only that he assumed, that the Land Commissioners wished to be relieved from what he calls this invidious task. If I am not incorrectly informed, just the opposite is the fact, and that they do not wish to be relieved from the task. However, I do not want to repeat what I said before, but I would point out this: that it really places this House in a very awkward position indeed, and it seems to me very inconsistent with the usual course of Public Business, and on general grounds extremely inconvenient, that the Government should in one House accept an Amendment and then in the other House turn round and re-consider the question and strike out the words that they had previously agreed to. I can quite understand, and everybody admits, that it is necessary sometimes for a Government, after they have yielded to pressure and accepted an Amendment in one House, to re-consider their determination when the measure comes up to this House. But the noble Lord opposite puts it on a totally different ground. He actually says that the clause is now to be considered by the Government absolutely on its merits—the Government having already considered the clause on its merits in the other House and assented to its introduction into the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I must repudiate most energetically the doctrine laid down by the noble Earl. It is a doctrine which would have the effect of effacing this House altogether. The view of the noble Earl is that if the Government accept from others an Amendment in the other House, the effect of it is not only to bind those who sit on the Benches opposite to maintain the Amendment, but to bind us who sit here to use in its support all the influence which we may possess in this House. I utterly repudiate that doctrine. There is no precedent for it at all, and I think it is distinctly opposed to the independence of this House. Anything, of course, that the Cabinet resolve upon and announce in one House, the Cabinet are bound to maintain in the other House; but what is done in the course of debate—under pressure, as the noble Earl said—

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I did not say under pressure.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The noble Earl certainly mentioned something about acting under pressure.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I said it might be necessary under pressure to take another view in this House.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Pressure is not unknown in the other House of Parliament. It may be necessary in the other House to take a certain view under pressure; or a course may be agreed to upon statements made in debate, and subsequent information may necessitate a re-consideration of that course. I think it would be exceedingly inconvenient if that kind of rigidity was applied to all the decisions which may be come to in the course of debate, and if it were held that the Government, having accepted an alteration of this kind, trivial in its character, in one House, it should to be absolutely precluded from taking, in the other House, such a different view as further reflection may seem to render advisable.

LORD HERSCHELL: However much one may admit the force of what the noble Marquess has said, surely if an Amendment is accepted—not under pressure, but without demur—in one House some weighty reasons ought to be given why in the other House the Government departs from the position it has taken up. No doubt, if it be shown that some event has occurred which upon the mind of the Government overweigh the impression produced at the moment by statements in the one House, I do not in the least dispute that that would be reason for their altering their course in the other House. But in the present case nothing of the kind was stated. The noble Earl in assenting to the Amendment certainly did not profess to give any such grounds for the different conclusion at which the Government had arrived. Now, my Lords, is there really any strong ground for this alteration? I venture to suggest, in the first place, that it is contrary to the ordinary practice not to give the heads of Departments some voice with regard to the subordinates who are to work the Department with them, and that no Department can possibly work well if the subordinates are appointed without any consultation with the chiefs with whom they will have to work. But then it is said that there may be some difference among these co-ordinate authorities, and that that would lead to a deadlock. How many appointments have now to be made by heads of Departments in consultation with the Treasury? You may just as well have a deadlock with two as with three authorities. But the truth is, you do not have any deadlock; people are too sensible, and these arrangements generally work well enough.

*EARL CADOGAN: I have a proposal to lay before your Lordships, which may perhaps to some extent soothe the feelings of noble Lords opposite. I ventured to state in reply, I think, to a question, that I had some reason to think that the Commissioners themselves took the view which is embodied in this Amendment. The noble Earl (Kimberley) has informed us that he has strong reasons for thinking that the reverse is the case. What we propose is, that we should postpone the consideration of this Amendment till the Report stage, to enable us to obtain the opinions and the wishes of the Land Commissioners upon the point.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: That course is entirely satisfactory to us.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN: The object of the Amendment I now beg to move is to disenable any person who may be employed as an Assistant Commissioner after the passing of the Act from being at the same time employed as an Inspector or Valuer. It is possible—I do not say it is probable—that an Assistant Commissioner might be sent down to some part of the country as valuer to value the land in that district, and that eventually he might be appointed to the same district to act as Assistant Commissioner or Judge; in other words, he would be taking the part of Judge and jury at the same time. I think that would not be for the public good, and I therefore trust that the Government will assent to the Amendment.

Amendment moved, in page 28, line 6, after ("fund"), to insert—

"Provided, however, that any person who shall be employed or appointed after the passing of this Act as an assistant commissioner or valuer under the provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, shall ipso facto be disqualified from being thereafter appointed or employed as an inspector or valuer under the Land Purchase Acts; and that any person appointed or employed after the passing of this Act as an inspector or valuer under the Land Purchase Acts, shall in like manner be thereby disqualified from being appointed or employed as an assistant commissioner or valuer under the provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881."—(The Marquess of Abercorn [Duke of Abercorn].)

*EARL CADOGAN: The Government cannot accept the Amendment. It is, in fact, diametrically opposed to the policy involved in the Bill. Under these clauses, as my noble Friend is aware, an amalgamation is effected between the two sets of Commissioners—the Commissioners of 1881 and those of 1885. This Amendment would have the effect of still more separating the two classes than they were before. It would be a direct negative to our clause, and therefore we cannot accept it.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 24.

LORD CASTLETOWN: I need not delay your Lordships long in explaining the object of my next Amendment. In the sale of an estate and the distribution of the proceeds the exercise of a double jurisdiction would inevitably result in very serious mistakes and possibly great loss to owners and others. The Commissioner under whose jurisdiction the sale of an estate passes should be the person who should deal with each step as it comes forward. There are 13 or 14 different steps in passing an estate through, and it is obviously essential that the Commissioner in whose Chambers that estate is should deal with the whole of those steps. I have myself gone through the whole of the business—I may say that I am almost an expert now in land purchase—and I am absolutely convinced that this Amendment ought to become part of the Bill.

Amendment moved, in page 18, line 29, after ("advances") to insert ("and all duties and functions consequent thereon.")—(The Lord Castletown.)

*EARL CADOGAN: I am afraid this is too wide a clause. I think it would have the effect of excluding the 1881 Commissioners from all participation in any of these decisions. They could not even take part in making Rules. The exclusion is undoubtedly too wide.

LORD CASTLETOWN: They might take part in the land purchase business as soon as they have done with their fair-rent appeals. Let them get that work completed, and then they can go into the other business.

*EARL CADOGAN: How about making Rules?

LORD CASTLETOWN: My words are "duties and functions."

*EARL CADOGAN: I am advised that the making of Rules would be included under those words.

LORD CASTLETOWN: I do not think they would.

LORD HERSCHELL: I would suggest that the object might be carried out by putting in the words "the duty of sanctioning advances, and the duties and functions consequent thereon."

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: It would not, I think, be desirable to limit it in that way. It might lead to a good deal of inconvenience. Now that this large scheme of land purchase embodied in the Bill is so soon to become law, and when the Commission is made permanent, it might work out inconveniently to exclude any portion of the Commission from taking part in any of the work that might be ready to be discharged by them. As matter of debate and compromise in the other House it was put in here that the duty of sanctioning advances to purchasers should be discharged exclusively by the 1885 Commissioners until the fair-rent appeals to a given date had been disposed of; but I do not think it is at all desirable to exclude any members of the Land Commission from any portion of the work. It might lead to an administrative deadlock. If there was time on the hands of the other Commissioners to take their part in doing certain work, surely it would not be to the public convenience to preclude them from doing it. This clause was accepted as satisfactory in the House of Commons, and I think it is undesirable to alter it.

LORD CASTLETOWN: I cannot agree with the noble and learned Lord. He has not gone through the land purchase mill as I have, and I do not think he knows the very great difficulties that may arise unless some such arrangement as I suggest (I do not pin myself to the particular words) is carried through.

Amendment negatived.

*THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: I have an Amendment to propose which will provide that the 1885 Commissioners shall be brought in as at a certain date, whereas, as the clause stands at present, they would come in as originally appointed in 1881.

Amendment moved, in page 18, line 37, to leave out ("been named in") and insert ("then been appointed under.")—(The Earl Vane [Marquess of Londonderry].)

Amendment agreed to.

LORD CASTLETOWN: The next Amendment standing in my name deals with the question of rules. I shall very likely be told that it is unnecessary, but I believe it is absolutely necessary. I need not detain your Lordships with any further explanation of it.

Amendment moved,

In page 19, after line 3, to insert as a new sub-section—"The general rules and orders which shall be in force at the commencement of this Act in relation to the acquisition of land by tenants shall, until expressly varied by rules to be made as hereinafter provided, remain and be in force in all proceedings under the Land Purchase Acts, as amended by this Act, in the same manner in all respects as if they had been rules made under this Act."—(The Lord Castletown.)

*EARL CADOGAN: I cannot lay claim to any legal or drafting knowledge, but I should have thought that under all circumstances rules would remain in force until they were expressly varied. The noble Lord did not explain his Amendment, and I confess that I do not understand it.

LORD CASTLETOWN: The object is to keep up the continuance and sequence in the working of the Act. Certain arrangements have been made under the 1885 and the 1887 Acts which will keep the whole machinery going. My suggestion is that those arrangements should not be altered. You are now constituting a new Commission; they will undoubtedly alter the Rules, and will make a deadlock at the very beginning of the work. My object is to make your Bill workable by providing that the Rules at present in existence shall go on moving the wheels until you are ready to provide other machinery. This is a very simple and a very logical Amendment.

*EARL CADOGAN: Then, as I understand it, the whole Amendment turns on the word "expressly," because undoubtedly the Rules will remain in force until they are varied.

LORD CASTLETOWN: I think you will find that very likely the Rules will be varied very soon after the Commissioners are appointed. My object is that they shall remain in force until they are found to be wrong.

*EARL CADOGAN: Surely they would remain in force.

LORD CASTLETOWN: Then there can be no objection to the Amendment.

*EARL CADOGAN: Except that it is unnecessary.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: There is some feeling in Ireland with regard to these Rules. The purchasing public have some idea that the Rules in force under the Ashbourne Act will be under this Act more or less dropped. The object of the Amendment is merely to retain the Rules at present in operation until such time as they are replaced by other Rules. If my noble Friend will accept the Amendment, it can at any rate do no harm. If in the middle of sanctioning purchases the Rules happened to be changed, it would be a serious matter for the parties concerned. I think most distinctly that the Rules should remain in force until there is some reason for changing them.

*EARL CADOGAN: I still think the Amendment is unnecessary, but, as the noble Lord seems to set great store by it, I am willing to accept it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

LORD CASTLETOWN: I think the Government might very safely accept the short Amendment which I now move. Its object is to ensure that the powers which are conferred under the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, shall not be delegated to Sub-Commissioners under the present Bill.

Amendment moved, after Clause 24, to insert as a new Clause—

("The powers conferred on the land commissioners under the forty-third and forty-fourth sections of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, shall not apply to the discharge of duties arising under the Land Purchase Acts.")—(The Lord Castletown.)

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: My noble Friend will remember that in the Act of 1881 there were sale and purchase clauses, and that the Commissioners have power to delegate their functions to the Sub-Commissioners. Having had some experience of the Sub-Commissioners—a somewhat rather unpleasant experience at times—we are anxious that, at any rate, the Chief Commissioners should not delegate their functions under this Bill to the Sub-Commissioners. I do not think my noble Friend would be anxious that they should do so. They have the power of doing it under the Act of 1881.

*EARL CADOGAN: We will accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clauses 25, 26, and 27 agreed to.

Clause 28.

*LORD MORRIS: I have an Amendment to propose in regard to the constitution of the Congested Districts Board. Under the Bill the Board is to consist of the Chief Secretary and of a member of the Land Commission nominated by the Lord Lieutenant, to especially represent agriculture and forestry, and of five unofficial members. I propose to make the Chief Secretary and the Land Commissioner ex officio members of the Board. This will also necessitate the omission of the word "unofficial."

Amendments moved, in page 20, line 26, after ("forestry") insert ("and who shall be ex officio members of the board"), and leave out ("unofficial") and insert ("other"); line 31, leave out ("unofficial"), and after ("members") insert ("other than the ex officio members").—(The Lord Morris.)—Agreed to.

LORD MONTEAGLE or BRANDON: I have a series of Amendments, intended to alter the balance of the members composing this Board. As the Bill comes up to us, it provides that, in addition to the two ex officio members and the five permanent members, there shall be two or more persons, not exceeding five, appointed as temporary members. That seems to me to be an undue proportion, and I propose to make the number of temporary members three instead of five.

Amendments moved :—(1) in page 20, line 31, to leave out ("two") and insert ("one"); (2) in line 32, to leave out ("five") and insert ("three"); (3) in line 39, to leave out ("any") and insert ("such") and leave out ("of the Board.") — (The Lord Monteagle of Brandon.)

*EARL CADOGAN: We cannot agree to the third Amendment. The substitution of the word "such" for "any" would appear to give the control entirely to the permanent members.

LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON: The object is to prevent the temporary members forming a quorum by themselves. The words may not carry out the notion properly, but some provision of the kind is certainly necessary.

*EARL CADOGAN: I will consider it before Report.

First two Amendments agreed to; third Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 29 amended (verbally), and agreed to.

Clause 30.

*LORD HARLECH: I have a small Amendment to move, which I hope the noble Earl will accept. In line 38, of page 21, there is the expression "number of the population." How is the number of the population to be ascertained? In order to make it clear, I beg to move the insertion of the words "according to the last preceding census."

Amendment moved, in page 21, line 38, after the word ("population,") to insert the words ("according to the last preceding census.")—(The Lord Harlech.)

*EARL CADOGAN: We have no objection to that.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 31.

LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON: The object of my Amendment to this clause is to give an alternative power to the Land Commission, in cases where it is sought to amalgamate holdings and the neighbouring occupiers are not willing at the moment to facilitate the operation, to go in, as the landlord himself would do in similar cases, and take possession of it themselves.

Amendment moved, in page 22, line 39, after ("holding") to insert ("or to the Land Commission.")—(The Lord Monteagle of Brandon.)

*EARL CADOGAN: We agree to that.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I think we should like to hear some explanation of these Amendments. A good many of them are agreed to without any explanation at all. We do not understand what the effect of this Amendment will be. I only gathered that the Land Commission was to become the landlord of certain holdings. I should be glad to know why the Amendment is to be adopted.

*EARL CADOGAN: The noble Lord himself gave reasons for his Amendment.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: What we really wanted to know was, why Her Majesty's Government agreed to it?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: For the reasons given by the noble Lord.

Amendment agreed to.

*LORD HARLECH: The Amendment I rise to move proposes to make advances for the purpose of purchasing tenant's interests in small holdings. According to the clause, it does not appear where the landlord's rent is to stand, whether it is to have priority over the annuity payable for the tenant's interest, or whether it is to rank after it. No landlord in the world would consent, that his rent should stand after the payment of the instalment on the tenant's interest. Therefore, the effect of the clause would be perfectly null and void. I want by these words to make it clear that the annuity is to be subject to the prior charge of the rent. In the clause the words are "other charges." Rent is not a charge; it is an incident of the holding, and, moreover, the rent of both holdings must be provided for unless it is the intention

England boys, and that no grants are made to boys who are Nonconformists; whether nearly the whole of the income of the charity is devoted to the payment of the salaries of teachers at the national school, though the will of Mrs. Oldfield expressly declares that "the boys should be taught in a school by themselves, and not be sent to public schools;" whether he is aware that while in 1837 there were 235 children educated free of charge, in 1889 the number was only seven, and is now stated to be only five: whether the Charity Commissioners have frequently, since 1855, pointed out to the official trustees that they were acting contrary to the provisions of the foundation, and have endeavoured to rectify their plans by establishing a fresh scheme; whether the original terms of the foundation require that 10 boys at least, boys of labouring men or poor tradesmen, shall be maintained, clothed, and taught in a school by themselves, while the poor boys are not maintained, neither are they taught by themselves; and the money which should, according to the foundation, be applied for those purposes is used for quite a different one; and, whether the Charity Commissioners will institute a searching inquiry into the administration of this trust?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The attention of the Charity Commissioners has been recently directed to the mode of administration of this charity by the Report of their Assistant Commissioner on the charitable endowments of the parish of Denbigh. From that Report, which is so exhaustive as to render further inquiry unnecessary, it would appear that the questions of the hon. Member may be answered substantially in the affirmative. The powers of the Commissioners to frame any scheme providing for the further application of the charity are suspended by Section 11 of the Welsh Intermediate Education Act during the continuance of the powers vested by that Act in the Joint Education Committee of Denbighshire.

LOSS OF THE ROXBURGH CASTLE.

MR. R. POWER (Waterford): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if any inquiry has been held regarding the loss of the ship Roxburgh

Mr. S. Smith

Castle, 1,224 tons register, of Newcastle, through a collision with the ship British Peer; and if it is true that 22 men lost their lives?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Board of Trade ordered a formal inquiry under the Merchant Shipping Acts into the circumstances attending the loss of the Roxburgh Castle, of Newcastle, through collision with the ship British Peer, and by which, I regret to say, 22 lives were lost. But the facts were so fully investigated in the course of the proceedings in the Admiralty Court that it was not thought necessary to proceed with the inquiry.

SEVERE SENTENCE.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of a lad named Edward Lee; on 2nd May, Lee was sentenced in his absence to one month's imprisonment, at the Solihull Police Court, for playing at pitch and toss; on 16th May an application was made for a rehearing of the case, but this was refused, and no information was forthcoming in regard to the warrant of committal; on 17th June the warrant was executed, and Lee is now in gaol; and whether in view of the above circumstances he can see his way to a reduction of the sentence?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have made inquiry into this case. I am informed that no information was asked for with regard to the warrant. The prisoner had been repeatedly convicted of theft and other offences, and it was no doubt in view of those previous convictions that the Magistrates imposed the penalty in question. I was, however, of opinion that the sentence was too severe, and I have advised the remission of a fortnight's imprisonment.

PROCURATOR FISCAL FOR LEWIS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Procurator Fiscal for the Lewis has resigned; and the Depute Procurator Fiscal for the district has been named by the sheriff as his successor; whether the appointment has been confirmed by the Crown; and whether steps have been or are being taken effectually to prevent the holder of the office of public prosecutor from engaging either directly, or by means of a partnership, in private practice.

THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY'S VISIT.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, that as a very large number of Volunteers do not leave their work till two o'clock on Saturdays, and would thus be unable to attend the Review to be held before the Emperor of Germany on Wimbledon Common on the 11th instant, whether arrangements can be made by which the Review can be held an hour later in the afternoon, in order to ensure a full muster of Volunteers?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I am afraid that it is impossible to alter the time of the Review, but, as it will be held in deference to the special wish of the German Emperor to see the Volunteers, it is the desire of the Military Authorities that corps should turn out as strong as possible, and it is therefore hoped that employers of labour will concede to those in their service who have been patriotic enough to join the Volunteer Force as much time on that Saturday as they possibly can, consistently with their business arrangements.

MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether arrangements will be made for Members of Parliament and their wives to witness the Military Review, which is to be held in honour of the Emperor of Germany on Wimbledon Common on the 11th inst. I wish to supplement the question by asking what arrangements will be made for the public?

MR. BRODRICK: The space available is very restricted, and the stand accommodation will therefore be very limited; but I hope it will be found possible to offer facilities to at least a portion of the Members of the House of Commons to view the performance from a stand. The general arrangements are not yet complete, but information will be given as to them as soon as possible.

CARDIFF SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can inform the House what progress has been made in the liquidation of the Cardiff Savings Bank, closed some six years ago, and when it is probable that the depositors will be paid the balance of the deposits due to them; and whether any interest will be allowed on the amounts so long withheld from the depositors?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I have ascertained from the official liquidator of the Cardiff Savings Bank that he has, with the sanction of the Court, accepted the sum of £7,000 in all from seven of the trustees and managers in settlement of any liability that might fall on them. Proceedings are in progress against the president and 26 of the trustees and managers, of whom one has agreed to pay £1,000 in settlement. There is no immediate prospect of the payment of any dividend, and whether any interest will ultimately be paid cannot at present be stated. I may add that I have no control over the liquidation. It is open to anyone interested to ask the official liquidator (who is an officer of the Court) for information, and if dissatisfied with that furnished to apply to the Judge. I would therefore suggest to the hon. Member that if he desires further information on this matter he should make application to the official liquidator.

TRADE UNIONS.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when the Report of Trade Unions will be issued: and whether such Report will comprise the two years 1889 and 1890?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have already informed the hon. Gentleman that the Report, which will be issued shortly, will include the figures for 1889 as well as 1890.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether he can inform the House what the total number of members in Friendly Societies is, and the total amount of funds in hand of the Registered Societies: and, whether it is possible to give such figures in the Annual Report of the Registrar of Friendly Societies?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The particulars asked for by the hon. Member will be furnished in the return moved for by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) in February last, which is about to be circulated. As regards the second paragraph of the hon. Member's question, it was decided in 1879 to publish the returns of Friendly Societies quinquennially instead of annually.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, when the Return relating to Friendly Societies, ordered 9th February, 1891, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. JACKSON: I beg to inform the right hon. Gentleman that the Return in question is very nearly complete, and that it is expected that it will be ready for presentation in a few days.

CONVEYANCE OF LIVE CATTLE.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether, before issuing the Board's intended regulations for the conveyance of live cattle across the Atlantic, he will inform the House of their general scope and effect, and also state in what respects they will differ from, or go beyond, the regulations already made by the Governments of Canada and the United States.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincoln, Sleaford): I am afraid it is not in my power to accede to the request of the hon. Member. It would be impossible for me to lay the regulations on the Table before they are issued, and I am aware of no other means at my disposal by which I could inform the House of

their general scope and effect, and in what respects they will differ from or go beyond the regulations already made by the Governments of Canada and the United States. I may add that in the last statement the hon. Member is in error. Regulations have not been already made by the Government of Canada.

THE CORONER OF NORTHALLERTON.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the conduct of the Coroner of Northallerton, who, on the 28th April, held an inquest on Ann Foggin, who died at Marston Moor on the 26th April; whether the Coroner is bound to transmit a certificate to the Parish Registrar within five days of the inquest; and whether the Coroner has up to the present date neglected to do so, although repeated applications have been made to him by the Parish Registrar and by the Registrar General?

MR. MATTHEWS: I understand from a telegram, which I have to-day received from the Coroner, that the certificate was duly sent to the Registrar, who returned it for correction; and that thereupon delay ensued. I am not able to say on the scanty information before me to what extent the Coroner was responsible for this delay. He informs me that his certificate has now been returned to the Registrar.

PRISON LABOUR.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any contract for the hiring of prison labour by private firms for the manufacture of mats and matting has terminated since the deputation of the trade to him on 4th March; and whether he has seen his way to abolish or suspend that contract system, in accordance with the prayer of the deputation?

MR. MATTHEWS: No contract has terminated since March 4. Whenever a contract expires I shall take the opportunity of reviewing the whole question of the disposal of this form of prison labour, having in view the representations made to me with so much effect by the hon. Member and by the deputation which he introduced to me.

MERCHANDISE MARKS.

MR. QUILTER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that silk piece goods enter our ports with only a detachable ticket to denote the country of origin; and whether he will, under the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act or otherwise, take such steps that the public may know whether they are purchasing articles made from home or foreign made silk?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer this question. There are no provisions in the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, to enforce the marking of silk piece or any other goods on their importation into this country. Provided the tickets borne by the goods do not contain any false trade description of them as defined by the Act, and the goods themselves are not otherwise marked, the Customs officers have no power to interfere. Should, however, the silk piece goods have woven in them any wording or mark which amounted to a false trade description or otherwise offended against the Act, the qualification by means of detachable tickets would not be accepted by the Customs. A Parliamentary Committee recently inquired into the working of the Merchandise Marks Act, and they did not recommend that any alteration should be made in the law to compel the compulsory marking of goods.

THE ORKNEY MAILS.

MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will state what is the amount of subsidy paid for carrying the mails to the North Isles of Orkney; how many times a week is the present contractor required to send the mails; and whether the present contractor has been asked to send an offer for carrying the mails three times a week; if so, did he send an offer, and for how much?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The annual subsidy is £160 for a service by steamer twice a week. The contractor has offered to provide for a service three times a week for three months, six months, or twelve months, the additional payment demanded being £100, £200, and £400 a year respectively. The expenditure is already much in excess of the revenue from the correspondence, but I will consider whether, under the special circumstances of the case, I can authorise any increase in the frequency of the service.

IMPRISONMENT OF A JERSEY EDITOR.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he is aware that, on 16th March, Mr. Reynolds, editor of a newspaper in Jersey, was condemned to pay £50 damages, and £15 18s. 6d. costs, in respect to a libel published in the newspaper of which he was editor; and that, being unable to pay these sums, he has since been confined in prison as a debtor, where he will apparently pass the rest of his life unless some steps are taken by the right hon. Gentleman; and whether, in view of this fact, and of the facts which have been submitted to him, he is in a position to interfere in order to affect the release of Mr. Reynolds.

MR. MATTHEWS: Mr. Reynolds, editor of a newspaper in Jersey, was adjudged, by a decree of the Royal Court of Jersey, to pay £50 damages and £15 18s. 6d. costs in respect of a libel published in his newspaper, and, as he did not pay those sums, the aggrieved person exercised the right which the law of Jersey confers of detaining at his own cost the debtor in prison for one year. Mr. Reynolds could, by the law of Jersey, be sooner released by a decree of the Royal Court granting him the benefits of a cessio bonorum, which are allowed to a debtor who is "unfortunate and of good faith." Mr. Reynolds twice applied for such a decree, but failed to satisfy the Court that he was entitled to it. I have no power to interfere in a matter which is within the province of the Civil Courts of Jersey, who have, as I am informed, acted regularly and in accordance with law.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman do something towards inducing the people of Jersey to do away with imprisonment for debt?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is no part of my duty to recommend legislation.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (BLIND AND DEAF) BILL.

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, when it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring on the Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf) Bill, so as to carry out the Report of the Royal Commission?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): My hon. Friend is aware that the Bill to which he refers has passed all its stages in another place, and I should be very glad if it could be placed upon the Statute Book this year; but looking to the period of the Session at which we have arrived, and to the fact that certain provisions of the Bill are likely to be opposed, I am afraid it is not probable that it will be proceeded with in the next few weeks.

BRUSSELS ANTI-SLAVERY ACT.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what Powers have, up to the present, ratified the General Act and Customs Declaration of the Brussels Anti-Slavery Conference; and, in case England has not yet ratified, will the question be submitted to discussion and decision of the British Houses of Parliament?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Representatives of the Powers who are parties to the Anti-Slavery Act of Brussels will immediately meet to exchange Ratifications, and it cannot be stated in advance how many of them will do so, nor can it be at present stated what course Her Majesty's and other Governments will take in consequence of the results of the meeting. Great Britain has ratified. The General Act has been before Parliament since November last.

ALBANY STREET BARRACKS.

LORD HENRY BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War why the barracks in Albany Street, Regent's Park, are to be rebuilt, and not the officers' quarters; whether he is aware that the whole building is in a very dilapidated state; that the cellars and servants' kitchens are damp and unwholesome, and that disinfecting powder has to be freely used to combat the smells below; and that as regards sanitary arrangements, such as we understand at present, there are none; and whether he will allow an inquiry to be ordered, as these quarters, being so close to the Regent's Canal, suffer mostly during the hot weather from the stagnant water?

MR. BRODRICK: The Regent's Park Barracks will not be rebuilt, but great improvements will be made, in which the officers' quarters and mess-room will be included. The building, though old, is not dilapidated; the basement rooms are dark, and not such as would now be constructed, but they will not be used as living rooms. Proximity to the Regent's Canal is undoubtedly inconvenient, but the building is considerably above the water level. The whole sanitary arrangements and drainage of the barracks will be reconstructed, and the Military Authorities are perfectly satisfied with the proposed alterations.

DISTURBANCES IN OPOBO.

MR. WHITLEY (Liverpool, Everton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government have any information as to reported disturbances in the interior of Opobo; and what steps, if any, they have taken for the protection of life and property?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have received a telegram from the Acting Consul reporting a disturbance in the interior, some little distance behind the town of Opobo, at a place called Aqueta, where European factories have been established. The rising seems to have been suppressed, and no further danger is apparently apprehended. The Acting Consul and some of the police are said to have been wounded; but he does not ask for assistance, nor does the wound seem to be serious. Two British men-of-war are going to the Oil Rivers to meet Major Macdonald, and will be available if required.

POSTAL ACCOMMODATION IN SHETLAND.

MR. LYELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is prepared to give effect to the petition of fish-curers and inhabitants of Baltasound, Shetland, in which they beg that a post and telegraph office may not be established at Squarefield, the house of the newly-appointed postmaster; and whether he will require the new office to be in premises which are not licensed for the sale of intoxicating drinks?

*MR. RAIKES: I understand that Mr. Anderson, who has been nominated by the Lords of the Treasury to the situation of Sub-Postmaster at Baltasound, does not propose to conduct Post Office business in the premises in which the licensed grocer's business with which he is connected is carried on; and, in these circumstances, I see no reason, as I stated in answer to the hon. Member's question on the 1st instant, for refusing to give effect to the nomination. As far as I can gather, the premises where the new office is to be established will be generally convenient.

THE SHENSTONE SCHOOL.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the evidence given in the inquest on the body of James Harry Russell, aged eight years and nine months, in which it was stated that the lad had been hit about the head with a strap and a stick by the schoolmaster of the Shenstone School, near Lichfield; and whether it is the intention of the Education Department to take any action in reference to this matter?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I am unable to answer the question at the present moment. Perhaps the hon. Member will be good enough to put it off until Monday.

ROYAL NIGER COMPANY'S TERRITORY.

MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government have arranged or are negotiating for the acquisition of any territory from the Royal Niger Chartered Company; and, if so, of what territory?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer the question. No. An arrangement is being made for defining a frontier between the two British Protectorates of the Niger and the Oil Rivers for the convenience of administration. The arrangement will not diminish the area assigned to the Chartered Company.

THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government is acquainted with the stipulations contained in the Treaty just signed between Germany, Austria, and France; whether the Marquis Rudini was correct in stating, on 29th June, in the course of a Debate in the Italian Chamber upon the expediency of Italy joining the Triple Alliance, that some years ago there had been an exchange of views between Italy and Great Britain, and that the two countries had proposed to co-operate for the maintenance of peace and the status quo; in what year this exchange of views took place; against what Power or Powers this co-operation was aimed; and whether the co-operation between this country and Italy for the maintenance of peace and the status quo was outside the General European concert for these objects?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have no information with respect to the stipulations contained in the Treaty which is said to have been signed between Germany, Austria, and Italy. The Marquis Rudini is reported to have expressed his concurrence in the description which has been given on the part of Her Majesty's Government of the exchange of views which has from time to time taken place between the Governments of Great Britain and Italy. Her Majesty's Government have no doubt that the Marquis Rudini has also correctly described it. They are not yet in possession of the text of His Excellence's speech, but, as has been repeatedly stated, any measures to be taken in case of need for the maintenance of the status quo in the Mediterranean would be a matter for consideration according to the circumstances of the case, and any employment of Her Majesty's Forces would, as heretofore, depend upon the estimate of those circumstances entertained by Her Majesty's Government. The exchange of views has been occasional, but there has been no change of any kind in our attitude from that which I defined in my reply to regard to it, and I ascertained that there was a strong feeling in Keighley in its favour, and no opposition to it whatever. We could not ascertain that there was a single person in the Borough of Keighley who objected to the clause. We had the evidence of the Mayor, who was surely entitled to speak for the inhabitants to that effect, and I do not know how the Police and Sanitary Committee are to discharge their duties if they are not to be guided by the opinion of the localities. The hon. Member says that the clause was not put to the Committee. He is mistaken. No clause is ever passed without being put to the Committee. I put this clause, and there was one dissentient voice, but the hon. Member for a Division of Yorkshire refused to take a Division. I myself have had terrible experience of scarlet fever owing to there being no supervision over laundries, and the inhabitants of Keighley could do nothing better than have this clause. I trust that the House will support the decision of the Police and Sanitary Committee, who work very hard during many months of the year.

*(3.35.) MR. F. S. POWELL: Having served on the Police and Sanitary Committee for some years, I think it is only right that I should defend the conduct of the Chairman of the Committee to which the Bill was sent, and say that there never was a Chairman less inclined to force his views on a Committee. The hon. Member for Crewe (Mr. M'Laren) says he does not think that the Corporation of Keighley care for this clause. I happen to know to the contrary, because I have this day received a communication from the Town Clerk which shows the great interest the inhabitants of Keighley take in the clause, and how they approve it. Nor is the House without precedents for the course now proposed to be taken. Since the rejection of a similar clause last year in the Infectious Disease (Prevention) Bill it has been inserted several times in Local Acts, and between 1889 and 1890 it was inserted no less than eleven times. Keighley is a town in which there is a strong feeling against compulsory vaccination, but the inhabitants are most anxious that their sanitary regulations shall be strengthened, and that they possess every other security for the public safety.

Mr. Hastings

(3.42.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I hope the House will carefully consider what, in this case, has been done by the Police and Sanitary Committee. The question was before the House last year, and by a majority of five to one they determined that it was a clause of a most dangerous character, and rejected it. The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell) talks about precedents. Now, the House inserted a clause of this kind in the Tottenham Local Act, but when the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. J. Howard) had his attention called to the effect of the clause, he at once ascertained that the people of Tottenham were not in favour of it, and it was rejected in another place. The question is whether the Police and Sanitary Committee or this House is to legislate. Surely a decision of the House, arrived at by a majority of five to one, ought to have some consideration paid to it. If you wish to protect the public you must protect them through the laundries. I have never been able to find a case, and I challenge hon. Members to produce one, where infection has been spread from a laundry. I think that people ought to be severely punished who send infected clothes to a laundry. All those who understand the question are agreed in asking the House not to pass the clause.

*(3.50.) MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): As a member of the Police and Sanitary Committee, I should like to say a few words in reference to what took place in the Committee. In justice to the Chairman, I must say that he did put the clause, and I said "No;" but when he asked if I wanted to take a Division, I again said "No." The hon. Member for West Salford (Mr. Lees Knowles) says that the clause is working well in other towns.

MR. LEES KNOWLES: No, I did not say that. I said that a similar clause had been inserted in other local Acts.

*MR. H. J. WILSON: At any rate, no one can bring forward any instance in which this power, though given in several Bills, has ever been put in operation, or has ever resulted in any way beneficially. I therefore think it is a useless, and perhaps an absurd clause; but in accepting the decision of the Committee, I attached great importance to this point: that it is a very different thing for the House to insert a clause in a general Bill applying to the whole country, and for a Committee to insert a clause in a Bill applying to a place like Keighley, where there was a request for it on the part of the Corporation and no opposition whatever. Therefore, although I did not like the clause, I did not carry my objection to a Division.

(3.52.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I am unwilling to enter into the merits of the clause, but, after what the hon. Member for North Camberwell (Mr. Kelly) has said, I feel bound to state, from my own professional knowledge, that diseases have been spread from laundry operations. In this case the Committee took into consideration the unanimous desire of the Corporation of Keighley and the entire absence of any opposition to the clause. It would have been a strange proceeding indeed to have rejected a clause which was unanimously desired by the inhabitants. I am altogether in favour of Home Rule for localities, and I therefore appeal to the House not to yield to the Motion of the hon. Member for Crewe.

MR. M'LAREN: I beg leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Ordered, That Standing Orders 223 and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the third time.—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Bill read the third time, and passed.

QUESTIONS.

BOMBAY ENGINEERS.

MR. MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if the India Office will make inquiry into the refusal of the Government of Bombay to allow native applicants for certificates as engineers in local coasting steamers to be examined in their own native tongue, as is customary in every other country, instead of requiring them to prove to the satisfaction of the examiners that they speak and write English?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): In reply to the question of the hon. Member, I have to say that the Secretary of State has received no official information from India upon this subject. The question of the hon. Member has, however, been forwarded to the Government of Bombay for remark.

THE MANIPUR PRINCES.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is true, as stated in a Reuter's telegram from Simla, that the Government of India will grant the Manipur Princes ample time, say until the end of July, to prepare their appeal, by professional counsel, against sentence lately passed on them; and, in the negative case, will the Secretary of State urge that such facilities should be granted to them?

*SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir; the Government of India have already extended the time within which such representations will be received to the 31st of July.

FAMINE IN MADRAS.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the very serious account of famine in Madras, especially among the lower castes; and what course the Government propose to take.

*SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir; the danger of famine exists in some districts in the Madras Presidency, and it has for some time engaged the careful attention of my noble Friend the Secretary of State. The official telegrams which are received fortnightly show that the Government of Madras are carefully watching the condition of the people, and are taking steps for their relief from famine wherever necessary.

MRS. OLDFIELD'S CHARITY AT DENBIGH.

MR. S. SMITH: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether the attention of the Charity Commissioners has been drawn to the mode in which the charity founded by Mrs. Oldfield at Denbigh is being administered by the trustees, the Bishop of St. Asaph, and the Rector of Denbigh, in the exclusive interests of Church of England boys, and that no grants are made to boys who are Nonconformists; whether nearly the whole of the income of the charity is devoted to the payment of the salaries of teachers at the national school, though the will of Mrs. Oldfield expressly declares that "the boys should be taught in a school by themselves, and not be sent to public schools;" whether he is aware that while in 1837 there were 235 children educated free of charge, in 1889 the number was only seven, and is now stated to be only five: whether the Charity Commissioners have frequently, since 1855, pointed out to the official trustees that they were acting contrary to the provisions of the foundation, and have endeavoured to rectify their plans by establishing a fresh scheme; whether the original terms of the foundation require that 10 boys at least, boys of labouring men or poor tradesmen, shall be maintained, clothed, and taught in a school by themselves, while the poor boys are not maintained, neither are they taught by themselves; and the money which should, according to the foundation, be applied for those purposes is used for quite a different one; and, whether the Charity Commissioners will institute a searching inquiry into the administration of this trust?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The attention of the Charity Commissioners has been recently directed to the mode of administration of this charity by the Report of their Assistant Commissioner on the charitable endowments of the parish of Denbigh. From that Report, which is so exhaustive as to render further inquiry unnecessary, it would appear that the questions of the hon. Member may be answered substantially in the affirmative. The powers of the Commissioners to frame any scheme providing for the further application of the charity are suspended by Section 11 of the Welsh Intermediate Education Act during the continuance of the powers vested by that Act in the Joint Education Committee of Denbighshire.

LOSS OF THE ROXBURGH CASTLE.

MR. R. POWER (Waterford): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if any inquiry has been held regarding the loss of the ship Roxburgh

Mr. S. Smith

Castle, 1,224 tons register, of Newcastle, through a collision with the ship British Peer; and if it is true that 22 men lost their lives?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Board of Trade ordered a formal inquiry under the Merchant Shipping Acts into the circumstances attending the loss of the Roxburgh Castle, of Newcastle, through collision with the ship British Peer, and by which, I regret to say, 22 lives were lost. But the facts were so fully investigated in the course of the proceedings in the Admiralty Court that it was not thought necessary to proceed with the inquiry.

SEVERE SENTENCE.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of a lad named Edward Lee; on 2nd May, Lee was sentenced in his absence to one month's imprisonment, at the Solihull Police Court, for playing at pitch and toss; on 16th May an application was made for a rehearing of the case, but this was refused, and no information was forthcoming in regard to the warrant of committal; on 17th June the warrant was executed, and Lee is now in gaol; and whether in view of the above circumstances he can see his way to a reduction of the sentence?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have made inquiry into this case. I am informed that no information was asked for with regard to the warrant. The prisoner had been repeatedly convicted of theft and other offences, and it was no doubt in view of those previous convictions that the Magistrates imposed the penalty in question. I was, however, of opinion that the sentence was too severe, and I have advised the remission of a fortnight's imprisonment.

PROCURATOR FISCAL FOR LEWIS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Procurator Fiscal for the Lewis has resigned; and the Depute Procurator Fiscal for the district has been named by the sheriff as his successor; whether the appointment has been confirmed by the Crown; and whether steps have been or are being taken effectually to prevent the holder of the office of public prosecutor from engaging either directly, or by means of a partnership, in private practice.

THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY'S VISIT.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, that as a very large number of Volunteers do not leave their work till two o'clock on Saturdays, and would thus be unable to attend the Review to be held before the Emperor of Germany on Wimbledon Common on the 11th instant, whether arrangements can be made by which the Review can be held an hour later in the afternoon, in order to ensure a full muster of Volunteers?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I am afraid that it is impossible to alter the time of the Review, but, as it will be held in deference to the special wish of the German Emperor to see the Volunteers, it is the desire of the Military Authorities that corps should turn out as strong as possible, and it is therefore hoped that employers of labour will concede to those in their service who have been patriotic enough to join the Volunteer Force as much time on that Saturday as they possibly can, consistently with their business arrangements.

MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether arrangements will be made for Members of Parliament and their wives to witness the Military Review, which is to be held in honour of the Emperor of Germany on Wimbledon Common on the 11th inst. I wish to supplement the question by asking what arrangements will be made for the public?

MR. BRODRICK: The space available is very restricted, and the stand accommodation will therefore be very limited; but I hope it will be found possible to offer facilities to at least a portion of the Members of the House of Commons to view the performance from a stand. The general arrangements are not yet complete, but information will be given as to them as soon as possible.

CARDIFF SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can inform the House what progress has been made in the liquidation of the Cardiff Savings Bank, closed some six years ago, and when it is probable that the depositors will be paid the balance of the deposits due to them; and whether any interest will be allowed on the amounts so long withheld from the depositors?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I have ascertained from the official liquidator of the Cardiff Savings Bank that he has, with the sanction of the Court, accepted the sum of £7,000 in all from seven of the trustees and managers in settlement of any liability that might fall on them. Proceedings are in progress against the president and 26 of the trustees and managers, of whom one has agreed to pay £1,000 in settlement. There is no immediate prospect of the payment of any dividend, and whether any interest will ultimately be paid cannot at present be stated. I may add that I have no control over the liquidation. It is open to anyone interested to ask the official liquidator (who is an officer of the Court) for information, and if dissatisfied with that furnished to apply to the Judge. I would therefore suggest to the hon. Member that if he desires further information on this matter he should make application to the official liquidator.

TRADE UNIONS.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when the Report of Trade Unions will be issued: and whether such Report will comprise the two years 1889 and 1890?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have already informed the hon. Gentleman that the Report, which will be issued shortly, will include the figures for 1889 as well as 1890.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether he can inform the House what the total number of members in Friendly Societies is, and the total amount of funds in hand of the Registered Societies: and, whether it is possible to give such figures in the Annual Report of the Registrar of Friendly Societies?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The particulars asked for by the hon. Member will be furnished in the return moved for by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) in February last, which is about to be circulated. As regards the second paragraph of the hon. Member's question, it was decided in 1879 to publish the returns of Friendly Societies quinquennially instead of annually.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, when the Return relating to Friendly Societies, ordered 9th February, 1891, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. JACKSON: I beg to inform the right hon. Gentleman that the Return in question is very nearly complete, and that it is expected that it will be ready for presentation in a few days.

CONVEYANCE OF LIVE CATTLE.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether, before issuing the Board's intended regulations for the conveyance of live cattle across the Atlantic, he will inform the House of their general scope and effect, and also state in what respects they will differ from, or go beyond, the regulations already made by the Governments of Canada and the United States.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincoln, Sleaford): I am afraid it is not in my power to accede to the request of the hon. Member. It would be impossible for me to lay the regulations on the Table before they are issued, and I am aware of no other means at my disposal by which I could inform the House of

their general scope and effect, and in what respects they will differ from or go beyond the regulations already made by the Governments of Canada and the United States. I may add that in the last statement the hon. Member is in error. Regulations have not been already made by the Government of Canada.

THE CORONER OF NORTHALLERTON.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the conduct of the Coroner of Northallerton, who, on the 28th April, held an inquest on Ann Foggin, who died at Marston Moor on the 26th April; whether the Coroner is bound to transmit a certificate to the Parish Registrar within five days of the inquest; and whether the Coroner has up to the present date neglected to do so, although repeated applications have been made to him by the Parish Registrar and by the Registrar General?

MR. MATTHEWS: I understand from a telegram, which I have to-day received from the Coroner, that the certificate was duly sent to the Registrar, who returned it for correction; and that thereupon delay ensued. I am not able to say on the scanty information before me to what extent the Coroner was responsible for this delay. He informs me that his certificate has now been returned to the Registrar.

PRISON LABOUR.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any contract for the hiring of prison labour by private firms for the manufacture of mats and matting has terminated since the deputation of the trade to him on 4th March; and whether he has seen his way to abolish or suspend that contract system, in accordance with the prayer of the deputation?

MR. MATTHEWS: No contract has terminated since March 4. Whenever a contract expires I shall take the opportunity of reviewing the whole question of the disposal of this form of prison labour, having in view the representations made to me with so much effect by the hon. Member and by the deputation which he introduced to me.

MERCHANDISE MARKS.

MR. QUILTER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that silk piece goods enter our ports with only a detachable ticket to denote the country of origin; and whether he will, under the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act or otherwise, take such steps that the public may know whether they are purchasing articles made from home or foreign made silk?

THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer this question. There are no provisions in the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, to enforce the marking of silk piece or any other goods on their importation into this country. Provided the tickets borne by the goods do not contain any false trade description of them as defined by the Act, and the goods themselves are not otherwise marked, the Customs officers have no power to interfere. Should, however, the silk piece goods have woven in them any wording or mark which amounted to a false trade description or otherwise offended against the Act, the qualification by means of detachable tickets would not be accepted by the Customs. A Parliamentary Committee recently inquired into the working of the Merchandise Marks Act, and they did not recommend that any alteration should be made in the law to compel the compulsory marking of goods.

THE ORKNEY MAILS.

MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will state what is the amount of subsidy paid for carrying the mails to the North Isles of Orkney; how many times a week is the present contractor required to send the mails; and whether the present contractor has been asked to send an offer for carrying the mails three times a week; if so, did he send an offer, and for how much?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The annual subsidy is £160 for a service by steamer twice a week. The contractor has offered to provide for a service three times a week for three months, six months, or twelve months, the additional payment demanded being £100, £200, and £400 a year respectively. The expenditure is already much in excess of the revenue from the correspondence, but I will consider whether, under the special circumstances of the case, I can authorise any increase in the frequency of the service.

IMPRISONMENT OF A JERSEY EDITOR.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he is aware that, on 16th March, Mr. Reynolds, editor of a newspaper in Jersey, was condemned to pay £50 damages, and £15 18s. 6d. costs, in respect to a libel published in the newspaper of which he was editor; and that, being unable to pay these sums, he has since been confined in prison as a debtor, where he will apparently pass the rest of his life unless some steps are taken by the right hon. Gentleman; and whether, in view of this fact, and of the facts which have been submitted to him, he is in a position to interfere in order to affect the release of Mr. Reynolds.

MR. MATTHEWS: Mr. Reynolds, editor of a newspaper in Jersey, was adjudged, by a decree of the Royal Court of Jersey, to pay £50 damages and £15 18s. 6d. costs in respect of a libel published in his newspaper, and, as he did not pay those sums, the aggrieved person exercised the right which the law of Jersey confers of detaining at his own cost the debtor in prison for one year. Mr. Reynolds could, by the law of Jersey, be sooner released by a decree of the Royal Court granting him the benefits of a cessio bonorum, which are allowed to a debtor who is "unfortunate and of good faith." Mr. Reynolds twice applied for such a decree, but failed to satisfy the Court that he was entitled to it. I have no power to interfere in a matter which is within the province of the Civil Courts of Jersey, who have, as I am informed, acted regularly and in accordance with law.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman do something towards inducing the people of Jersey to do away with imprisonment for debt?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is no part of my duty to recommend legislation.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (BLIND AND DEAF) BILL.

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, when it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring on the Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf) Bill, so as to carry out the Report of the Royal Commission?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): My hon. Friend is aware that the Bill to which he refers has passed all its stages in another place, and I should be very glad if it could be placed upon the Statute Book this year; but looking to the period of the Session at which we have arrived, and to the fact that certain provisions of the Bill are likely to be opposed, I am afraid it is not probable that it will be proceeded with in the next few weeks.

BRUSSELS ANTI-SLAVERY ACT.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what Powers have, up to the present, ratified the General Act and Customs Declaration of the Brussels Anti-Slavery Conference; and, in case England has not yet ratified, will the question be submitted to discussion and decision of the British Houses of Parliament?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Representatives of the Powers who are parties to the Anti-Slavery Act of Brussels will immediately meet to exchange Ratifications, and it cannot be stated in advance how many of them will do so, nor can it be at present stated what course Her Majesty's and other Governments will take in consequence of the results of the meeting. Great Britain has ratified. The General Act has been before Parliament since November last.

ALBANY STREET BARRACKS.

LORD HENRY BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War why the barracks in Albany Street, Regent's Park, are to be rebuilt, and not the officers' quarters; whether he is aware that the whole building is in a very dilapidated state; that the cellars and servants' kitchens are damp and unwholesome, and that disinfecting powder has to be freely used to combat the smells below; and that as regards sanitary arrangements, such as we understand at present, there are none; and whether he will allow an inquiry to be ordered, as these quarters, being so close to the Regent's Canal, suffer mostly during the hot weather from the stagnant water?

MR. BRODRICK: The Regent's Park Barracks will not be rebuilt, but great improvements will be made, in which the officers' quarters and mess-room will be included. The building, though old, is not dilapidated; the basement rooms are dark, and not such as would now be constructed, but they will not be used as living rooms. Proximity to the Regent's Canal is undoubtedly inconvenient, but the building is considerably above the water level. The whole sanitary arrangements and drainage of the barracks will be reconstructed, and the Military Authorities are perfectly satisfied with the proposed alterations.

DISTURBANCES IN OPOBO.

MR. WHITLEY (Liverpool, Everton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government have any information as to reported disturbances in the interior of Opobo; and what steps, if any, they have taken for the protection of life and property?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have received a telegram from the Acting Consul reporting a disturbance in the interior, some little distance behind the town of Opobo, at a place called Aqueta, where European factories have been established. The rising seems to have been suppressed, and no further danger is apparently apprehended. The Acting Consul and some of the police are said to have been wounded; but he does not ask for assistance, nor does the wound seem to be serious. Two British men-of-war are going to the Oil Rivers to meet Major Macdonald, and will be available if required.

POSTAL ACCOMMODATION IN SHETLAND.

MR. LYELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is prepared to give effect to the petition of fish-curers and inhabitants of Baltasound, Shetland, in which they beg that a post and telegraph office may not be established at Squarefield, the house of the newly-appointed postmaster; and whether he will require the new office to be in premises which are not licensed for the sale of intoxicating drinks?

*MR. RAIKES: I understand that Mr. Anderson, who has been nominated by the Lords of the Treasury to the situation of Sub-Postmaster at Baltasound, does not propose to conduct Post Office business in the premises in which the licensed grocer's business with which he is connected is carried on; and, in these circumstances, I see no reason, as I stated in answer to the hon. Member's question on the 1st instant, for refusing to give effect to the nomination. As far as I can gather, the premises where the new office is to be established will be generally convenient.

THE SHENSTONE SCHOOL.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the evidence given in the inquest on the body of James Harry Russell, aged eight years and nine months, in which it was stated that the lad had been hit about the head with a strap and a stick by the schoolmaster of the Shenstone School, near Lichfield; and whether it is the intention of the Education Department to take any action in reference to this matter?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I am unable to answer the question at the present moment. Perhaps the hon. Member will be good enough to put it off until Monday.

ROYAL NIGER COMPANY'S TERRITORY.

MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government have arranged or are negotiating for the acquisition of any territory from the Royal Niger Chartered Company; and, if so, of what territory?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer the question. No. An arrangement is being made for defining a frontier between the two British Protectorates of the Niger and the Oil Rivers for the convenience of administration. The arrangement will not diminish the area assigned to the Chartered Company.

THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government is acquainted with the stipulations contained in the Treaty just signed between Germany, Austria, and France; whether the Marquis Rudini was correct in stating, on 29th June, in the course of a Debate in the Italian Chamber upon the expediency of Italy joining the Triple Alliance, that some years ago there had been an exchange of views between Italy and Great Britain, and that the two countries had proposed to co-operate for the maintenance of peace and the status quo; in what year this exchange of views took place; against what Power or Powers this co-operation was aimed; and whether the co-operation between this country and Italy for the maintenance of peace and the status quo was outside the General European concert for these objects?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have no information with respect to the stipulations contained in the Treaty which is said to have been signed between Germany, Austria, and Italy. The Marquis Rudini is reported to have expressed his concurrence in the description which has been given on the part of Her Majesty's Government of the exchange of views which has from time to time taken place between the Governments of Great Britain and Italy. Her Majesty's Government have no doubt that the Marquis Rudini has also correctly described it. They are not yet in possession of the text of His Excellence's speech, but, as has been repeatedly stated, any measures to be taken in case of need for the maintenance of the status quo in the Mediterranean would be a matter for consideration according to the circumstances of the case, and any employment of Her Majesty's Forces would, as heretofore, depend upon the estimate of those circumstances entertained by Her Majesty's Government. The exchange of views has been occasional, but there has been no change of any kind in our attitude from that which I defined in my reply to the hon. Gentleman in 1888. I repeat, as I then stated, that the existing understanding is not aimed against any Power or Powers. I am not aware of any general European concert for the maintenance of the status quo other than may be deduced from Treaties which are before the House.

EDUCATION GRANT TO SCOTLAND.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state the amount of the additional grant to Scotland which will necessarily follow upon the extensions which have been given in Committee to the original provisions for free education in England in the Bill now before the House?

MR. GOSCHEN: It is estimated that the sum required for the payment of the fee grant upon the average attendance recognised by the Code of children between 3 and 15 will be for the next full financial year about £1,885,000, and for the current financial year about £810,000. The corresponding amount of the Scotch grant will be for the next full financial year about £259,000, and for the current financial year about £111,000.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): What are the corresponding figures for Ireland?

MR. GOSCHEN: The corresponding figures for Ireland will be £212,000 for the full financial year, and £91,000 for the current financial year.

BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is true, as stated in the Daily Chronicle newspaper of 18th June, that arrangements were all but completed by which an advance of £150,000 was offered by the Imperial Government to the Government of British Columbia, for the purpose of promoting emigration from the Highlands of Scotland; and, if so, when he expects to be able to give the House an opportunity of discussing the transaction?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Committee on Colonisation recommended the adoption of the scheme of crofter emigration which was proposed by the Government of British Columbia. Her Majesty's Government have informed the Government of British Columbia that they are prepared to accept that scheme with certain modifications. If an agreement is arrived at the House will have an opportunity of discussing the proposed scheme, since a Bill will be necessary to give effect to it.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: Are the Government also willing to entertain the recommendations of the Colonisation Committee upon Immigration?

MR. GOSCHEN: I must ask for notice of that question.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Statute Law Revision Bill, and to refer such Bill to a Select Committee; whether he can inform the House if the Bill is framed upon the lines laid down by the Select Committee of last Session, and approved by both Houses of Parliament; and whether, in view of the facts that the first four volumes of the new revised edition of the Statutes have been issued as an instalment of a proposed complete edition to date; that much labour and public money have been already spent upon the next three volumes, the publication of which only awaits the passing of the Bill now before the House; that the work of the Statute Law Committee has been sanctioned by successive Governments, he will endeavour to secure the passage of the Bill without delay?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Government are anxious to proceed with the Statute Law Revision Bill, but they are, as the hon. Member must be aware, unable, except by agreement, to take the Bill after 12 o'clock. I am informed that the Bill is framed on the lines laid down by the Select Committee of last Session. I agree with what the hon. Member's question states as to the desirability of continuing the edition which has been commenced and which for the first time will place within reach of everybody the living law of the land. But in a matter of this kind it is most desirable to proceed with the general consent of all parties, and to give due consideration to every reasonable objection. I should, therefore, welcome any suggestions that may be made for arriving at that agreement, and for facilitating the continuance of the work I may offer, as my own suggestion, whether it would be possible to divide the Bill, so as to allow that portion of it to pass at once which relates to the period ending with 5 & 6 Vic., a period dealt with by the Acts of last Session, and to postpone till next Session the consideration of the rest of the Bill, so as to leave time for arriving at the general agreement which we must all desire.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can state when the Civil Service Estimates, Class II., which were set down for the first day after the Whitsuntide Recess, will be proceeded with; and what arrangements are likely to be made for dealing with the large number of Votes still remaining to be taken in Committee of Supply?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is not in my power to say when the Estimates will be proceeded with until the Education Bill has passed through all its stages.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether representations have been made to him that, at the Royal Dublin Spring Show, a Jersey cow was exhibited in an advanced stage of pleuro, and died within a week afterwards from the disease; whether, in accordance with its own regulations, it was the duty of the Board to order all the cattle "in contact" with the diseased animal at that show to be slaughtered; whether he is aware that such order has been served on one more of the exhibitors, with an offer to give compensation at the rate of £40 per head, that being the highest sum allowable for any one beast under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, but that, in consequence of strong protests against the adequacy of that compensation in the case of highly bred cattle, and other remonstrances, the carrying out of the order has been indefinitely postponed; and whether the Pleuro Order is to be disregarded when it involves the slaughter of valuable pedigree stock, and only enforced against ordinary cattle?

MR. CHAPLIN: The Board of Agriculture received on May 29 an intimation that a Jersey cow was exhibited at the Royal Dublin Society's Show on March 31 and following days, and died of pleuro-pneumonia on April 10. The other paragraphs of the hon. Member's question contain a series of assumptions, in all of which the hon. Member is misinformed. It was neither the duty nor within the power of the Board to order all the cattle in contact with the diseased animal at that show to be slaughtered, and no such order has been made, and consequently the carrying out of the order has not been indefinitely postponed in consequence of the strong protests against it. With regard to the last paragraph, the hon. Member is apparently not aware that, while slaughter is obligatory in the case of animals which are diseased, the slaughter of those which have been in contact is left to the discretion of the Board, and in the case of valuable pedigree cattle I should endeavour to use that discretion as far as is consistent, in my judgment with the effective working of the Act.

SALE OF HOLDINGS IN IRELAND.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can explain how it happens that in the last half-year so large a proportion of the cases of sale of large holdings are either sales of single holdings or of estates in which the average value of the holding sold is very large; and particularly how it comes that while the law absolutely restricts advances beyond £3,000 to any one purchaser to cases to where that is necessary to carry out sales on the estate of the same landlord, the Commissioners have now sanctioned the sale of a single holding by executors of the Marquess of Ely for £4,199, and of another by R. J. Maxwell for £3,900, when no accompanying sales to smaller tenants were made?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Irish Land Commissioners report that the advances specified in the Report were sanctioned from time to time in pursuance of the law as it existed at the respective times when such sanctions were given. The two particular advances mentioned by the hon. Member were sanctioned shortly after the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, which authorised advances to any one purchaser up to £5,000. The restriction to £3,000 was not enacted until December, 1888.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: How is it that the sales sanctioned in 1888 were not effected till 1891?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The sale is not necessarily completed when it is sanctioned. Questions of title have afterwards to be examined.

REDEMPTION OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps he proposes to take to facilitate the passing of the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Bill?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the anxiety felt in Ireland regarding the Redemption of Rent Bill, and the practical unanimity prevailing amongst all sections of Irish Members in regard to it, he will arrange for the Second Reading to be taken at an hour which will enable the views of the Irish Members to prevail?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As the House is aware, the Government did not pledge themselves to hold out any hopes that they would be able to press this Bill, if it were of a controversial character. But I understand that the opposition is extremely restricted—[MR. SEXTON: One Member]—and, as far as I know, the Bill is not of a controversial character. I will consult my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, and see whether some opportunity cannot be found for bringing the Bill on shortly before 12 o'clock.

DUBLIN AND BLESSINGTON STEAM TRAMWAY COMPANY.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the Dublin and Blessington Steam Tramway Company have carried Post Office parcels since their line was opened in 1888 without receiving any remuneration for such carriage; whether repeated applications have been made to the Post Office authorities for payment; and if he can state why these applications have not been complied with?

*MR. RAIKES: The Dublin and Blessington Steam Tramway Company have carried parcels for the Post Office, as stated by the hon. Member, and have been informed that they must look to the Railway Clearing House for their share of the remuneration paid by the Post Office under the Post Office (Parcels) Act, 1882. The company, however, claim that they are not bound to carry parcels under the Act, and the question having arisen in another similar case, steps have been taken to secure a judicial decision on the point. When this decision has been given—and I understand it is likely to be given at an early date—the matter will be settled.

FREE EDUCATION.

MR. CALDWELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, the Government having agreed to lower the age of free education in England from five years to three years of age, and to extend the age from 14 to 15 years of age, they are prepared to amend to the same effect the amendment of the Scotch Code, 1891, presently lying on the Table of the House, and awaiting confirmation?

*MR. J. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): May I ask whether the Government have received any expressions of dissatisfaction from Scotland in regard to the recent change by which the age is practically raised from three to five; and whether the different circumstances of the two countries do not make it probable that the money devoted to education in one way in England may be used with advantage in different ways in Scotland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to the question of the hon. Member for Partick (Mr. J. P. Smith), I have to say that we have not yet received information which would justify us in recommending any course to the House at the present moment, and I desire to say to the hon. Member for St. Rollox (Mr. Caldwell) that before laying on the Table of the House the Minute of June 11 the Government had carefully considered the expressions of opinions received from Scotland, and they think it is inexpedient to commit themselves to any alteration of that Minute until due opportunity has been given for the expression of opinion in favour of the change. It must be remembered that the Capitation Grant in relief of fees in Scotland is now paid on the whole average attendance without restriction. The alteration suggested would consequently make no change in the amount at the disposal of the School Authorities, but would only compel them to extend free education to a point to which they would doubtless grant it as matters now stand, if they found the funds at their disposal sufficient. It is doubtful whether the alteration would be well-timed, seeing that the financial arrangements of School Boards for the year ending at Whitsun Day next have now been made. I observe that the hon. Member for St. Rollox has a Motion on the Paper for to-night with reference to the disposal of this fund. I would venture to express a strong hope that he will not bring it forward, having regard to the fact that Scotland has had no opportunity yet of considering the question, and it would, in the judgment of the Government, be most premature to ask the House to affirm a principle without giving time for any expression of opinion in Scotland.

MR. CALDWELL: After the expression of opinion from the right hon. Gentleman, I will not proceed with my Motion.

*MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not the fact that since the introduction of free education in Scotland a very large increase in the number of children under five years of age has taken place in the schools; whether in the town of Aberdeen the number has not increased to such an extent that the School Board have been obliged to provide 3,000 additional places; whether great injustice will not be done to School Boards in Scotland by introducing this limitation of age; and whether the Government will not see the propriety of taking out of this sum of £110,000 coming to Scotland the amount necessary to provide for the full extension of free education to the same extent in Scotland as in England?

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I wish further to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he contemplates that the opportunity for the expression of Scottish opinion on this matter shall extend beyond the end of the present Session; or whether he conceives that within a fortnight or three weeks from now there will have been sufficient opportunity to enable him to announce the intentions of the Government?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I should say for myself, speaking without much consideration, that it would hardly be reasonable or fair to Scotland to come to any decision upon so grave a matter as this between the present time and the end of the Session. But I would remind hon. Members that Scotland got free education for her children a year in advance of England, and I think no serious injury will result if it is expedient to extend the provision to children under five years of age. In reply to the hon. Member for North Aberdeen, I may say that it is the fact that there has been a large increase in the number of children under five years of age in the Scotch schools. As to the appropriation of the £110,000, I can only repeat that it is to be given to the ratepayers of Scotland. It matters very little whether it is given to the ratepayers who pay school rates or to the ratepayers who pay ordinary urban rates. It seems to me they are the same persons, and that the money will go into one pocket only.

*MR. HUNTER: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that by paying the money to rates only 25 per cent. of the population will substantially benefit, and that it will go to the rich instead of the poor?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not aware that the poor only pay School Board rates in Scotland, but I will inquire. I thought they were paid by all classes alike.

MR. CALDWELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman be prepared to withdraw the Amendment to the Code now on the Table, and leave the matter over for consideration till next Session, without prejudice to the question?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the hon. Member will put the question on Monday I will give him an answer.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government still intend that the equivalent grant for Scotland shall be submitted to the House in the form of an Estimate; whether their attention has been called to the difficulty in which Scotch Members will thus be placed in desiring to record their views as to the purposes to which, and the conditions subject to which, the money shall be applied; and whether the Government will adopt some mode of procedure by which due opportunity can be afforded for proper discussion of the matters involved, and, if necessary, for taking Divisions upon them?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: After full consideration, the Government think it better to adhere to the method indicated in answer to previous questions, as it appears to them to be the only one in which the temporary appropriation of the equivalent grant for Scotland can be satisfactorily discussed. As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, in Committee of Supply there is much greater freedom of discussion than can take place in any other form by which the matter can be presented to the House.

*MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman does not think it would be more convenient to follow the precedent of 1888, when the Probate Duty (Scotland and Ireland) Bill was passed under similar circumstances, to deal with a temporary appropriation of the Probate Duty Grant?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have pledged myself not to introduce any contentious Bills during the remainder of the present Session, and, having regard to the attention paid by the Scotch Members to all questions relating to Scotland, I am afraid I should be guilty of a breach of that arrangement if I followed the suggestion of the hon. Member.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: While there is ample time for discussion on the Estimates, there is no opportunity for testing the opinion of the House by Divisions with the same freedom as if another form of procedure were followed.

DR. CAMERON: Can the right hon. Gentleman give any indication when the Scottish Estimates will be taken?

MR. HUNTER: I would ask whether it is not the fact that the only Amendment which it is competent to move on the Estimates is the reduction of the sum, and that it is not competent to move that the money shall be applied to any other purpose, and whether taking a discussion on the Estimates will not absolutely debar the Scotch Members of any opportunity of presenting any alternative method.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure that from the ability of the hon. Member he will find an opportunity of discussing any question of this kind. He is well aware that a merely nominal reduction may be moved. It is quite impossible to say when the Scotch Estimates will be taken. While I desire to consult the convenience of hon. Gentlemen, the Government must proceed with the Bills now on hand. After that I will endeavour to fix both the Scotch and Irish Votes so as to give full opportunity for discussion.

VIADUCTS ON THE LONDON AND BRIGHTON RAILWAY.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the statement in the Financial News of 25th June, 1891, that Sir John Fowler, consulting engineer to the London and Brighton Company, officially reports—

“That the Shoreham Viaduct must be reconstructed at once, whilst it is still safe, and that this viaduct was opened in 1847, and consists of 36 spans of 30 feet each,” and further—

“That there are 20 other bridges,” on the same line of railway, “which must be reconstructed within 12 months, or sooner, if possible, by the substitution of wrought-iron (or preferably steel) for cast-iron”;

and, further, he is reported to have stated—

“That there are 60 other bridges which must be summarily dealt with afterwards, and the whole of them must, he considers, be reconstructed within two or three years”;

if these statements are correct; and when the Papers and Reports on this subject, presented to Parliament on the 18th of June, will be printed and issued to Members?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I presented this Report some days ago, and I understand it will be circulated in a day or two. Hon. Members will then be able to see the precise terms of Sir John Fowler's Report, which will give a better idea of the whole matter than I could give by reading extracts to the House.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

MR. R. G. WEBSTER: Are these extracts substantially correct or not?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have nothing to add to my answer. I think it would be as well to wait for the Report.

POSTAL BUSINESS AT CLONDALKIN.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.), (for Sir T. ESMONDE): I wish to ask the Postmaster General whether, in consideration of the increase of postal business at Clondalkin, County Dublin, and also to meet the wishes of the people of the district, he would sanction the change of the hour of the despatch of the mails from 7.15 p.m. to 9.30 p.m.

*MR. RAIKES: A later night mail despatch than at present from Clondalkin would entail additional expense, and I am making inquiry, with a view to ascertain whether this expense can properly be incurred.

THE THIRD RESIDENCY MAGISTRATE IN BOMBAY.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is true that the Bombay Government propose to appoint Mr. Webb to be Third Residency Magistrate, though this is a post which has usually been reserved for a native; whether he is aware that Mr. Webb is over 45 years of age; that, though he has been in Bombay about 25 years, his experience of work at the Bar is very small; and that he is unacquainted with the provincial vernacular; and whether the Secretary of State for India will cause full inquiry to be made into all the circumstances attending the case?

SIR J. GORST: I must again ask the hon. Member to postpone this question, as the Secretary of State has not yet received information which would enable an answer to be given.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS OF ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer, seeing that the Committee on the Financial Relations between England, Scotland, and Ireland have not yet been appointed, cannot publish some of the facts in his possession in the form of a Parliamentary Paper?

MR. GOSCHEN: I regret the course which has been taken in regard to the appointment of the Committee, and I think the suggestion of the hon. Member is a reasonable one. I will undertake to give in a Parliamentary Paper the materials which I have collected and which are very considerable.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

(4.40.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, W.): I wish to ask whether, having regard to the understanding arrived at that the Session shall terminate before the end of July, an undertaking which I hope and believe will be adhered to, and also to the statement then made as to the Bills the Government intend to proceed with, the Government programme is complete, and that no further Bills will be introduced. I know there is a tendency in Departments to bring forward Bills called non-controversial, which are generally very controversial. If there is an understanding that no new Bills will be taken we shall know where we are.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has referred to the understanding, which was welcomed by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, as well as by hon. Gentlemen opposite, for I believe there never was a Session in which more constant labour has been shown by Members of Parliament than in this. The Government are not able to give the absolute engagement the right hon. Gentleman asks for. They are not able to say if a Department finds some defect that a Bill—simply a Departmental Bill—will not be introduced to remove that departmental defect. But I will undertake that the engagement which I gave some time ago shall be observed, and that no contentious measure shall be introduced or pressed upon the consideration of the House. But the right hon. Gentleman must be aware that from time to time matters are disclosed which ought to be remedied in the public interest, which are in no sense political in their character. But if measures are brought forward of that character which the House thinks are controversial they will not be pressed.

(4.45.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: Upon what day will the right hon. Gentleman be able to say no new Bills will be introduced?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman has been in Office, and if he was able to say that no deficiency would be found out by the permanent officials during the next three weeks which required to be remedied, he was more skilful than I profess to be. But I will do everything I can against the Paper being overloaded, or the House being asked to undertake any work it will not be fair to ask it to discharge.

MR. KELLY: I would ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will not undertake at this period of the Session to move the adjournment of the House as soon as the Government Business is disposed of?

MR. W. H. SMITH: That course is never adopted, and it would be rather harsh, if the Government got their business over by 12 o'clock, to deprive private Members of the opportunity of proceeding with their measures when they are not objected to.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): Does the right hon. Gentleman include the Clergy Discipline Bill among the non-contentious measures?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I made a statement with regard to that Bill a fortnight ago. That is still my position. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian is deeply interested in the measure, and I hope he will be able soon to return to the House in order that we may be able to proceed with the Bill.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): Might I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman thinks that the time has arrived when Public Business might be commenced at a quarter past 3 o'clock?

*(4.48.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I rather think that up to the present time Private Business has occupied more time than is usually allotted to it. It was considerably after half-past 3 before the House got to Public Business this evening, and probably it would be for the convenience of the House that on and after Monday next Public Business should begin at a quarter-past 3. I also take the opportunity to move that the House do meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock for the purpose of receiving the Royal Assent to the Consolidated Fund Loan Bill and other Bills. It is essential the Royal Assent should be signified at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. It will not be necessary, however, for hon. Members to attend as the Commission makes the House. As soon as Mr. Speaker has returned from the House of Lords, the Sitting will be suspended until 3 o'clock.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

Resolved, That this House do meet to-morrow at Ten of the clock a.m.—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Law Agents and Notaries Public (Scotland) Bill, changed from Law Agents (Scotland) Bill, with Amendments.

MOTION.

METALLIFEROUS MINES (ISLE OF MAN).

On Motion of Mr. Secretary Matthews, Bill to amend "The Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872," in its application to the Isle of Man, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary Matthews and Mr. Stuart Wortley.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 400.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

(No. 355.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

*(4.50.) MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): I rise to move the Amendment which stands in my name—

"And provided that in case of School Board schools the school rate does not amount to 1s. in the pound on the rateable value of the school district."

The effect will be to prevent the new 10s. fee grant being available for School Board schools in districts where the rate is already 1s. and upwards. When the Education Bill of 1870 was before this House the proposal was to limit the School Board rate not to 1s., but to 1d. in the £1. Sir Massey Lopes moved the following proviso:—

"Provided that the sum so paid shall not exceed in any one rate the amount of a penny in the pound on the rateable value of the area included in the school district."

That proposal was most seriously made to the House, and it received the most hearty support of a gentleman who then bore the name of Mr. Vernon Harcourt—I presume the same gentleman as the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt)—who contended that education was an Imperial necessity and ought to be an Imperial charge. Mr. Forster, in his reply, defended the imposition of 1d. rate, but said the rate would in no case exceed 3d., although he admitted that the rate he was imposing was not altogether a just one. He said—

“He did not complain, however, of the hon. Baronet making a strong protest against a mode of taxation which he felt to be not entirely just.”

If the mode of taxation was not entirely just when it was supposed it would never exceed 3d. in the £1, I contend that it is very far from just now that the rate has in many cases risen to 1s. and above 1s. Considering that this is the first time any great alteration is being made in the Education Act, I believe I should be wanting in my duty to my constituents if I did not endeavour to induce Her Majesty's Government to assent to some limitation being imposed upon the extravagance of the School Board schools. It is said if we limit the rate to 1s. the School Boards will conclude that that is the proper rate, and they will all jump up to it at once. I propose, therefore, that if the rate reaches 1s. the School Board shall not have the benefit of this particular grant. In cases where the rate is 11d. or a little over, the School Board will, if my Amendment is adopted, be inclined to keep it at that level, because they would gain nothing by going beyond 1s. unless they went up to 1s. 4d. In my own division the average rate is 5d. In Loughborough, which contains one-third of the voting power of the division, the Board have been very economical, and the rate has been kept down to about 3·5d. In the town of Leicester the rate is already 11·5d., but in the suburbs of Leicester it is in one place, Aylestone, 19·2d.; in another, Belgrave, 14d.; at Hinchley, 13·3d.; in Evington, 18·5d.; in Humberstone, 18·9; and at Seagrave, 12·5. Some very important evidence has been published by the Chairman of the Finance Committee of the London School Board (Sir R. Temple). The concluding sentences of his Report are a good reply to those who say that we who oppose the raising of the School Board rate are hindering the progress of education. The hon. Member shows that, notwithstanding the vast increase in the School Board rate in London, so far from education having advanced pari passu, it has gone back. He says—

“This brief review, then, shows that the continuous growth of expenditure is to be found in every branch of the Board's work without exception. This growth is out of proportion to the increase of schools and scholars. The number of schools and scholars increases slowly, but the expenditure increases faster. The rateable value, which affords a basis to the taxation for defraying this expenditure, increases quinquennially in a certain ratio. But this ratio is exceeded by the ratio of the growth of the precept taxation during the same period. Meanwhile, the standard of instruction, though fairly well sustained, is not rising, nor is there any countervailing advantage in return for the increased cost. I have, then, to submit that we are spending too much money, and yet are failing to make the educational progress that we ought. But, despite all drawbacks and shortcomings, I adhere to what has been said in my previous statements as to the moral good which the Board has effected, the enlightenment which it has diffused, and the organisation which it has employed for combatting the social difficulties in such an area as that of the Metropolis.”

That being so, and the School Board rate having reached 11·5d., it is time by raising this question, first to make a protest against the extravagance of School Boards, and, secondly, to endeavour to incorporate into the Bill a provision which would have the effect of discouraging that extravagance. If my proposal were carried, the voting power of School Boards would not be interfered with. I intended to move an Instruction to this Committee to limit the rating power to 1s., but that was ruled out of order, and there is consequently nothing left me but to propose my present Amendment. In the Report of the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple), to which I have already alluded, allusion is made to a very serious departure from the intentions of those who framed the Elementary Education Act. He says—

“Then there is a particular item to which I must draw attention financially, namely, this £3,000 for selected schools for upper standards. This is a new expense of an important character, which may grow indefinitely. It amounts to this: that in certain selected schools, the scholars of the upper standards belonging originally to neighbouring schools, are to be gathered together, and so concentrated as to receive special instruction from teachers devoted to them alone. It is for this special teaching that the extra charge of £8,000 is needed for this the first year of the arrangement. It will recur annually; and, if not checked, will increase, no doubt. These will be, of course, very superior and excellent classes. But the teaching afforded them will be nothing less than secondary or superior education, in the very midst of our elementary system. Undeniably this is grafting secondary instruction on to our Board school system at the charge of the rates. Financially, I submit that this is beyond the intention of the law, but the Board and the ratepayers will judge. I, for one, should welcome the affording of this secondary or superior education, but I submit that it ought to be at the cost of those who benefit thereby and not at the cost of the ratepayers. Now that fees are to be abolished by the new legislation, there can be nothing paid by those benefited, and if this secondary education is to be allowed then the rates must inevitably bear the cost."

Although the education given in these schools is very good, it is not of the kind which the public ought to be called upon to pay for. I have here a letter from a working man pointing out the great grievance under which he suffers. He is the owner of a small house in the district of Hammersmith, and it is upon him and persons of his class that the burden of these rates falls so heavily. I believe if we were to put a limit to the extravagance of School Boards we should, to some extent, recoup the Treasury for its generosity in extending the limits of age from 5 and 14 to 3 and 15. I was amongst those who heartily supported that extension. I am always prepared to promote the cause of education, provided religious liberty is not interfered with. In the Report of the Commission on Education it is specially pointed out that the voluntary schools are in danger of being thrust out of existence through the competition of the Board schools with the unlimited resources at their command. In the interests of the elementary denominational schools I also recommend the Amendment to the Committee. The average cost of educating a child in a Christian school of whatever denomination is considerably less than the average cost of educating a non-descript child in a Board school. The cost of educating children in Roman Catholic schools is less by 8s. per head. At present Board schools have tremendous pecuniary advantages, although they are really as denominational or sectarian as any voluntary schools, for I suppose that at Board schools people favour at least theistic conceptions of a kind which Voltaire might have approved. The fact that children are educated at voluntary schools at a less cost than at Board schools constitutes good ground for giving relief to the former. Many of my constituents, I may observe, are bitterly disappointed by the proposals of the Government respecting voluntary schools, and consider that they have been betrayed on this question of education. There are a good many Conservatives in the country who believed that when the education question was reopened that at least the 17s. 6d. limit would have been dealt with and the voluntary schools put upon terms of equality with the Board schools. I dare say, however, there are reasons why that is impossible at present; and as long as Home Rule is in the atmosphere, we must be prepared to put up with a good deal. As to the effect of my Amendment, I do not believe that it will be thought a grievance in any part of the country, while it certainly will afford considerable relief to those who not only pay the school rate but also support voluntary schools. There are, I believe, 11,900 schools belonging to the Church of England, 551 to the Wesleyans, 946 to the Roman Catholics, and only 4,714 Board schools. The Amendment if carried would only affect the few School Boards whose extravagance has led to the imposition of a 1s. rate. Of course, if the ratepayers do not mind paying a high rate they can still keep these Boards in power, but I think the adoption of this Amendment by the House would constitute a warning to School Boards against extravagant expenditure, and be a reminder that our present educational system was accepted in the belief that the rate would in no instance exceed 3d. If the Amendment does not meet with that amount of support which I hope hon. Members will give to it I will not press it to a Division. Under any circumstances, I hope the Debate upon it will be finished before the dinner hour.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, at end, to insert "and provided that in case of board schools, the school rate does not amount to one shilling in the pound on the rateable value of the school district."—(Mr. De Lisle.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(5.12.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I certainly hope that this discussion will not last until the dinner hour. My hon. Friend has referred to many matters, and among other things he has told us that the Government have more or less offended their friends in the country by bringing in this Bill. We are, as he knows, proposing to give a fee grant of 10s. per head, and it may be interesting to the hon. Member to know that in the county which he represents the average attendance fee is 9s. 8d. per child. But the more important matter is whether we as practical men should attempt to engraft upon the Bill now before the Committee such a proposal as that made by my hon. Friend. I am well aware that in many quarters much apprehension has been caused by the gradual increase of the School Board rate. It is true that the rate has grown and grown, but under what circumstances? Under a representative system, and a system of triennial School Board elections. Therefore, if the ratepayers are anywhere aggrieved by the expenditure of a School Board they have the remedy in their own hands. I am often asked why the rate is so high in the Metropolis. The reason may be that there are thousands and thousands of ratepayers in London who will not take the trouble to cross the street in order to record their votes at elections. As long as that apathy continues the public can scarcely complain with justice. We cannot, therefore, accept this Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

(5.15.) MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to move, after "1876," in line 23, to insert "so much only of." The section as it stands upsets the 17s. 6d. limit in two respects. In the first place, it provides that the money payable under the Bill shall in future be counted as money coming from local sources, and it modifies it in a still larger sense with regard to schools having a fee grant which will exceed the fees accruing to the school in the course of last year. I think that the proposal contained in the Bill is a reactionary and retrograde proposal. The principle of the Act of 1870 was that Parliament should make a grant from the Imperial Exchequer for the purpose of public education equal to the amount raised in the localities for the same purpose. That is a thoroughly sound principle, because it brings a stimulus to bear upon persons in the localities to contribute and to do everything in their power to make education efficient. But that principle was modified by the Act of 1876, with considerable loss to a large number of the working classes and to the Imperial Exchequer. Under the Act of 1870 Local Authorities, whether School Boards or managers, had undoubtedly to make great exertion to comply with the conditions laid down by the Act. But under the Act of 1876 it was not necessary to meet the Parliamentary grant with local contributions until that grant exceeded 17s. 6d. That provision in the Act of 1876 has had a prejudicial effect. In 1876 the amount received as local income in voluntary schools was £1 1s. 1d.; in 1889 it had fallen to 19s. 8d. In 1876 the voluntary subscriptions were 9s. 6d. per child in average attendance; in 1889 they had fallen to 6s. 11d.; and while there has been a considerable decrease in subscriptions, the increase in the fees has been most marked, especially in these districts where there is no School Board. In the interests not only of the voluntary schools, but of education generally, it is desirable that the income from the localities should be kept as high as possible. The noble Lord the Member for Rossendale said that the result of relaxing the old limit of the Act of 1870 would be to turn the voluntary schools practically into denominational and sectarian schools supported almost entirely by the State. Not only have subscriptions decreased under the Act of 1876, but endowments are made to come in aid of local subscriptions, and grants made by the Science and Art Department for drawing have been reckoned as money coming from local sources. That is bad enough, but now we have a proposal that every farthing paid by the Imperial Exchequer is for the future to be regarded as coming from local sources. If the Imperial grant is made greater, we ought to exact greater local effort. It is unfair by a side wind to upset the limit laid down by the Act of 1876. In a large number of schools there are no voluntary subscriptions whatever, and in 40 per cent. of them the subscriptions amount only to 2s. 6d. per child in average attendance. The effect of passing this section as it stands will be to reduce the amount of subscriptions to a much lower point than they now stand at. I have no special animus against voluntary schools, but I think experience has proved that it is wise to adhere as closely as possible to the principle of the Acts of 1870 and 1876. There are two School Boards in Merionethshire which will make of this fee grant a very large profit; one will receive over £1,000, the other about £600 over and above the fees it now receives. What is true of these School Boards will be true of several schools all over the country. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were present I would appeal to him as guardian of the Public Purse to make it incumbent upon Board schools and managers of voluntary schools to make some efforts to meet the large and generous grants made to them out of the national Exchequer. With that view I beg to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 23, after "1876," to insert the words "so much only of."—(Mr. Thomas Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(5.30.) MR. A. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I think the Vice President and his Department must have had some searchings of heart upon this subject. We have been told that the 17s. 6d. limit would not be disturbed by this clause. You are disturbing it in the most serious way. Prebendary Row, one of the most distinguished authorities on this subject, has said—

"One of its great advantages is that indirectly the 17s. 6d. limit will be abolished for rural schools of the class I am interested in."

I regard that result as hardly fair, and it certainly would have been more satisfactory had this question been left alone. If you are indirectly abolishing the limit, you are doing an unreasonable thing. I know what is going to be said—that you are going to help districts which charge low fees. But in rural districts do not want to see the voluntary contributions reduced in any way whatever. I think we have done a great deal too much in that way. Another important point is, are you justified in this extraordinary process or arrangement, which says that the local resources must be brought up to at least 17s. 6d. in order to meet the Parliamentary grant? You are shovelling out a mass of money from the Treasury, and you are going to give the managers of voluntary schools a grant which for present purposes you will describe as "local resources." You are going to plank down a Parliamentary grant, changing its name to local resources, and thus you will enable the Local Authorities to make up the sum of 17s. 6d. I think this proposal to abolish indirectly the 17s. 6d. limit is an unfair one.

*(5.34.) SIR W. HART DYKE: The hon. Member who introduced this Amendment denounced this proposal in this last sub-section as reactionary and retrograde. Now, my challenge to the hon. Member is, that it is not reactionary if the Education Department does its duty in regard to this extra sum which has been devised. I hope and trust that these proposals will be far more educational in their character than hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to suppose. It will be absolutely impossible for the Department to deal exceptionally with any school; it must secure absolute efficiency in these schools. The principle in which we have proceeded is that there should be some uniform fee grant to be applied to all schools—Board or voluntary, otherwise we would not have been able to get our proposals through the House. It is an incident of our proposal that in certain circumstances the 17s. 6d. limit is varied, but I deny that we are making the alteration by a side wind. Far from its being a retrograde it is a distinctly educational movement. It is urged that it would be an evil thing if certain of the subscribers were to put the balance in their pockets instead of spending it on education. But it is perfectly certain that if managers do that the efficiency of the school would not be maintained, the school would remain in its present position, and the 17s. 6d. limit could not be exceeded. Under all the circumstances, Her Majesty's Government feel bound to maintain this sub-section as it stands, and I would urge upon hon. Members opposite that after all, if a grievance arises, it can only be in the direction of educational effort, and where the managers spend the extra money on increasing the efficiency of their schools.

(5.39.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): The right hon. Gentleman says that this is really an educational Amendment, by which the extra fees shall be counted as local subscriptions. That is assuming that all the schools to which this applies are already inefficient. But the majority of these schools are not inefficient, and had anyone on this side of the House suggested that they were, no one would have repudiated it more vigorously than the right hon. Gentleman. One friend of mine said he could not make his schools any better, and he would have to spend the money on books for the children. The right hon. Gentleman does not realise what is going to happen; he does not know the extent of the wastefulness and extravagance of his proposal. I feel sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, were he here, would know. In hundreds of rural districts this will practically do away with the necessity of voluntary subscriptions. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. Take the Isle of Anglesey as an illustration. There are there two small parishes contiguous, with a population of 259, and each with a school at no great distance one from the other, and with fees amounting to 4s. 6d. or 5s. The 10s. grant would leave 6d. or 8d. per head required to maintain the schools. Why were these schools not amalgamated? The reason given in the evidence before the Royal Commission was, because to have done so would have been to lose the extra grant. Last year another £10 was given to each of these small schools, making £20 each which they receive. When this fee grant is paid, the amount paid by the State to these schools will be £2 2s. for every child. That will be done in hundreds and thousands of instances, wherever there are small schools, and you are doing away practically, in these cases, with the necessity for voluntary subscriptions. An article, written by one of the most able men in England, appears in the Contemporary Review, and it shows that in Somersetshire a number of schools already receiving £1 11s. per child will have an additional 10s., making £2 1s. per child. The right hon. Gentlemen (Mr. W. H. Smith) was in this House when the raising of the limit to 17s. 6d. was so strongly contested, and no one was more urgent against it than the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Mr. Forster declared that the raising of the limit from 15s. to 17s. 6d. was a breach of the compromise made in 1870, and held himself at liberty, therefore, to take a new line. I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer before he is two or three years older will find that this money is being wasted, and not spent in promoting the efficiency of education; he will see, by reason of the laxity of some of the provisions of the last Code, and by the laxity of the Department's administration, wastefulness and extravagance in the application of this money.

*(5.45.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Sir, the right hon. Gentleman is usually fair in his remarks, but he seems, in the remarks he made about the Isle of Anglesey, to have forgotten that 8d. per head would only be required in aid of the 10s. in order to carry on the schools.

MR. MUNDELLA: In addition to the 10s.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: What chance is there of the 17s. 6d. limit being exceeded, seeing that the difference is to be met by local resources?

MR. MUNDELLA: Of course, in the Isle of Anglesey it will simply abolish voluntary subscriptions altogether.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It will not abolish voluntary subscriptions altogether, but in cases where the subscriptions are 10s., 12s., or 14s., they will come down to a lower amount. I have taken the right hon. Gentleman's own example of the operation of this subsection to show how utterly impossible it is that it can have the injurious consequences anticipated. When the right hon. Gentleman referred to the recent additional grant, I do not think he had in his mind the Code, which provides that where there is no elementary school within a certain distance of a population, the Department may make a special grant in addition to the ordinary grants, amounting, if the said population exceeds 200, to £10; and if it does not exceed 200, to £15. If the Department does its duty it has constant power of revision which would result in the withdrawal of the special grants if they were found to be no longer necessary. The proposal comes to this: In the districts where the fees have been exceptionally low—in sympathy with poor parents, and in order to get the children to school, subscribers having put their hands in their pockets—it is felt that such towns or districts should not be penalised for their past efforts in the cause of education by putting them under exceptional disadvantages, as compared with those places where the school fees for the parents have been maintained nearly level with the cost of the school. If the Educational Department does its duty—and it is a department which has never, and I hope never will, be filled by political influence, and may be confidently expected to do its duty in the future as in the past—no part of this 10s. grant will go back to the pockets of subscribers, save where exceptional sacrifices have been made. This proposal, after all, will do nothing more than contribute to the efficiency of education. We believe the provision to be fair and reasonable, but if you begin to take individual instances, then you will make any Bill of this kind impossible. If we give the fee grant all round, it will not in our judgment, endanger the Exchequer, so far as any wasteful expenditure is concerned, and it will greatly increase the efficiency of education in elementary schools.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I think this Amendment will seriously injure the voluntary schools in very poor districts. Low fees, and no fees, have often been charged, in order to get the children to school. In this country a very large number of Roman Catholic schools are in that position, and if this Amendment were passed a very considerable sum of money would be taken away from several of the Roman Catholic schools. The money to be given under this Bill is to be reckoned as bond fide school pence, and if you tamper with that principle, you will destroy the poor schools in Ireland.

*(6.0.) MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): Reference has been made to the grant to schools for small populations. If the right hon. Gentleman will read

Mr. W. H. Smith

Article 107 of the Code he will see these grants are excluded from the calculation altogether.

*SIR W. HART DYKE assented.

MR. MUNDELLA: Does the right hon. Gentleman question the accuracy of my statement that these schools will receive more than £2 per child?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The Department has the power, looking to all the circumstances, to withdraw the grants under Articles 104 and 105 of the Code.

*MR. SUMMERS: There is another point I wish to draw attention to. Suppose a case where the fees are now 7s. and the subscriptions 12s. As the law now stands, that school will be able to receive a grant of 7s., plus 12s., that is, 19s. What are you now proposing? You propose to substitute for this 7s. a 10s. fee grant, so that when this Bill becomes law the school will be able to receive a grant of 10s., plus 12s., or 22s., instead of 19s. The school will get 3s. extra by the substitution of the 10s. fee grant for the 7s. now provided by way of fees, and it will get another 3s. under the present sub-section. In other words, it will receive payment of the money twice over.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: For results.

*(6.2.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): The framer of this Amendment appears to have had no regard whatever for the growth of the schools. The growth of schools in our manufacturing districts will largely increase, while this provision makes the previous fee a fixed charge. That, I think, is in itself a grave objection to this proviso. Having desired for a long time that there should be some modification of the 17s. 6d. limit, I cannot at all regret the proposal which will in some degree modify the severity of that condition. I was somewhat surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield speak of schools as being thoroughly efficient. I thought his view was that perfect efficiency could not exist in a school, that no school in this or any other country could be so perfect that no improvement could take place. I think that any pressure which will increase the efficiency of a school is wholesome.

MR. MUNDELLA: "Thoroughly efficient" is well understood in the Department. When a school is thoroughly efficient you cannot ask more.

*MR. F. S. POWELL: It may be efficient within the requirements of the Department, but it still may be capable of improvement.

*(6.5.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): If we wish to increase the amount schools may earn why should we not do it fairly for all? Why should we do it in the most extraordinary and exceptional way suggested? Take the case of a place like Birmingham, which cannot be regarded as a poor place. The amount of school pence there is 5s. 6½d. a head. The Government propose to give the schools there 4s. 6d. per child more, and then, under the guise of a clause intended to limit the Imperial Grant to the amount of the local resources, they say the Birmingham schools shall have the right to earn 4s. 6d. more than other schools. What possible justification is there for such a proposal? Under no system of reasoning that the Government can adopt can they make out that the increase of 4s. 6d. is a reason why they should increase the power of the Birmingham schools to earn a larger grant than the schools in the North of England. If the Government persist in this matter, I hope they will favour the House with an estimate of what the additional cost to the Imperial Treasury will be. Yesterday they refused to grant £3,000 in respect of evening schools, and now they are propounding a scheme for spending an indefinable amount.

MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): The First Lord of the Treasury admits that a larger grant may be obtained from the Imperial Treasury under this new process, but says it will be only as result of merit. Take the case put by the hon. Member for Huddersfield—the case where the subscriptions amount to 12s. and the fees to 7s. There is a total local contribution of 19s. Under the present Code if the school earns 22s. it is not allowed to get 22s., but only 19s, because the locality has only contributed 19s. The objection now taken is that the 19s., without any real increase in the local contributions, is converted into 22s. The 12s. local contribution remains exactly the same, but the 7s. fee is converted—nominally and fictitiously converted—into 10s.

*(6.10.) MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I do not know whether the hon. Member attaches importance to the figures relating to Birmingham which he has cited, but those figures do not happen to be accurate. The figures the hon. Gentleman quoted, namely, 5s. 6½d. per child, are the figures of the Board schools in Birmingham. The fees in the voluntary schools of Birmingham amount to 9s. 9½d. per head. As I understand the hon. Member's argument, the hon. Gentleman has some fear lest there should go into the hands of the subscribers to the voluntary schools, through a process which has been elaborately explained, some of the funds to be given under the Bill. It must be admitted that it has been shown that the new system may, under certain circumstances and in certain cases, be liable to considerable abuse; but, as I take it, it is the office of Her Majesty's Government to prevent abuse. [Opposition cries of "No!"] Additional supervision exercised on behalf of the Department, and the claim which the Department can make to have additional efficiency in the schools, will prevent abuse taking place. No doubt the Bill will throw a great deal of additional responsibility upon the Education Department. All those places which have hitherto been accepted by the Department for inefficiency—namely, poverty and the like—will be swept away, and it will be the duty of the Department to see that efficiency is thoroughly maintained in accordance with the resources which the schools have at their disposal. Under the circumstances, it seems to me we may safely trust the Department to prevent the abuses which have been so carefully explained to the Committee.

*MR. ROBY: When I made my former remarks I had not the voluntary subscribers in mind. I pointed out that the Board schools in Birmingham receive now in school pence 5s. 6½d. per child. The Government now propose to give them 4s. 6d. per child more, and in virtue of that 4s. 6d. more, the Birmingham schools will have the right to earn from the Imperial Treasury 4s. 6d. more than other schools which are not so situated. The 4s. 6d. is given freely, and it may be used well; but why should it enable Birmingham to get another 4s. 6d.? Birmingham will practically get 9s. In Manchester we shall not get 9s., but have to pay a good deal more. I think the proposal is utterly indefensible and unreasonable.

*(6.15.) MR. W. H. SMITH: Birmingham has charged a low fee, and Manchester has charged a high fee. Is it contended that Birmingham is not to have the advantage of the 10s. grant in regard to the 17s. 6d. limit because it has paid out of the pockets of its rate-payers the difference between 4s. 6d. and 10s., or, as in the case of Manchester, 14s.? It would be most unfair to Birmingham to deprive it of the advantage of the difference between the 4s. 6d. and 10s. If Birmingham has made great sacrifices in the past, it ought not in consequence to be penalised in the future.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I will not go into the question as between Birmingham and Manchester, although I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles as to the discrepancy. I rise to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government have made any calculation as to the amount which this matter will involve. At present the grant is in round figures £3,250,000, and that represents an average grant of 17s. 8d. If you are going to add 4s. to that grant—[Cries of "No!"]—well, I do not say you are, but I want the Committee to realise that to add something like 4s. to the grant would be an addition of something like £800,000. If you add 1s. to the grant, there will be a considerable addition. If the Vice President of the Council will give us some stronger assurance than he has hitherto given us on this point, he will remove some of the regret we shall feel in being beaten in the forthcoming Division. I think we have a right to ask that if there is a surplus it shall be spent in improving the efficiency of the school.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The Department has not the data for any accurate estimate with regard to the effect of this proposal, nor do I think there is much in the past to judge by. The deductions have up to this date not amounted to more than £36,000, but I think the cost of the proposal will not amount to anything like that sum.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I think it will be found that this clause means a great deal more than an expenditure of £36,000. Certainly some means should be taken to increase the efficiency of the schools.

(6.22.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 115; Noes 218.—(Div. List, No. 318.)

(6.39.) MR. T. ELLIS: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will be willing to adopt the Amendment I have now to propose. I do not think much argument is required to establish my point that there is no Department from which we ought to have fuller statistics than the Education Department, and yet the information we do get is really not nearly so full as that we get in relation to other Departments, and which is not so interesting to Members of the House and the great mass of the people. Taking up my Parliamentary Papers recently, I found among them the most exhaustive information in reference to police expenditure; the fullest information about the cost of police clothing in every county and borough, for instance. Now, it seems to me that when we are making this large grant of £2,000,000, and coupling with it certain conditions as to the amount to be contributed by local effort, we may expect that full accounts should be rendered to Parliament.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, after line 25, to add:—“(4) The Education Department shall report annually to Parliament the amount of fee grant paid to each school during the year, and the amount of rates raised or voluntary subscriptions contributed towards the expense of such school.”—(Mr. T. Ellis.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I hope the hon. Member will not think it necessary to press this. The annual Report now gives very full information, and such an addition as this will add very considerably to expense, labour, and delay.

MR. MUNDELLA: I think my hon. Friend would be justified in pressing this. I should have thought the right hon. Gentleman would have at once agreed to give these details. The Department have the information, and I think there would be no difficulty in giving these particulars. In relation to this large grant I think we ought to demand this, and I think if the right hon. Gentleman consults the heads of the Department he will find there will be no difficulty.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There would be no difficulty in including this if it is as easy to do so as the right hon. Gentleman imagines, but I think at any rate it should be left to the Department and not imposed by statutory obligation. It may have the result of delaying the Report, the production of which is desired as early as possible. There would be no difficulty in furnishing the information from time to time in the form of a Return, but I do not think it is desirable to make it a statutory obligation.

MR. MUNDELLA: I recognise the desire of the right hon. Gentleman to meet our wishes, but I can assure him that the accounts being regularly made up there would be no difficulty or delay about it.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If that is so, then the Department will be ready to give it in the form of a Return.

MR. A. DYKE ACLAND: Will the right hon. Gentleman accept the Amendment substituting the word "may" for "shall," making it a direction to the Department? It will really be only bringing our educational statistics up to the level of those supplied in other countries. If we can have the information in a Return there cannot be much difficulty in including it in the Report.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: To use the word "may" will not carry the matter beyond where it is now. We may do it now. But I do not think we are justified in declaring it shall be done.

MR. T. ELLIS: I urge this, because it is often very difficult to obtain required information if we do not happen to have moved for a Return. From time to time separate Returns are moved for and prove very useful. For instance, there is the Return granted on the Motion of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Mundella) which has been of extraordinary value during the discussions upon this Bill. I desire that instead of increasing the bulk and number of Returns we should have the information included in the Report by the simple addition of a column. I am willing to alter the word "shall" to "may" as indicating that the House expects the information.

*MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I think there should be no difficulty in giving this information, but I do not see the advantage of inserting the word "may." We may be satisfied, I think, with the promise of the right hon. Gentleman. I am sure he will give an undertaking that it shall, if possible, be included in the Annual Report, and so individual Members will be released from the necessity of moving for it as a Return.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will certainly endeavour to give the information desired. I will not give a definite pledge; but certainly the endeavour shall be made.

MR. MUNDELLA: I am sure the Vice President will see that it will be far more convenient and very little extra expense to include this in the Report; it is simply the addition of another column.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: But there is a difference in inserting this as a direction in the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(6.45.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I should like to ask the Vice President a question in relation to the decision we arrived at the other night—the assent of the Government to the proposition that the grant of 10s. shall extend to children between the ages of three and five. The acceptance of the proposal by the Government was rather sprung upon the Committee, and there was no discussion at the time. The fees for infants are at present generally very much less than the fees paid for older children. The average fee is about 2d. a week. By granting 10s. in respect of infants I calculate that £60,000 will go as an additional subsidy to the Board and voluntary schools, and that £40,000 out of the £60,000 will go to the latter. I wish to know whether the Vice President of the Council will consider the advisability of reducing the grant from 10s. to 7s. or 7s. 6d. I do not think that we ought to vote away recklessly so large a sum as £60,000. The educational needs of the infants may be met by a smaller sum than is necessary for the older children.

(6.48.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): Before we leave this clause there is a point upon which it would be well to have information. I think my right hon. Friend will find, if he looks into the operation of Section 3 of the clause we are now about to pass, that it will land us in much greater expenditure than he seems to anticipate. It will be observed that while the limit in Manchester and other places in the North will be 17s. 6d., Birmingham will be 22s., Bristol 21s., London 20s. 2d., and so on with other towns, and in some cases I think there will be surprise at the expenditure that will result. I trust that before the Report stage a reliable estimate will be prepared showing what will be the exact effect of this clause upon the taxation of the country. The country ought to have the information with as little delay as possible.

SIR W. HART DYKE: Yes, I think it is due to hon. Members that they should have this information. The matter is being gone into thoroughly, and I engage before the Report stage is taken to see whether an estimate can be given. The point raised as to infants' fees shall also receive careful consideration. There was no indication the other night of a desire that the grant in respect to infants should be varied, and I am afraid if I had suggested it at the time that suggestion would have met with strong opposition.

(6.50.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I hope we shall be very careful about reducing the infants' grant. There is a difficulty now about obtaining skilled teachers for children under five. As to the additional grants to voluntary schools, I have now thrown away all scruples on the subject. We are engaged in demolishing the voluntary system, and may as well carry the demolition as far as possible. I shall offer no further opposition to grants to these schools, being certain that when a rational Government come into power they will take care that institutions altogether supported by public money shall also be subjected to public control.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR (Leeds, Central): I sincerely trust the Government will not yield to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Poplar with reference to the infant fee grant. The average of 10s. was arrived at by taking the fees charged for all children. This figure is too low, as I have already taken occasion to point out; but if the children under five are exempted from the calculation the proposed fee grant will be still more unfair than it is now.

MR. ROBY: Do I understand that under the clause there will be different limits in different parts of the country? In the North of England there will be a 17s. 6d. limit, while in Birmingham there will be a 22s. limit, in Bristol a 21s. limit, and in London a 20s. 2d. limit.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I really think it will be perfectly possible for Manchester or Liverpool or any other town to earn quite as much as Birmingham.

(6.52.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): If there is any difficulty on the point, towns have only to raise the School Rate as Birmingham has done, and then they will earn an equal amount. What some hon. Members apparently want is to get money from the State with the object of sparing the ratepayers. But I rose simply to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman not to consent to the suggestion to entertain a lower grant in respect to infants. The grant is to cover the average on all grades, and it is desirable that the education of infants should be conducted on the best plan, and the most recent improvements in the Kindergarten system should be carried out; but it is an expensive system. We do not want the infant schools simply converted into nurseries, and money is well spent in laying the groundwork for the future teaching the children will receive, and the subsequent teaching becomes of double value from the early training. I hope, therefore, there will be no thought of reducing the amount of the fee grant.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): I trust the Government will not agree to the suggestion. The greatest effort will have to be made to meet the change, and it is represented to me by those interested in education in my constituency that the amount of the fee grant will fall short of the amount raised by fees by about 3s. 1d. per scholar, and the fee grant is met by the grant from the Education Department. Large sums, therefore, will have to be provided from somewhere.

*(6.55.) MR. WOODALL (Hanley): Speaking from considerable experience in reference to School Boards, I can say that there will be no hesitation in asking for an additional 1d. in the £1 from the ratepayers. But I think that under the clause as it stands, districts where the school fees are now high in fees will be penalised as compared with other districts where the schools have been conducted on a low-fee system. In some districts ratepayers will have to pay another 1d. in the £1 to carry out the Act, while another district, where a different education is being provided, will be privileged in the competition, and make a profit out of the transaction, as the result of the policy hitherto pursued. I am perfectly satisfied that when they have fully realised the situation the Education Department will recognise the obvious unfairness of the arrangement, and will guard against the danger which has been indicated by the hon. Member for Eccles.

(6.59.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): At the present time there are 11,766 voluntary schools without subscriptions, and yet have all the denominational advantages, and the number under the operation of the clause the number will probably be doubled. The condition of things to which we are coming is, that we shall be handing over to certain high-minded gentlemen interested in religion or with other pretensions, State Subventions for the carrying on of public educational institutions, in the management of which the public will have no control. These are institutions in which the people of this land are more interested than in almost any other institutions. I want to know where the system is to end. At this moment, as we have heard, there are about 40 per cent. of denominational schools where the subscriptions are only 2s. 6d. That amount will be increased, and I only want to point out to the country a fact pregnant with meaning, namely, the mischief that will be involved in handing over half the elementary education system of this country to persons who have no manner of claim to the exclusive control of that system. I have no hope of any modification in the Bill in the direction I desire, but I make this statement to reserve the right at a future time of insisting upon a more complete system of control by the taxpayers over the elementary educational system of the country.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 2.

*(7.5.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): The Amendment I now beg to move must be taken in connection with two other Amendments that stand in my name, namely, in line 9, to leave out "except as by this Act provided," and then to leave out Sub-section 2. The object of the Amendment, which I at once admit is of a sweeping character, is to provide that where schools do come under this Act and wish to make themselves free they shall be really free from top to bottom, and permanently so. I do not intend to deal with the Amendment at any length, but I wish to say that the essential principle of the Liberal creed upon free education is bound up in this Amendment. We are determined not to go in for a free education which shall permit the charging of a fee in schools which receive the fee grant. The Liberal Party go in for the genuine article, absolutely free education, which I believe the people of this country demand. It will be said that this Amendment will affect the high-fee denominational schools in the North of England. That consideration does not weigh with me. I shall be exceedingly glad if the result of accepting the Amendment would be to stimulate the subscribers to high-fee schools in the North of England to come up to the standard of subscribers in other parts of the country, such as the County of Somerset, to which reference has been made, and to make them put down their cash if they wish to retain the control of the schools. I trust, however, that these schools will be absorbed into the organisation of the School Board system, and then practically there will be no limit to the funds for education, as they will be supplemented out of the rates. I have put down the Amendment, because I have said every time I have addressed my constituents that what the Liberal Party was going for was genuine free education, and not one of a stunted and limited nature.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 1, to leave out from the word "grant," to the word "no," in line 9.—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'Where the' stand part of the Clause."

*(7.10.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I am afraid that the most sanguine controversialist could not possibly hope that the Government would accept this Amendment, nor did I put it down on the Paper in any such hope, but I think that at this point it is most important to call the attention of the Committee to the extremely peculiar working of the Bill, and to ask some rather pressing questions of the Government. Now I humbly think that the Government have not taken the most judicious course in giving free education to the country. They would more wisely have adopted the principle of the Scotch measure, that in every school which accepts the fee grant education is thenceforth to be entirely free. The Government have not adopted that principle. I would here refer the Committee to the 3rd sub-section of Clause 3, by far the most important part of the Bill. It is by the operation of that sub-section that free education will be swiftly or gradually spread over England and Wales. And I want to call the attention of the Government to the extreme difficulty that will ensue by this indirect mode of progression, and to ask my right hon. Friend opposite what the process is by which the great benefit of free education will be given over a large part of the country? We know that in five-sixths of the schools with comparatively small attendance, in the south country schools, the Welsh schools, and the Board schools for the most part, by the automatic operation of the Bill, education will become entirely free. In Northumberland, Cumberland, and part of Durham the condition of the country schools is this—the fees are very high because wages are high and the parents well off, and in many cases the education is extremely good. What will happen in these places? Managers who can afford it will at once make the school free, first, because it is the intention of Parliament to give free education, and, secondly, because if they still retain a 2d. or even a 1d. fee their poorer neighbours will be in a satisfactory position to demand that the school shall be made free. I cannot imagine that anyone who wishes to maintain the relations that ought to exist between the managers of schools in the country and their poorer neighbours would desire that they should have a hold over him which they forbear from exercising, or that they should exercise it and extort from him that free education that they ought to give. This may not be the case in connection with most schools. In these schools with high fees the managers are very often country clergymen not very well off, and if the landlords, who may or may not be well off, are not willing to give any higher subscription, the state of things will be that the parents will have to pay a 1d., 2d., or 3d. fee unless they choose to put the Education Department in motion. What does putting the Education Department in motion mean? A curious light is thrown on that subject this morning by the excellent Report of Convocation in the Times. The whole subject was admirably discussed by the Bishop of London, who was complimented at the end on the great knowledge that he showed. Some of his observations were very remarkable and interesting. How is the Education Board to be put in motion in order that these people in these remote villages may get the benefit of free education? Do not hon. Members know enough of some country villages to know that it is a very serious matter for agricultural labourers to apply to the Department to the detriment of a country clergyman in order that the managers may take upon their shoulders the burden of maintaining these schools, and that the schools may be free. What did the Bishop of London say? He said—

"He wanted to know how the localities were to express their wishes. Was it to be done by the parents themselves, or by busy bodies who were to formulate the wants of other people."

The Bishop of London is a very kind man, and I do not think he quite knew what a very strong thing this was to say. The "busy body" would be probably some sterling man of the middle class who was not afraid of anyone in the village, and it might be only through him that the parents in these remote villages would often be able to express their wants. I must say I think it is to be deeply regretted that this most disagreeable cause of dissension in the country villages was not removed by the Government taking the course which was taken in Scotland, and saying—"Parliament has given £2,000,000 at least for the purpose of giving the country free education, and free education it shall have from the northernmost point of Northumberland to the southernmost point of Cornwall." There is another class of schools which exercise the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite, namely, those schools in North Country towns in which the fees are very high and the subscriptions very low. There is a North Country town in which, putting aside the Roman Catholic schools, the Church schools, with 3,600 children, receive £3,450 in fees and £192 in subscriptions. Now, just imagine what that means if free education is to be given in this town. It means that even if you retain one or two schools for people who are willing to pay special fees, at least seven times as much subscriptions as are received now will have to be raised, and then see the process by which free places will be found in these schools. I saw to-day a resolution passed by the managers of the voluntary schools in Sheffield, and I entirely agree with it. They said, in effect, that the compulsory provision of school accommodation without fees in any school district would keep the system of adequate school provision in a chronic state of unsettlement. Well, that is the very least you can say. These schools, it seems to me, will be in the unpleasant position of feeling that the Department may come down on one or other of them at its will, and say, "You must provide free places." They would answer, "Oh, but there is no reason why you should fix on my school," and the Department would reply, "You must find free places somewhere." I believe that there will be the greatest amount of uneasiness, confusion, and friction caused by the desire of each school to maintain its position as a high-fee school, while the Department will be bound to find a certain amount of free accommodation. I hope the Department will take steps to see that in those schools where the fee rises according to a standard that such a system shall not be continued in any school which receives the fee grant. I regret that the boon of free education is not given by the Bill in the direct way in which it has been given in the case of Scotland. Hon. Members have made speeches which can only prove that there still remains in their minds the idea that, after all, it is a good thing that people should pay fees. If that is the case we ought not to have had this Bill. It is because, among other things, it keeps up that notion that I am sorry we have the Bill in this shape. Considering that this is the turning point of the Bill, that this is the actual process by which free education is going to be given, I think we should have a very clear explanation from the Government of the process by which, in these two cases of rural districts and towns without School Boards, the process is to be carried out.

*(7.21.) SIR W. HART DYKE: The right hon. Gentleman has intimated that he does not intend that a Division should take place with regard to this Amendment. Whether that be so or not, I think the points he has raised are fair points to urge, although I feel bound to throw out a suggestion that the speech of my right hon. Friend was rather more a speech against the Second Reading of the Bill than one to be made in Committee, and it rather surprised me, after the many speeches that have been made by right hon. Colleagues of his in favour of the Second Reading. The hon. Member who moved the Amendment said he did so in favour of an absolutely free system of education. I have before now defended the system adopted in the Bill. I believe it will be found to be a fair and just system, and one which will maintain the best elements in our present schools, among others the preservation of fees. I believe that nothing would be more fatal to education in this country than the entire abolition of fees, because one effect of such an abolition would be the establishment of a vast number of private adventure schools, practically in many cases without control. I believe the right hon. Gentleman will find that not only in the vast majority of the agricultural districts of England and Wales, but also in a large number of our large towns, a considerable number of schools will become free directly the Bill passes. Reference has been made to the high-fee schools in Northumberland and Durham. In the mining districts of Northumberland and Durham there is a system called "poundage"—that is to say, a deduction is made from the wages of the miner and supplemented by a payment from his employer. This deduction is included in the column of fees, and so accounts for the apparently high total. I am of opinion that no hardship will result from the Bill in these districts, and that a mining population which is content to pay a high fee by means of deduction from wages in order to maintain the efficiency of the schools will be perfectly willing still to submit to a deduction, minus the 10s. grant. I have been pressed as to what will happen in the case of parents who wish to have free schools. That question will, I think, be better discussed under Sub-section 3 of Clause 3. I do not think, however, that there is any village in England or Wales, however remote, where the tiniest possible grievance that may arise with regard to education may not be brought within a few hours and with perfect facility under the notice of the Education Department. Gentlemen opposite would be perfectly astounded if they saw the great masses of correspondence with the Education Department dealing with the tiniest difficulties and the smallest details of school life. The right hon. Gentleman and the Mover of the Amendment have urged that we are travelling on wrong lines, and that we should have abolished fees altogether. I have already alluded to one point in regard to which I think such a thing would be most disastrous to the cause of education, but there is another consideration of almost equal importance. The immediate result of free schools everywhere would be the absolute destruction of all high-fee schools, and I should like to know where the money is to come from in order to give effect to such a project. It is all very well for Members to urge that the buildings will be handed over to Board schools, but I can assure them that nothing of the kind will happen. The Amendment and the speech of my right hon. Friend point to proposals that we think would be disastrous to the cause of education, and that would result in an enormous demand being made on the taxpayer.

(7.30.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: This is a somewhat particular point, and I may say in regard to it that some of us on this side of the House do not see the necessity of dividing on the Amendment, because we believe it will not be long before we shall be enabled to establish "this hateful system of universal free schools" to which the right hon. Gentleman seems to object. The First Lord of the Treasury seems to think that 83 per cent. of the whole of the schools will be at once free, and under Clause 3 we shall have a strong lever which will enable us to create a great breach in the wall surrounding those schools which still charge high fees, and very rapidly it will result, I think, in the freeing of the voluntary schools as well. The Vice President of the Council has argued that you do not want a universal system of free School Boards, which he thinks will be the ruin of the private adventure schools, but there can be no doubt that a number of those schools would still remain, although, probably, the number would not be very large. They would exist in certain parts of the country, but, speaking generally, throughout the entire Kingdom, we shall have established a universal system of free schools accompanied by all the evils which the Vice President of the Council has pointed out. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of schools in Lancashire and Yorkshire and other parts of the country where he seemed to think parents liked to pay high fees. I think if he were to look further into the matter he would find that the reason why the fees are high is because the subscriptions are low. The operation of this Bill, in my opinion, will be this: that the parents will have the choice of sending their children to the free schools or of continuing to pay those high fees in the voluntary schools, and that I think is quite sufficient for our present purpose.

*(7.35.) MR. SUMMERS: I would remind the Committee that when this Bill was first introduced the hon. Member for Poplar denounced the system of fining down, and protested against the scheme of the Government as imperfect and insufficient. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council says he does not wish to see a universal free system in this country. And the Mover of the Amendment does not wish that. We have already passed an Amendment allowing any school, the managers of which may choose to do so, to keep itself outside the Bill. We say, in point of fact, if you accept the fee grant you ought to become a free school. The right hon. Gentleman says he wants high grade schools, but high grade schools and high feed schools are not synonymous terms. The high feed schools in the North of England are not high grade schools, and the education which is given in them is not nearly so good as that which is given in the School Board schools of Birmingham. What we protest against is the wasteful plan of the Government in giving a system of free education to the country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has told us that the result of passing this Bill will be an addition next year to the taxation of the country amounting to £1,880,000 for England alone. What is the total amount of the fees? They are almost precisely the same amount, namely, £1,885,000. This sum of money ought to give us free education in all our public elementary schools. As a matter of fact, however, it will only give us free education in 80 per cent. of them. I think, therefore, it will be seen that this is a wasteful grant, and for my own part I cordially support the proposal of my hon. Friend.

*(7.40.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I cannot altogether agree with this Amendment. In many of our large cities there are parents who send their children to elementary schools, and who prefer to pay some small fee. At the same time, in all these large towns there is a residuum of the population, in some cases numbering many thousands, who are not fit to associate with the children of respectable parents. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members may cry "Oh, oh;" but I myself have seen many of them, and I think there are few hon. Members in this House who cannot corroborate my statement. It is not right to take the children of drunken and dissolute parents, accustomed to all kinds of disreputable language, and to place them among the children of the respectable artizan class. This is no imaginary evil. At any rate, it is one which is well known to myself. I have been connected with a very poor Sunday school, in which something like 1,000 children have been trained, for the last 10 years, and I know the corrupting and contaminating effects of mixing up children coming from the lowest dens and accustomed to the foulest language and the most vicious habits with the children of respectable parents. Therefore, I think some choice ought to be offered to parents by allowing them to send their children to schools in which small fees are charged.

*(7.44.) MR. WOODALL: I do not think that my hon. Friend realises the full effect of his argument, which is that in certain towns there is a particular class of the population who ought not to be allowed to send their children to the schools in which children of the respectable working class are receiving their elementary education. Happily in my own country we have no such class as the hon. Member has alluded to. But what is the effect of the argument of my hon. Friend. It is that the children of the small shopkeepers and the lower middle-class by paying an extra fee may be saved from the contamination he has described, and while the children of the decent working man would be compelled to mix with the children of that particular class. I think it is important that this difficulty, if it does exist, should be grappled with, but it ought to be done by a process of separation and insistence on certain sanitary conditions which would obviate my hon. Friend's difficulty. Upon the general question now before the Committee, I am of opinion that for a time at least it may be expedient to allow the special fee to be charged. The higher elementary school system is experimental, very hopeful, and likely to be very useful, and I think that the children of the upper working class and the small shopkeeping class ought to be able, if their parents desire it, to obtain a higher class of education on the payment of higher fees. At the same time, I am quite certain that if hon. Gentlemen support these proposals of the Government under the impression that any system of fees of this kind can be more than temporary they are mistaken. The experience of every country which has adopted free education is uniform and conclusive. If we are to follow the example which has been set in Switzerland, Belgium, France, and the United States of America, we shall provide a system of education in such a way and at such a cost as will leave no difficulty to be overcome by those who desire not only to perfect themselves in elementary subjects, but who are intent on continuing their studies in the very highest.

(7.48.) MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): This is not the first time I have heard my hon. Friend the Member for Flintshire make the extraordinary charges and allegations he has just given utterance to against a certain class of the population of our towns, in connection with the elementary system of education. Doubtless he is quite right in speaking of that which he himself knows, and probably what he has described may be the case in the City of Liverpool. Indeed, from the information I have with regard to Liverpool, I am led to believe that there is some foundation for the statement he has made; but I deny that the same state of things exists to any considerable extent throughout the country. I am quite sure that in the town of Birmingham that state of things does not exist. I have the authority of the clerk of the School Board for this, and I speak in the presence of my hon. Friend the Chairman of that Board. The dirty and neglected children to whom allusion is made are not allowed to go to the schools in a dirty condition. They are sent back to be made tidy, and by-and-bye the example they have put before them in the case of the other children with whom they mix has a marked effect upon them, so that the state of things my hon. Friend describes does not continue to exist. I am informed by a friend of mine who is a Nonconformist minister living in London, and one of the managers of several Board schools, that my hon. Friend's observations are not justified by the state of affairs in the London Board schools. This minister has sent his own children to a London Board school, and previously to a denominational school (in a quiet, clean, country town), where the fee was 9d., and he has had no more cause to complain in the one case than in the other. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the other day that none of us would send our children to Board schools. I may be allowed to inform the right hon. Gentleman that I have sent my own children to a Board school at Sheffield. From the best inquiry I could make, I was satisfied that it was for them, at their age, the best course to pursue for their benefit. The school selected, on account of its reputation, was, as a matter of fact, in one of the poorest parts of Sheffield. I have also had experience with my children in other schools of a very different kind and at a very different cost, and I tell the hon. Member for Flintshire that I have had no more cause for complaint in one school than in the other, either in regard to vermin or skin diseases or the bad language which he alleges is used by certain classes of the children. I will admit that in the Sheffield school the children speak with a Sheffield dialect, but there are a great many other people who speak with a provincial accent. Nevertheless, with regard to the language used in this Sheffield Board school and its general tone, I may say that it contrasted very favourably with the language and tone of other schools. Therefore, I trust that when my hon. Friend again urges this point upon the attention of the Committee he will confine his illustration to the City of Liverpool, and not endeavour to make it applicable to the rest of the Kingdom.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I desire to make an appeal to the Committee. The present proposal is not one which is conducive to the passing of the Bill. If there is a desire to take a Division on the Amendment, the Government are prepared to do so. At any rate, I believe the Committee as a whole are desirous to make progress, and I think there has been sufficient discussion on the present Amendment.

*MR. CHANNING: I must ask the Committee to go to a Division on this point, as it accentuates the position which we originally took.

Ayes 106; Noes 48.—(Div. List, No. 319.)

*(8.4.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I must ask the permission of the Committee to explain a few Amendments which I have on the Paper. They are rendered necessary by the fact that the latter portion of the clause is not sufficiently elastic in its terms, and therefore I propose to omit the words "amount received in," and to insert in lieu thereof "average rate of fees received." If we allow the sum to be stereotyped, as it is in this clause, the result would be that in the case of a school accepting the grant and continuing to charge fees, if there were a large accession of numbers it would not be possible to charge pro rata. The point will equally apply if there is a large reduction, so that it will touch both ways. I propose to remedy this defect by inserting the words in the Amendment, and it will, of course, be necessary to make some consequential Amendments.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 2, to leave out "amount received in," and insert "average rate of."—(Sir W. Hart Dyke.)

MR. MUNDELLA: It seems to me that by this Amendment you will be substituting what may be the nominal rate of fees for the actual fees received. Surely the best test of what the school fees are is the amount of fees actually received. We have obtained a Return of the amount received in fees during a certain period, and unless we abide by that we shall have school managers coming and saying, "Our fees are really much higher, only we were not paid so much as we ought to have been. Really our fee was 4d. per child only; in many cases we remitted the sum."

SIR W. HART DYKE: If the right hon. Gentleman will look at the subsequent wording of the clause, he will see it is provided that the sum shall be the amount actually received.

(8.9.) MR. W. H. CROSS (Liverpool, West Derby): I hope the Government will reconsider the matter, because the Amendment, by making the grant depend on the average rate of fees received, will bear very hardly on many of the voluntary schools which have, through liberally making remissions to poor parents, not received as much in fees as they might have done. I would suggest that the word "charged" should be substituted for "received." You are in the future going to limit the power of charging fees. Now, in my own experience as a manager of a voluntary school, I know we have made very considerable remissions of fees, and surely we ought not now to be punished because we did not exact the full amount we were entitled to.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am exceedingly sorry it is not in the power of the Government to accept the suggestion of the hon. Member. There is no doubt that some hardship will be felt by the managers of certain voluntary schools, especially in the North of England, who have been charitable enough to remit the fees to poor parents rather than send them before the Board of Guardians, and will, to an extent, suffer by the remission. But my faith in them is such that I am sure that they will emerge from this difficulty with the assistance of liberal friends, and that their schools will continue as efficient and as independent as in the past. The Government are obliged to take a stand somewhere, and the average of the fees received is a matter of fact easily ascertained, and as to which there can be no doubt.

(8.14.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I regret to have heard this speech from my right hon. Friend. Why was this Education Bill introduced at all? The reason, as shown by the Vice President when he brought it forward, was the difficulty in regard to the remitting of the fees in the case of those children whose parents are too poor to pay them. Under the present law parents must apply to the Board of Guardians for the remission. It was felt to be an enormous hardship that parents, who are not paupers, should, in such circumstances, have to go through the ignominy of having to appear before these Boards. The managers of many schools have recognised this, and willingly remitted the fees, thus reducing the average amount. The direct effect of the Amendment, basing the calculation on the average rate of the fees actually received rather than on the fees charged, will be to benefit those schools which forced the parents to go before the Guardians, and to impose a hardship on those schools which remitted the fees, and to that extent pauperised themselves. The hard-hearted school will be able to charge the excess beyond the fee grant which was given by the Government, while the generously-conducted school will be prevented, through the consideration it had shown for the poor parents, from doing so. When I saw the Amendment standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool I concluded that the Government would accept it, as it remedied an obvious oversight. It is a small matter pecuniarily, but it involves a great principle of justice. Considering that the Bill is not altogether what the supporters of the Government would like to see, they might concede this small point, which does not involve Government money at all; but which does involve the right of school managers to charge fees to the extent of the remissions they have made. I cannot believe the right hon. Gentleman will be deaf to a plea which is obviously founded in justice. I hope, if the Government does not see its way to at once accept the Amendment, a promise will be given to consider the matter before the Report stage.

(8.16.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): The noble Lord has stated that the adoption of this Amendment will not involve the expenditure of Government money. That may be so, but it involves a consideration of far greater importance. Just apply it to a concrete case, and the full bearing is at once seen. Take the case of a school in which at present nominally a 5d. fee is charged, but in which the fees of at least half the children are remitted. The immediate effect of this Bill, as it stands, will be that the school will become a free school. But if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Liverpool is adopted, the managers, going on the basis of the fees nominally charged, and not those actually received, will be able to charge a 2d. fee if they choose, and the parent will, for 12 months at all events, have no redress whatever. Only by the cumbersome operation of Sub-section 3 of Clause 3 will it be possible to have a free school in a district where, ex hypothesi, the facts show that a free school is most distinctly required.

(8.20.) MR. T. ELLIS: I am afraid we are losing sight of the point involved in the Amendment before the House. From a free education point of view it is a very bad Amendment. I take it the meaning of the clause is this. You may take the case of a school of 200 children, in which fees to the amount of £150 have been received. Under this Bill the school will become entitled to a fee grant of £100, and in future it must not raise more than £50 in fees, even if the number of children in attendance increases. My hon. Friends may think that the amount to be raised in fees should be allowed to rise proportionately with the increase of scholars. But Sub-section (b) provides that any new school established in the future shall be a free school, unless the Education Department specially sanction it. I think the limit which would, in the case I have referred to, prevent more than £50 being raised as fees, will be of distinct advantage, and I hold that to enable managers to charge a fee for additional children would be to take a retrograde step. The Amendment gives a power to charge a larger fee than is the case at present under the clause. I object to it, on the ground that it is against the principle of the Bill, namely, that in future we should approximate to the condition of absolutely free schools, and, further, that it is deplorable, while passing a Free Education Bill, that the House should make it possible in any school to charge more than has been charged hitherto.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I should like to point out that the clause is not elastic enough as it stands. Supposing, instead of a school increasing by 100, it decreases by 100, in such a case the school will be allowed to charge the balance which is in excess of the 10s. fee grant. By stereotyping the amount you will give such a school more than it is entitled to receive.

(8.25.) MR. MUNDELLA: I think the reply of the right hon. Gentleman should satisfy my hon. Friend. May I add that the computation is based on the fees received during the year 1890-91, one of the most prosperous years since 1874, a year in which there were less remissions than had been known for many preceding years.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercrombie): I am not so certain of that. In some places the influenza was very prevalent and seriously affected the attendance of the children. Is it not possible to take an average of three years?

MR. MUNDELLA: It would not come out so favourably to the schools.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Although I do not think we could accept the words suggested by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Cross) as they appear on the Paper, I should be inclined to vote for a modification. I gather from the noble Lord we are penalising managers of schools, who, to save parents the degradation of applying to the Guardians for the remission of fees, have paid them out of their own pockets. I think there is a good deal of force in the opposition to that, and I would support an Amendment which would bring into the calculation the fees actually remitted.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government will examine the question, and if there is any way of meeting the objections which have been raised they will be prepared to do so.

MR. W. H. CROSS: I shall be happy to fall in with the suggestion of the hon. Member for Poplar.

MR. MUNDELLA: I think the Board schools will gain far more advantage from this than the voluntary schools, which have no power to remit fees, and which do as a rule get them from the Board of Guardians.

MR. W. H. CROSS: I have remitted many fees in connection with voluntary schools.

Amendment agreed to.

Another Amendment made.

(8.30.) MR. JENNINGS (Stockport) was inaudible in the Gallery.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I do not think the intention of the section is to shut out schools such as that mentioned by my hon. Friend. It is a school to-day, and perhaps my hon. Friend will allow me to consider the matter between this and Report. These words are precise and plain, and I think it would be a pity to disturb them. (8.32.)

(9.5.) MR. T. ELLIS: I placed my Amendment on the Paper before the Government brought down the age from five to three, and raised it from 14 to 15, and I do not now want to raise the question of age; but I ask that the Amendment may be accepted, so that these schools shall be absolutely free. Whether the Amendment or the insertion of the words "for any child" is accepted or not, I shall move the next Amendment to provide that a school being made free no child shall ever afterwards be required to pay a fee.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): May I ask, Sir, if this Amendment is in order?

THE CHAIRMAN: I am bound to say I do not know what it means. But the hon. Member proposes to move the next Amendment?

MR. T. ELLIS assented.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 9, to leave out the words "except as by this Act provided."—(Mr. Thomas Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The hon. Gentleman has not explained his object. I suppose he relies upon that explanation of his views which he has given us on former occasions with force and ability. We cannot accept the proposal, and, indeed, I do not quite understand the object of moving it now.

MR. T. ELLIS: I had rather be found fault with for making my speeches too short than too long. This Amendment must be taken in connection with the 1st sub-section of the next clause. It will be seen that my object is to make the schools free once and for all, so that when once schools are made free no power shall be reserved for the Department, under any condition whatever, to set up fee-paying schools again.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I think I understand, and I will state the view of the Government. We do not in the least wish to encourage any schools to raise their fees, and we believe that the result of the Bill will be to lower fees generally where schools are not made absolutely free. It is necessary, however, to keep a reservation for cases where, owing to a shifting population or other causes, it may be necessary for the managers to raise fees should such a step be in accordance with the educational wants of the district. The provision is, therefore, necessary, in order to impart elasticity to the system. Just as, on the one hand, where there is a demand for free education, the Department will meet it, so, on the other hand, in those probably very exceptional cases where the circumstances of the district require it, the managers will be empowered to raise fees. This is what is contemplated in Section 1 of the next clause.

*(9.11.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR: I think the hon. Gentleman need not persist in his Amendment, because, should we succeed in striking out or modifying Clause 3, these words will become mere surplusage, and will have to be struck out on Report; but if the Government carry Clause 3 in its what we consider present objectionable form, the words will be necessary.

MR. T. ELLIS: I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman or the noble Lord either has quite realised my meaning. The Vice President is now in his place, and that he may appreciate my point I may explain. The 1st sub-section of Clause 3 allows, under certain circumstances and with the special permission of the Education Department, fees to be charged. Now, whatever we may say as to giving the Education Department power to increase fees where the fee grant will in the future be less than the present fees charged, namely, in schools charging more than 3d., I hold that schools made free should remain free now and for ever, and that the Education Department should not by any permission make these fee-paying schools again on any consideration or condition whatever.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I quite understand, and my explanation is that it is only to give the Department, in rare cases where there might be such a movement of population, or a change in the conditions of labour in the district as would make the imposition of fees desirable, the power of assent to the charging of fees. But really the objection of the hon. Gentleman arises on the next clause, and should the sub-section in that clause be struck out by the Committee, of course these words would have to be omitted on Report.

Lord G. Hamilton

*(9.14.) MR. ROBY: I hope the Government will consent to concede the whole point which arises in connection with the two clauses. It is a small matter, and the Government admit that the cases in which the power may be exercised are likely to be very rare.

SIR W. HART DYKE: So far as I understand, the object this Amendment really strikes at the first two sub-sections of Clause 3, and the removal of these from the Bill.

MR. ROBY: Only in line 9. We are dealing with schools which are by the Act made free, and we do not want a fee to be again imposed.

SIR W. HART DYKE: The reservation is required in connection with Clause 3.

MR. SUMMERS: There are two parts of Clause 2, and the first relates to schools made free under the Act, the fee grant of 10s. being in excess of the existing fees, and we maintain that these schools should remain free, no power being given to the Department to impose fees afterwards.

SIR W. HART DYKE: The powers to be given to the Department are contained in Clause 3, Sub-sections 1 and 2, and to these the cutting out of these words has reference. The hon. Member wishes to close the door against the Department, even consenting to fees being charged again. This, now, is a question of drafting, and the words have reference to Clause 3, where the point should be directly raised.

MR. SUMMERS: The words "except by this Act provided" occur again in line 15. If we strike out the words in line 9, it does not follow that the 1st sub-section of Clause 3 will not remain. We maintain that we ought not to give power to re-impose fees in schools once made free. We provide the money to get rid of fees where the fee is now less than 3d., and we want that to be absolute and obligatory.

*(9.16.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I can only say again what I said in the Debate upon the Second Reading: what we intend by Clause 3 is to meet the possibility that may arise owing to the exigencies of a district. The character of the population may entirely change, and it may be that the requirements of the neighbourhood no longer demand that a school shall be free. I do not say that such cases will often occur. I do not even say they are likely to occur, but the point has to be considered. The striking out these words now means destroying the effect of Clause 3, which we still have to discuss.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): It is clear to me that the intention is to leave a loop-hole, by means of which the Department will be enabled to allow voluntary schools to keep the 10s. grant and yet charge fees. Now, that is a matter of principle. We do not believe that, by any shifting of population, there will be any necessity to re-impose fees, and we do not wish it should be possible to re-impose fees in a school once free. It is a small matter, yet it is a matter of principle. Do you intend to give free schools or not? If you have that intention let it be carried out; but do not give with one hand that which you reserve power to withdraw by a Department under pressure with the other. It is a matter of principle, and I hope the hon. Member will carry it to Division.

CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): The hon. Member is quite right—it is a matter of principle; it is one of the principles—if not the main principle a sub-principle—upon which we are in opposition to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and I hope my right hon. Friend will not accept the Amendment.

*MR. H. J. WILSON: The argument of migration of population scarcely applies, for, as a matter of fact, the poorer neighbourhoods are densely populated, and population spreads outwards to better districts, but a poor population as a rule does not leave a district. It is a serious penalty that will be imposed on a man when he removes into an improving district—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is anticipating the discussion which will arise on Clause 3. Nothing really turns upon the omission of these words; it is a matter of detail in reference to Clause 3.

*(9.30.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): The object of the Amendments I have placed on the Paper is to meet the case of half-timers. At present every half-timer pays the full fee. Under this Bill, when the Government Amendments are inserted, only 7s. 6d., instead of 10s., will be received by a school in the case of a half-timer, and therefore there will be a loss of half-a-crown, which cannot be recouped in any way. In Preston we have 1,739 half-timers, so that the loss of these half-crowns will amount to no less than £434 15s. a year. We have no School Board in Preston, and therefore this loss falls on voluntary schools; but where there are School Boards there will, of course, be a similar loss. I am a strong supporter of the half-time system, but I know that for the purposes of discipline and the management of the school, the schoolmasters always desire to have no half-timers, as they give a certain amount of extra trouble to the masters, and therefore it is quite fair that they should pay the full fee. When a school becomes free there will be no possible means of recouping the half-crown, and I do not think there will be any means where a fee is charged. I maintain, as a matter of justice, that where loss is incurred by a school by the fact of children going on half-time they ought to make good that loss out of the wages they earn. This is said not to be consistent with the system of free education. I deny that altogether. Every child has the option of being a free scholar, but where he, for his own benefit, puts himself into the position of a half-timer and causes a loss to the school, that loss ought in fairness to be recouped by him.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 9, after "provided," insert "and except in the case of half-time scholars."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(9.34.) SIR W. HART DYKE: This question has already been raised, and I have already foreshadowed an Amendment to be proposed on the definition clause that will place the half-time in precisely the same position with regard to this grant and with regard to the ordinary grant.

*MR. TOMLINSON: In my argument I assumed that that was to be in the Bill.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I was in hopes I had met the difficulty. My hon. and learned Friend raises another difficulty, and suggests that there shall be power to charge fees in regard to half-timers. There is a little inconsistency in my hon. Friend's argument, because he supports the half-time system—and I agree with him in doing so—but says the half-timer may, if he likes, become a full-timer in order to avoid payment of the half-crown. I should like very much to meet my hon. Friend, but I cannot see my way to do so, and I cannot but think it would be a blot on the Bill to provide that the half-timers should be bound to pay a fee. I have gone the full length I can go as regards the administration of our fee grant, and I cannot at present see my way to meet the difficulty my hon. Friend has suggested.

(9.37.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: I feel very much obliged to my right hon. Friend for his very conciliatory answer, and I can quite believe he does not see his way entirely to adopt the suggestion of my hon. and learned Friend. The Amendment, however, calls attention to a very great difficulty. There will be a deficit in regard to the half-timers. That will be very difficult for the managers to meet. The logical position for the managers to adopt would be to charge a small fee for the half-timer and a larger fee for the full-timer; but that would be contrary to the whole system that has been adopted. Considerable hardship will be felt if the managers take the only course open to them under the Government scheme and charge a small fee to all pupils alike. If my right hon. Friend can see his way to meet the difficulty, I hope he will do so.

*MR. TOMLINSON: I wish to point out that I am not asking the Exchequer to help us at all, but suggesting that the half-timers should make up the deficit.

(9.39.) MR. ILLINGWORTH: Is the hon. and learned Gentleman aware that schools benefit very considerably from the fact that full fees are paid by half-timers? It would only be aggravating the hardship now inflicted on half-timers to press the point further.

*MR. TOMLINSON: All school managers will tell you that half-timers really cause as much trouble as the full-timers. The masters and teachers would rather have the children in school the whole time than half time for the sake of simplifying the teaching.

*MR. F. S. POWELL: I may point out that I received a telegram from Bradford yesterday, saying that in the Board schools the half-time scholars and the whole-time scholars pay the same fees: while in a large voluntary school with which I am connected the half-timers pay only a half fee.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I did not say anything to the contrary.

Question put, and negatived.

(9.45.) MR. MUNDELLA: The next Amendment which I beg to move is a very reasonable one, and goes to make clear what is the meaning of the Government. It is to the effect that in any school where the fee grant exceeds the previous total school income from fees and books, no charge whatever shall be made to any scholar. It is quite clear that when the income of the school has been covered by the amount of the grant a dangerous system may grow up unless this Amendment is accepted. I have received many complaints as to the charges for books, which have really become another mode of increasing the fees. The charge for books is most capricious. Parents never know what to expect, and we only ask that in the future, as in the past, where 10s. covered the cost of education and books, the total charge for books shall be covered by the fee grant.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 11, after "age," to insert "In any school where the fee grant exceeds the previous total school income from fees and books no charge whatever shall be made to any scholar."—(Mr. Mundella.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I gather that the right hon. Gentleman means that where there has been an excess over the 10s., if the school continues a fee-charging school, in the future the limit shall not be in excess of the amount previously charged. The Amendment is to meet the case where a charge has been made for books, and a profit has been made on the books, which profit, under the new system, would raise the income over 10s.

MR. MUNDELLA: I do not only deal with the question of profit. In the Return the right hon. Gentleman presented to the House there is a column devoted to "income from fees and books." I say that where this income has been under 10s. in the past, and the school elects to receive 10s. from the Government, that amount shall include the payment in future for books. I propose, in short, that no new charge shall be made.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I have an Amendment on the Paper which proposes to add to the clause words providing that in any school receiving the fee grant no parent shall be compelled to purchase any books or other articles from the managers or teachers of a school, and I submit that those words meet the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. MUNDELLA: Those words by no means cover the case.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I submit that they cover the whole case. If a parent chose to purchase these articles, the sum would be reckoned as a subscription to the school rather than as the payment of a fee. There would be no compelling power hereafter to charge parents for books or other articles. There is not a large point between the right hon. Member and myself, but I venture to think that my suggestion meets the case better than that of the right hon. Gentleman.

(9.50.) MR. MUNDELLA: I have submitted both Amendments to a draftsman, and I am assured that they are not the same. The right hon. Gentleman's Amendment provides that no parent shall be compelled to purchase these things from the managers or teachers, but the managers or teachers of a school might require a child to purchase them elsewhere. What my Amendment provides is that the books shall be provided in the future as they have been in the past; that is to say, that no new charge shall be made.

MR. A. DYKE ACLAND: In all the best schools of the country the books are always included in the charge, and I do think that it ought to be made certain that in all cases of schools receiving a surplus the books should be provided free of cost to the scholars. Though it may be provided that parents shall not be compelled to purchase, yet they may be invited, requested, or advised to do so, and thus the prohibition, in the words of the Vice President, may be evaded. Not one parent in a hundred will know of the existence of any clause that they were not compelled to purchase. There is really no analogy between the Amendment of the right hon. Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield and the words given by the Vice President.

*COLONEL BLUNDELL: It seems to me that the right hon. Member opposite believes that the position of the schools in the future will be the same as in the past. Can he guarantee that?

*MR. HOBHOUSE: This appears to me a very reasonable Amendment, and I hope the Government will accept it. To my mind, there cannot be a better way of spending the surplus over and above the 10s. fee grant than in providing books.

SIR L. PLAYFAIR: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield and the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council clearly have the same intention in their Amendments. I believe that the Vice President of the Council in drawing up his Amendment wished to do what the Member for Sheffield had in his mind, and that it is simply in the wording of the Amendments that they differ. I think, however, that the Amendment of the Vice President of the Council will be open to misconception, and I therefore would urge the Committee to accept that of my right hon. Friend.

CAPTAIN BETHELL: I have had several letters on this subject from school managers, who say that if the Amendment is adopted it will make a great difference in their incomes. But I also heard that there is a great waste of money in cases where the parents have to purchase the books. I cannot help thinking that it would conduce to economy to provide for the supply of free books.

(9.55.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM : I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council will give way on this small matter. This is a Bill to give free education to the people. There are two ways in which the people feel the cost of education. They feel it in the weekly pence, but they feel it quite as much in the 6d., 9d., aye, and 1s. 6d. which the rural labourers occasionally have to provide for books if they have two or three children at school, and these children advance from one standard into another and require fresh class books. This clause provides that where the income of the school has been 10s., not from fees alone, but from fees and books, free books shall be given. I am one of the managers of a school where the income from school pence is only about 7s. 6d., and this Bill will be a good thing, financially, for us. The question will arise, what shall be done with our surplus, and I say, beyond all else, I think it will be best disposed of in the provision of books. Let this be the first charge on it.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): We are all agreed that the use of free books is to be included in the fee grant; but the question is, which is the more convenient mode of securing this? I think that of the right hon. Gentleman opposite is the less convenient of the two, as we have already in the clause a definition of how you are to ascertain what the income of a school is. The right hon. Gentleman's Amendment would be inconsistent with that.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimshy): I would ask the Government to consider the advisability of going a little further than they propose to do in this matter. I think, from the answer of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, that when he spoke he was under the impression that the surplus income would only be that obtained through the fees, but the Amendment is distinct on the point that the surplus is to be held as being obtained from fees and books. If something approaching this Amendment is not accepted what will be the result? You will first have the fee grant estimated on the income, including the cost of books; and then, if the managers are to be allowed to make money by selling books, you will be allowing them to benefit twice over. I think the Amendment is a fair one, and I much prefer it to the proposal of the Vice President of the Council.

MR. W. H. SMITH : There appears to be no real difference of opinion in regard to the object to be attained. The only difficulty is as to the words in which it shall be expressed. The words of the Amendment do not satisfactorily meet the case, and I think it will be better to reserve the matter for further consideration, in order that an addition to the clause may be carefully framed.

MR. MUNDELLA : My Amendment says that no charge whatever shall be made to any scholar, and this would include such charges as those for lighting and warming which are sometimes made. I say we ought not under this Bill to have a crop of new charges springing up. We are abolishing fees, and I think we should take care that all charges are done away with. However, I withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(10.2.)MR. G. W. BALFOUR : I beg to move the Amendment which is next on the Paper in my name. In the high fee schools the amount hitherto raised by fees will have to be provided partly by the fee grant of 10s. and partly by a supplementary fee. But that supplementary fee will be strictly limited in amount. It is not to exceed 10s. on the average, and if it does exceed that amount the excess is to be deducted from the fee grant. It has been repeatedly pointed out that in cases where the present amount of the fees exceed by only a comparatively small sum the amount of 10s., there will be great difficulty in raising the supplementary fee. It can only be done by charging a small fraction of a penny, and almost all practical educational authorities seem to be agreed that to charge a fraction of a penny is impossible.

My right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council has endeavoured to meet this objection. He says, "Why should not the school managers distribute the fees among the different classes, charging one more and another less, so as to raise the precise amount required, and yet retain a fee capable of being measured in integral pence." That is a specious argument, but I do not regard it as altogether convincing. I certainly do not think the difficulty can be altogether removed in that way. In some schools the managers might wish to charge the uniform fee throughout; in others they might desire to have a uniform fee for the higher standards and another uniform fee for the lower ones, or, perhaps, to free the lower ones altogether. But as the Bill now stands they will not be able to distribute fees as they think best, but must subordinate all other considerations to the solution of an arithmetical puzzle, which perhaps cannot be solved at all. So much for the schools where at present there is an average charge of a small sum of 10s. per head, but there are others in which much higher fees are charged. These schools also will be placed in a difficulty. They will have to adjust the school pence so as to exactly hit off a fixed and precise sum. If they exceed the limit a deduction will be made from the grant. If they fall short of it a loss will ensue, and it is quite possible that the loss may be doubled under the operation of the 17s. 6d. limit. The remedy I propose is a simple and practical one, and amounts to this: that a certain margin should be allowed on the supplementary fee which the Bill permits to be charged. I have put this margin at 2s. for each child, which represents, roughly speaking, $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per week for each child for 44 or 45 weeks in the year. A few days ago my right hon. Friend felt himself compelled to decline the proposal made from these Benches that there should be an average fee of 3d. weekly. I thought that that was a perfectly reasonable proposal, because it corresponds to the true average of the fees paid in the elementary schools throughout the country. It was not accepted, however, I suppose principally on financial grounds, but there can be no such objection to the proposal made in my Amendment. Whatever burden it may impose will fall not upon the Exchequer, but upon the parents. Nor can it be regarded as an infringement of the principle of free education so long as it is practically possible, under Clause 3, for all parents to claim free places for their children. I beg, therefore, to move this Amendment, and to express a hope that it will be accepted by the Committee.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 15, to leave out from "total" to "excess," in line 17, inclusive, and insert "average amount received in fees during the school year for each child of the number of children in average attendance at the school, when added to the fee grant per head, exceed by more than two shillings the average amount similarly received during the aforesaid year."

*(10.15.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I do not like to disappoint my hon. Friend, but I must say that his proposal would upset to a great extent the whole financial basis of the Bill. The principle of our proposal is that the excess alone over the grant must be charged, and it would not be fair to hon. Members opposite who voted for the Second Reading to depart from that principle, because where a school charges 15s. they might accept our fee grant of 10s., and yet charge 7s. That is what I am afraid it amounts to. My hon. Friend seems to think that there must be some difficulty with regard to the balance of fee, and that some loss may still accrue. My hon. Friend urges that it will be very difficult for managers to hit any precise balance, and he represents the loss which might accrue from making a bad shot. The balance might be too much, and what they ought to do is to err on the right side. If they get too much it is simply a balance of accounts, and where an excess was really charged it would simply be struck off the fee grant. Whether the excess is 2s. or $\frac{1}{2}$ d., it will simply be a matter of accounts. I think in that way the difficulty which my hon. Friend urges may be met.

*COLONEL BLUNDELL: Would managers of schools be allowed to charge supplementary fees during four or five months in the year, and then, if they had collected enough, cease charging, so as to avoid charging fractions of a penny?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: Yes; the Department will only look to the gross amount; it will not inquire how the fees are distributed among certain parents, still less will they criticise the time at which such fees are paid. All we ask is that the amount does not exceed the excess over the fee grant.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 3.

*(10.20.) MR. SUMMERS: I beg to move to leave out Sub-section (1). This is a clause empowering the Education Department, if they are satisfied that sufficient free-school accommodation has been provided for a school district, and that the charge of school fees or the increase of school fees in any particular school receiving the fee grant will be for the educational benefit of the district, to approve such charge or increase of fees, provided that the fees shall not exceed an average fee of 6d. a week. I contend that the sub-section strikes at the principle of the Bill. The State is to provide £2,000,000 every year for the purpose of freeing 80 per cent. of the schools in this country. This sub-section would give the Education Department power to undo the work of Parliament, to unfree schools which we have determined shall be free. I do not know whether the Vice President has any argument to offer in favour of this clause.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Sub-section (1) of Clause 3.—(Mr. Summers.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'Notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, the Education Department may, if they are satisfied,' stand part of the Clause."

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I shadowed forth in my remarks on the Second Reading of the Bill that this 1st sub-section was open to comment on the other side of the House, because it would be suggested that we were endeavouring to take away with one hand what we were giving with the other. But it is nothing of the kind. The subsection is proposed entirely with a view to facilitate the administration of the Education Department. It is to enable the Department to meet certain emergencies, such as a sudden shifting or growth of population, or in districts where there may be a very strong demand for higher education. Take the case of Cheltenham, and compare it with what it was 10 years ago, and you will have an example of how populations change and grow. There is no hidden meaning in this clause; it is entirely a departmental matter. The sub-section can only operate where the demand for free education has been fully supplied. That is a sine qua non, and I hope hon. Members will be prepared to accept this proposal.

*(10.26.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR: If the Vice President's intention were expressed by the clause in actual words, there would not be the same objection to it as now. As the clause stands, complete power is put into the hands of the Education Department to defeat the intentions of Parliament, that the schools which are made free shall remain free. Future administrators may take a different view from that of my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council, and the only safeguard is to state in words what is the intention. An Act of Parliament is governed by its words, not by opinions expressed in this House, and this clause as it stands gives a most unwarrantable power to the Department to interfere with the intentions of Parliament, and we on this side of the House could not accept these words.

MR. A. E. GATHORNE HARDY (Sussex, East Grinstead): My object in rising is to express the hope that if this clause is opposed, the Government will not insist upon it. If they do I shall support them by my vote, but I look upon this as a matter of such very small importance compared with the importance of getting the Bill through without unnecessary friction, that I hope the Government will not persist in endeavouring to meet the demands of the Department that this particular clause shall be carried. As far as I can see it is simply put forward on the ground that there may be a shifting of population; it is possible there may be, but undoubtedly it would not be a matter of frequent occurrence. It is a small matter, involving no Party question of any kind or description, and, therefore, I venture to urge the Government not to press the proposal. Recognising the importance of getting the Bill rapidly through Committee, I hope the Government will not consider it necessary to resist the Amendment.

*(10.30.) LORD G. HAMILTON: It has been said there is no great shifting of populations and change in the character of a district, but I have been associated for many years with a constituency which is a striking example of such changes. The rapid changes in the suburbs are scarcely credible to those who have not witnessed them. Two classes come into the district, the poor who are forced out of London by the changes there, and the better class of occupiers who take villas for their families while they pursue their occupation in London. In districts such as these it is desirable that the Education Department should have such a power. I do not think it is a power that will be often exercised, but we do see the possibility of a district rapidly changing its character entirely from a poor district to a well-to-do district. But the schools are there and cannot be moved, while the population has shifted and the schools are for the convenience of the population. All that this clause does is to give the Education Department power in these particular cases to raise the fees to meet the wishes and requirements of the population. It seems to me a very reasonable proposition, and I do not think it is at all at discord with the principle of the Bill, on the contrary, it falls in with the principle that where parents do not want free education, and prefer to pay fees there shall be no obstacle put in their way.

(10.33.) MR. A. DYKE ACLAND: We are bound to consider the words of the clause as they stand; we are not bound and we cannot be bound by even the most beneficent intentions expressed by the Vice President of the Council, and the noble Lord. We have these words in the clause, and they remain under whatever changes take place in the personnel of administration, and the clause will allow a 3d. school to be made a 4d. school, a 4d. school to be made a

5d. school, and a free school to charge fees. We were led originally to believe that we were to have a Free Education Bill, but now it is an Assisted Education Bill that we are getting. We are told that this clause is to meet certain exigencies that may arise, and that this demand will be made, not upon the Treasury, but upon willing parents. But we do not want to make this charge upon parents in the field of elementary education; we want to relieve parents as far as we can. We know from a letter of the Vice President to a correspondent, and he has told us, I am sorry to say, more than once, that he approves of these exclusive schools with high fees. He has said that the School Boards will altogether abolish their fees and so attract one class of children, and so he hopes that the voluntary schools will be able to charge high fees. But your high fee schools are your low subscription schools, and not the schools which give a first-rate education. Your high fee school is not a school which gives a more first-rate education than schools like the penny schools of Birmingham; the fees are high simply because the subscriptions are low. The Vice President has said he hopes that the effect will be to bring into these high fee voluntary schools the pick of the children in our public elementary schools whose parents on social or religious grounds—not on educational grounds observe—prefer for their children a more exclusive type of schools than the School Boards furnish. Certainly by all means the Vice President desires, and the parents wish on social and religious grounds, to have exclusive schools; but I see no reason why, if these schools are to exist, the Department should have pressure put upon it to raise the fees to increase the income of the managers. Surely we ought to prevent any pressure on the Department in the future, in the interest of exclusiveness or on those social religious grounds for raising fees, and that is why we oppose the clause.

(10.37.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: If the only object of the section is to meet the case of a free school, the managers of which wish to convert it into a fee-paying school, that object can be obtained without this clause at all. If a neighbourhood changes its character and ceases to be a district inhabited by the working classes, and if the inhabitants desire that the school shall change its character and that fees shall be charged, there is nothing to prevent the managers of the school meeting that wish; there is nothing to prevent a free school from becoming a fee-paying school if the managers comply with one condition, namely, that they give up the fee grant. If the change in the neighbourhood justifies it, let the managers give up the grant, and there is no restriction on their charging fees; but this clause provides that they may keep the Government grant, and charge fees also. That seems to me altogether unreasonable, and it cannot be defended on the argument put forward.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: The hon. Member for Rotherham is not very generous in his criticisms of the Bill. In speech after speech he denies the character of free education to the Bill. The hon. Member for Sussex (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) stated the whole case when he said this is a very small matter we are now discussing, and it is scarcely worth while retaining this which is really a small blot on what is, in spite of the language of the hon. Member for Rotherham, a free education Bill. The noble Lord says the object of keeping the clause in is that in certain districts there may be a migration of population, that the poor inhabitants may remove, or there may be a large settlement of a villa population. Now, the danger we have to provide against is that the interests of the poorer classes may be sacrificed to the wishes of the villa population. This is a possible danger in the future, though it will not arise while the present Vice President is at the head of affairs. But we have to take into account not the interpretation the right hon. Gentleman puts upon it, but what are the possibilities under the clause, and I cannot imagine that the right hon. Gentleman has a very strong feeling in favour of retaining the clause, which is, I am bound to admit, a small blot upon what is unquestionably and genuinely a free education Bill. I hope, therefore, the Government will, if they do not see their way to withdrawing the clause, insert the modifications suggested by the hon. Member for Leeds.

*(10.40.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I can only repeat what I have said more than once, the clause will only come into operation where there is not sufficient accommodation of this nature to be found. By Sub-section 3, any parent can, by making representation to the Department, secure free school accommodation. You have, therefore, an appellate power, and the claim to free school accommodation is sufficiently guarded.

MR. MUNDELLA: My right hon. Friend said a little while ago that this clause has been inserted to meet the demands or the requirements of the Department. I am afraid if it had depended upon the wishes of the permanent officials of the Department we should not have had this Bill at all. The Education Department has never been in favour of free schools, and has not been in favour of low fees. Now, we all wish to make progress with the Bill, but if we are to make progress I say frankly this section must come out. [Cries of "No!"] The noble Lord has said this is a very small point, and that it is intended to meet the requirements of a shifting population, that if a rich neighbourhood becomes a poor neighbourhood, then free schools are required, while if it becomes a rich district like Kensington, free schools are not required. But I say this clause confers more power upon the Department than any Department ought to have. Having given this magnificent boon of £2,250,000 for free education, you now propose to give the Department at any time the power to impose fees in any school which had been enjoying free education. This is to be done wherever the Department is satisfied that it will be for the advantage of education. But I say for the sake of progress with the Bill the Government should abandon this subsection.

(10.43.) MR. A. E. GATHORNE HARDY: I am seriously disappointed at the result of my intervention in this Debate. I intervened, as I said, in the interest of peace and progress with the Bill, notwithstanding that I thought my intervention might be misunderstood. I spoke wholly and solely with the view of removing this matter altogether from the line of Party disputes and of promoting progress with the Bill. [Mr. MUNDELLA: "Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman says "Hear, hear," but I wonder does he think the speech he has just delivered has a tendency towards promoting the same object? When the right hon. Gentleman says—"If you wish to make progress with the Bill you must give up this section," is that the way to allay Party feeling? I can only say that if I had not got up before the right hon. Gentleman's speech nothing would induce me to make such an appeal now. I was followed by the hon. Member for Rotherham, who told us this is not a Free Education Bill at all, and then the right hon. Gentleman says that if it had rested with the Department we should never have had this Bill at all. Well, if this is the way in which my intervention is received, it does not encourage one to endeavour to promote agreement and progress by suggestions from this side of the House. Still, however, I may repeat that the matter is a very small one, and I think if we could succeed in discussing it without heat, this might reasonably be conceded.

MR. MUNDELLA: I should be sorry if I had imported any Party heat into the Debate, but I do not think I have done so. Throughout I have endeavoured to preserve an impartial position, and have only been actuated by the interests of education. I will now only say that although this is a small matter, it may lead to very serious results, and I trust the Government will yield in the matter.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not think any heat need be imported into the discussion of this which is a small matter, but it is one, notwithstanding, to which the Government attach importance in the interests of education. The Government are willing on Report to consider the introduction of words qualifying the power of the Education Department, but at present they must adhere to the words in the Bill. I hope, notwithstanding the threat of the right hon.

Gentleman, we may be allowed to retain and sub-section, and proceed with the Bill.

*(10.47.) MR. HOBHOUSE: I have been anxious for some time to make a suggestion which would, I think, reduce this contention to its proper dimensions. It has been allowed that the interpretation put upon the clause by the right hon. Gentleman opposite makes it much less objectionable than it appears at first sight. I would suggest that the Government should introduce words to make clear the meaning and the extent of the application of the sub-section, as, for instance, "where the Education Department are satisfied that a change of fee is required owing to a change of population." I do not, however, myself believe there is much danger of the Education Department, exposed as it is to keen criticism, showing a disposition to abuse its power and misuse the clause.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: As I have said, the Government are prepared to consider between now and the Report stage whether qualifying words should be introduced.

*SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University): There are certain other words in the clause which have, I think, been overlooked. I approach the question from a purely educational point of view, and I wish to point out that there are words in the clause to which no hon. Member has referred—namely, that the Department shall be satisfied that the permission "will be for the educational benefit of the district." It is very undesirable to stereotype our school system, to limit our schools to one type. If the artisans in a particular district wish for a school better provided and better equipped, why should they be deprived of the advantage of the 3d. because they propose to pay something themselves to raise the education of their children? I think the clause embodies a valuable principle, and I hope the Government will adhere to it.

*(10.50.) SIR G. TREVELYAN: I certainly desire that the question should be taken altogether out of a partisan atmosphere. In reply to the right hon. Baronet who has just spoken, I may say we have had experience in Scotland of that which, in all good faith, the right hon. Gentleman desires to bring about in England—a system of graded schools. An opinion in favour of such a system is held by a certain number of persons in Scotland; but on educational grounds, there is an opinion among a great many persons strongly opposed to anything in the nature of graded schools. The great object of free education is to secure equality among all the schools of the locality, that they shall be built for the great body of the people and enjoyed by them. The only way in which a high standard of education can be maintained in those schools is to induce the better-class parents to send their children to the same schools as the great body of the people. In this way the level of education is gradually raised. On educational grounds, therefore, I feel the strongest repugnance to accepting this clause. This clause is even more serious than the provision we have in Scotland, for here you are not only providing for fee schools being established, but that schools having been made free may again be made fee-paying schools. If we believe in free education we are bound to vote against the clause, and it requires very good reasons to convince us that the clause is necessary.

(10.55.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I think I may claim to be a believer in free education, but that does not prevent me from believing also that a minority has a right, if it pleases, to a more select school—[Ironical cheers—]—or whatever other adjective you please to use, in order to characterise the schools for which they are willing to pay. Hon. Members behind me cheer ironically, but how would they like the right to be taken away from themselves? How many of them desire to avail themselves of free education when it is established? The right which they claim to send their children to Eton, Harrow, or anywhere else is a right which they ought to concede to any working man who is willing to pay the fees which will be asked of him if he sends his children to a select school, and is not satisfied with the national school provided out of national taxation. We have, therefore, to contemplate for the children of the working classes as well as for the children of the upper classes a choice of schools. That is the principle of the Bill. The case of Preston has been mentioned, where there is no Board school, and where the fees are very high. What will happen there if the Bill passes? I presume that a certain number of working men in Preston will claim free education. If so, it would be absolutely necessary that this free education should be provided for them either in the voluntary or Board school. Suppose, however, that one-third claim free schools and two-thirds desire to go on paying fees. The one-third will be provided for in those districts in which this demand for free education arises. It may well happen that in the course of time the population in Preston will shift, and in the district which now desires free education there may be a population which does not desire free education. Why should they be forced to have the free school continued? That is precisely the case contemplated by the clause. After all, this is a very small point, because the case is not likely to occur very often; but if there are to be great appeals to principle, then, as a friend of free education, I must say that I see no possible objection to the clause.

*(11.1.) MR. SUMMERS: My right hon. Friends the Members for West Birmingham and the University of London seem to attach much importance to this sub-section. They hold that if this and the following sub-section are struck out we shall have a universal system of free education throughout the country. We have already passed an Amendment making it permissive for any school to exempt itself from the operation of the Bill. It, therefore, seems to me that the only thing we have to consider is the bearing of this particular clause upon Clause 1. By Clause 1 we have provided a sum of money to free schools from the exaction of fees, and by this clause we are giving the Education Department a dispensing power to undo what we have already done in Clause 1. We are going to give this money, and we have a right to receive something in return. What we claim in return is the free education for which we pay. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham compared the working man who wants to have a fee-paying school to which he can send his children to members of the middle and the upper classes, who send their sons to Eton and Harrow. But there is no analogy at all. We have not under the first clause remitted fees in the case of Eton and Harrow, and, therefore, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman is beside the mark. Representations in favour of striking out this clause have been made from various parts of the House. I hope it is not too late for the Government to reconsider their position. They themselves see that this matter is one of great importance. It seems to me the clause will place an invidious duty on the Education Department from which the Department ought to be the first to wish to be relieved. Under the clause it will rest with the Department to determine whether the managers of any particular school who claim to raise fees shall be allowed to do so or not.

MR. HALLEY STEWART rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put," but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put the Question.

Debate resumed.

*(11.6.) MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I think it is necessary that there should be a certain amount of elasticity on this point. Unless there is some latitude allowed, schools who charge higher fees must either turn out their children or submit to the loss of the grant on a large portion of the schools, and this will throw the children back into inefficient private adventure schools, which are not inspected at all. I think this clause properly guarded may provide against that danger, and therefore I shall certainly vote for it.

*MR. HOBHOUSE: It would be well to have the matter cleared up. Will the Government accept words distinctly limiting this sub-section to cases where there is a shifting of population?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it is only right and fair to say that is clearly the intention of the Government, and that we shall be prepared subsequently to accept such qualifying words.

Question put, and agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 23, after "fee grant," to insert "if required owing to the change of population in the district and."—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We accept the proposed words, subject to their qualification on Report if it is found necessary.

(11.14.) CAPTAIN BETHELL: I think it is right to point out that if the right hon. Gentleman accepts these words he will entirely break through the understanding. We have always understood there is something in the nature of a principle in this Bill. That principle has been admitted just now by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. It has also been explained by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University. I, for one, do not approve of this, and I scarcely know why the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House has accepted it so readily. I think it would have been better to give it a little more anxious consideration.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: We have not any of us seen the words, and I would suggest that by far the simpler and more business-like plan would be to put them down on Report. My right hon. Friend cannot pledge the Government to accept them without reconsideration on Report, and the ordinary course in the House of Commons is to have before it the words on which it has to decide.

*SIR L. PLAYFAIR: I would point out how important it is that these words should be inserted now. They carry out what the Government all along explained as their intention. Everyone has given the clause a different interpretation, and all the Government propose to do is to carry out what the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council has said from the beginning was his intention. It was on this faith that we did not go to a Division.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman has accurately described the state of affairs. When the first subsection of the clause was framed it was distinctly contemplated that there might be a change of population which, in the educational interest of the district, might require a free school to be converted into a fee paying school. It was our intention to meet this case when we put this clause into the Bill, and I must ask my hon. Friend to allow the Amendment to stand, at all events until the Report, and, if he has any objection to it, to raise it then.

*MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I should like to know whether if these words are introduced it will be impossible for any school hereafter established to make any charge beyond the amount of the grant?

*COLONEL COTTON-JODRELL (Cheshire, Wirral): We must try, as well as hon. Members on the other side of the House, to improve the Bill. I attach very great importance to this clause, and think that the speeches delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) and the right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock) have put the whole case in a nutshell, and expressed our views in a clearer and more expanded form than the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House has done. I hope my right hon. Friend will see fit to postpone the further consideration of these words till the Report stage.

(11.20.) MR. A. E. GATHORNE HARDY: I cannot help thinking that my hon. Friend misunderstands the true meaning and effect of this clause. It will apply only in the very few cases where there is a shifting population. The speech of the right hon. Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) ought to have been delivered on the 2nd clause. That clause has been carried, and is now part of the policy of the Bill. This clause was brought forward solely for departmental reasons, and to deal with those places that have a shifting population. Hon. Gentlemen opposite have not divided on the clause, and when it is promised that the words in question shall be inserted on the distinct understanding that they shall be, if necessary, considered on Report, it would be ungracious not to accept that offer.

*MR. F. S. POWELL: I hope the words will be postponed until the Report. The interpretation which will generally be put on the clause will be that expressed by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. I cannot help saying, and I say it deliberately, that I think the Government have scarcely acted fairly by their friends in accepting the words in question, altering as they do the effect of the clause. Their action in this instance will greatly shake the confidence of many of their friends.

MR. HENEAGE: I am perfectly astounded at the speeches we have just heard, seeing that Members opposite have been sitting there behind the Government, and have heard all the speeches in the Debate. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President rose directly after the Mover of the Amendment, and stated, with the frankness and honesty that have characterised all his speeches, that the clause was a departmental clause, and was inserted for purposes of departmental administration. Hon. Members opposite sat silent, and were perfectly willing to accept that explanation so long as no words were put in which brought the meaning home to them, and yet the words now suggested are, as far as I remember, almost identical with those used by my right hon. Friend. They have been accepted by the Leader of the House. We are asked to postpone them till Report. If we do, we shall not know what they are, and that is just what we want to know. If the Amendment be put in now it can be considered on Report.

(11.25.) CAPTAIN BETHELL: I am astounded that the right hon. Gentleman has not paid more attention to the speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty. The noble Lord and one of his right hon. Colleagues both said not only that the clause was intended to provide for shifting populations, but that it was intended for general purposes. I am shocked that the right hon. Gentleman, who is not an ordinary Member of Parliament, but a Privy Councillor, should have paid so little attention to the words of wisdom that fell from the Government.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment agreed to, in page 2, line 24, after "district," insert "or any part of the district."—(Mr. F. S. Powell.)

(11.27.) MR. PICKERSGILL: I propose to amend the proviso by making it read:—"Provided that the fee for any such child shall not exceed 6d. a week." I think the majority of the Committee will consider it not unreasonable to require that in a public elementary school no child shall be charged more than 6d. a week. If you have an average basis, the effect is that, as long as the average does not exceed 1s., as much as 2s. or 3s. a week may be charged in particular cases. The characteristic vice of such a restriction is, that it enables the managers of schools to differentiate in the fees charged against particular children or classes of children. I will give as an illustration a case which actually occurred some little time ago. In a certain Union the Guardians desired to send the lads in the workhouse to attend an elementary school outside—a policy which I regard as a wise and humane policy, and which Guardians are more and more adopting in various parts of the country. I believe it was the only elementary school in the place, but the managers said if the workhouse children were sent there they would charge a fee of 1s. a week.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 25, leave out all after "provided that," to end of sub-section, and insert "the fee for any such child shall not exceed sixpence a week."—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*(11.30.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I hope the hon. Member will not press the Amendment. It is more convenient that we should adhere to the average fee as our guide, than insert a rigid maximum.

*MR. SUMMERS: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will re-consider that decision. In some schools a fee of more than 9d. is exacted, and the exaction of such a fee may be used to prevent children, who have a statutory right to do so, from attending school.

SIR W. HART DYKE: It is not a matter of very great importance. Hon. Members refrained from dividing the Committee just now, and therefore I think they deserve some recompense. I will therefore agree to the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The next Amendment is in my name. It deals with an entirely Departmental question, and ensures that Parliament should be kept informed of what the Department is doing.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 27, after "child," to insert "the Education Department shall report annually to Parliament all cases in which they have sanctioned the imposition or augmentation of fees under this section, with a statement of the amount of fee permitted, and a report in the character of the buildings, staff, curriculum, and quality of the instruction in each case."—(Mr. Sydney Buxton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I have no objection to that.

Question put, and agreed to.

(11.35.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham: I have to move the omission of Sub-section 2, which empowers the Education Department to approve a charge or increase of fees in any particular school, on the express condition that the amount received, or a specified portion thereof, should be taken in reduction of the fee grant otherwise payable.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 28, to leave out Sub-section (2).—(Sir R. Temple.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (2) stand part of the Clause."

SIR W. HART DYKE: This sub-section is intended to give some elasticity to the Bill, and freedom to the Education Department with regard to the reduction of fees, and I think it necessary to meet some emergencies which may arise. It may be necessary, for instance, to re-open a free school as a fee school. The Department will only interfere when appealed to by the locality.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 28, after "may," to insert "if they think fit."—(Mr. F. S. Powell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: I think my right hon. Friend will see that some such words as these are really required. It has been already indicated in the first sub-section that the Education Department may, or may not, withhold their approval of proceedings under the clause, and Sub-section 2 is intended evidently to give the Department power to impose an express condition. I desire to make it clear that it shall not be absolutely necessary for the Department to impose any express condition, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to accept the words of which I have given notice, "if they think fit make it an express condition of such approval."

SIR W. HART DYKE: I am willing to accept the Amendment of the noble Lord.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, lines 28 and 29, to leave out "give such approval on the express condition," and insert "if they think fit make it an express condition of such approval."—(Viscount Cranborne.)

Agreed to.

Sir R. Temple

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I will explain very shortly why I move the next Amendment. By the first sub-section of this clause the House empowers the Education Department to authorise the imposition of a 6d. fee under certain circumstances, and I propose now to make it an express condition that technical instruction shall be given. I think classes ought to be formed for imparting such education to children.

THE CHAIRMAN: It does not appear to me that this is within the scope of the original Resolution on which the Bill was brought in.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: My Amendment is intended to refer to specific subjects which are mentioned in the Elementary Education Code. I am willing to alter my Amendment, by substituting "specific subjects" for "technical education."

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 31, to leave out "taken in," to end of sub-section, and insert "applied in such schools for the teaching of such specific subjects as are within the meaning of 'The Technical Instruction Act, 1889,' and the teaching of such specific subjects as shall from time to time be prescribed by the Code of Regulations issued by the Education Department, and that such increased fee shall only be charged for and in respect of the children actually in receipt of such technical education or being taught such specific subjects."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'taken in' stand part of the Clause."

SIR W. HART DYKE: Being myself a strong supporter of technical instruction I cannot object to the Amendment, but I think it will restrict the school curriculum unnecessarily, and therefore would ask the hon. Member not to press it.

(11.45.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: May I point out that the matter will be entirely in the hands of the Education Department to determine what the subjects shall be.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: It seems to me that if the Amendment is accepted the unfortunate boys who go to the school to which it is applied will be able to learn nothing but specific subjects, and nothing outside those subjects.

MR. MUNDELLA: I think it would be a very dangerous thing to put a curriculum into an Act of Parliament.

MR. T. ELLIS: I understand the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is anxious to have a certain class of schools where higher education is given. This Amendment would secure that. I hope the Government will allow progress to be reported, and before the House meets again reconsider their decision.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Member wants to make of a school under these exceptional circumstances something in the nature of a technical school. It may be that the position of the school is such that it is not suited for a technical instruction school, and that it would be far more suitable that it should be devoted to ordinary education.

MR. A. DYKE ACLAND: I do not think it would be advisable to lay down a hard and fast rule, because in the case of a shifting population it might be necessary to alter the character of a school. I would suggest to my hon. Friend to withdraw the Amendment.

(11.50.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I will accept the advice of my hon. Friend.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR R. TEMPLE: I beg to move the omission of Sub-section 3, and to report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. and gallant Member must choose one of the two Motions. He cannot make both at once.

SIR R. TEMPLE: Then I move to report Progress.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have to give notice that I will to-morrow, in accordance with what I understand to be the general wish of the House, move to suspend the 12 o'clock Rule in order that the consideration of the Bill in Committee may be concluded.

MR. MUNDELLA: Although I do not like to oppose the right hon. Gentleman, and although we desire very much to get the Committee stage completed to-morrow, I cannot assent to this Motion.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not wish to ask the House to sit to a late period, but it would be better to sit for half an hour longer than postpone the Bill until another day.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Can the Motion of which the right hon. Gentleman has given notice be debated?

*MR. SPEAKER: No.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Then I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman not to press the Motion, considering the rapid progress we have made.

MR. BARTLEY: When will the Report stage be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the Committee stage is finished to-morrow the Report will be taken on Tuesday.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): If the right hon. Gentleman makes the Motion I shall propose to extend it to the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Bill.

WESTERN HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS (SCOTLAND) WORKS BILL.—(No. 396.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.0.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Lord Advocate.)

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I do not object to the Bill being read a second time, but I think it should be extended, and the powers it confers should be given to the whole County Councils of the North. I think there will be one or two Amendments required to carry out the pledge given to the hon. Member for Ross-shire that the expenditure of the £15,000 is to be determined by the County Council of Ross-shire. I trust the Secretary for Scotland will take his cue from the County Council of Ross-shire. I think the £2,000 limit is too low. Every one of the grants will be below that sum.

DR. McDONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I hope the Government will make some promise that they will redeem the pledge with reference to the £15,000 being spent with the consent of the County Council of Ross-shire.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): As regards the point that the Bill ought to have a more extended application, I may say it does not profess to enlarge generally the powers of County Councils, but is merely founded on the grant which has been given for the much more limited purpose of carrying out certain works in certain counties. It would be stepping into a totally different region of legislation if we dealt with other counties than those dealt with under the grant. As regards the second point, namely, what was said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the roads in the Islands of Lewis—the Government adhere entirely to what my right hon. Friend said. It is not necessary, and it would not be appropriate, to insert in the Bill that the grant will be administered in accordance generally with the views of the County Councils as to the requirements of roads, but as a matter of administration they will see that that policy is adhered to. I am happy to say, from what we learn, that the engineer, who is now in the district, is harmonising the views of the Local Bodies with those which are entertained in the Scottish Office. As to the third point, the £2,000 limit, I should rather doubt whether the hon. Member for Caithness is quite accurate in saying that all the grants will be above £2,000. It is expected that there will be a considerable number of comparatively minor works, which will not require anything more than £2,000. The hon. Gentleman should have observed there is a certain elasticity in the provisions of the Bill, because in especial cases the Secretary for Scotland may extend the operation of the Act beyond the pecuniary limit which has been prescribed. I have no doubt the House will be anxious to proceed with the Bill. It is entirely executive, and I am certain we shall have the co-operation of gentlemen in all parts of the House in getting the Bill through as rapidly as possible.

(12.7.) Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

EVIDENCE BILL [LORDS].—(No. 335.)
SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.7.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill. I do not believe there is any contentious matter in it; therefore, I trust hon. Members will allow it to be read a second time.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I believe the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) has a strong objection to the Bill.

SIR R. WEBSTER: This is not the measure the hon. Member is thinking of. The object of this measure is simply to consolidate the law of evidence.

MR. SEXTON: To make no change in the law?

SIR R. WEBSTER: None whatever.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

REDEMPTION OF RENT (IRELAND)
BILL.—(No. 377.)
SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.11.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I would repeat the question addressed to the Government on a previous occasion by the hon. Member for South Tyrone as to what steps the Government propose to take to proceed with this Bill. I understand it is not opposed except by one hon. Member.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): As I have stated before, the object of the Bill is of a very restricted character, and therefore it will not come within the category of controversial measures referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury to-day. That being so, I will consult with my right hon. Friend as to what steps should be taken to enable us to deal with the Bill. I understand that hon. Members are not unfavourable to the passing of the Bill.

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow.

TURBARY (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 378.)
COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(12.14.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): In line 11 the words "may purchase the same" occur, and are merely a repetition of words in line 7. I think it would be as well to leave them out, so as to make the words in the first part of the clause of general application.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, to leave out the words "may purchase the same."—(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. SEXTON: Sub-section 3 provides that the Land Commissioners, before purchasing any bog, shall be reasonably satisfied that they will ultimately realise by means of the bog an amount sufficient to repay the purchase money with interest at the rate of 3 and one-eighth per cent. per annum. I would suggest that the interest should be 3 per cent.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 24, to leave out "and one-eighth."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and one-eighth' stand part of the Clause."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): As this is a matter of finance, about which it is difficult to give a decision off-hand, I would appeal to the hon. Member to defer the Amendment to the Report stage.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Thursday next.

LOCAL REGISTRATION OF TITLE
(IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 189.)

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I hope that when charges of obstruction are levelled at hon. Members on this side of the House the Government will remember the rapid progress we have allowed them to make with this measure, which has practically been taken without discussion through all its stages. ["Order!"]

RANGES BILL.—(No. 399.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(12.21.) THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I desire merely to say that it is introduced to give effect to a recommendation of a Committee moved for by a hon. and gallant Gentleman behind me, and on which all sides of the House were represented. A difficulty has been found in obtaining ranges for Volunteers, and the object of the Bill is to enable Volunteers to obtain by means of the Provisional Order system land for ranges, and to obtain funds for the purpose from the Public Works Loans Commissioners. The repayment will be spread over a term of years. Where more than one Volunteer corps is concerned power is given to the Local Authority to obtain money for this purpose. There are other powers to simplify the acquisition of land. The Bill is strictly within the recommendations of the Committee which took evidence on all the points involved. I think, therefore, that all sections of the House will unite in giving additional facilities to Volunteers for the acquisition of ranges, which at the present moment are difficult to obtain.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I quite agree with this Bill. I think it is a very moderate Bill, but I reserve to myself the right of proposing some alteration in the clauses in Committee.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT
(1889) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 359.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

M

(12.27.) MR. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): As we have had no statement of any sort or kind as to the object of this Bill, I should like to know what its object is.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) was understood to explain that the object of the Bill was to remove the exceptional position of the public health rates, and to assimilate them to the other County Council rates.

MR. A. ELLIOT: I do not think the explanation of the hon. Gentleman satisfactory. I think we should have a fuller explanation of the meaning of the clauses.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): At the present moment it is almost impossible for the county clerk of Lanarkshire to present the accounts in an intelligible form. As to the classification of rates, they stand thus. The Poor Law Act for Scotland was passed in 1845. It was then enacted that parishes should establish for themselves a different or classified kind of rating, according to the nature of the industry, so that farmers should be rated at a lower rate than proprietors, or than other occupiers of land or heritages in Scotland. That power was quite optional, and there was no necessity for its being used. Each parish might have a different form of classification. That experiment of classification has never been repeated in Scotland in any other county rate, and when the Public Health Act was passed in 1867, it was a mere accident that the principle of classification was extended to that Act, and that accident arose in this way, that the administration of the Public Health Act was handed over to the Parochial Boards, corresponding to the Boards of Guardians in England — [Cries of "Agreed!"]

COLONEL NOLAN: I object if the hon. Member is going to make a speech. I am willing to let the Bill pass, but I am not going to sit up to hear a speech.

It being Midnight, and Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

HIGHWAYS AND BRIDGES BILL

(No. 384.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(12.35.) SIR J. DORINGTON (Gloucester, Tewkesbury): I have been in communication with the hon. Member for Scarborough, the Corporation of which borough will not be, as it thought, affected by this Bill, and the hon. Member's objections have been met.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I object to that part of the Bill which allow the County Councils to make contracts for material with any of its members. That is a system which justly causes jealousy among outside contractors, and I suggest that there should be an absolute limit of £50 imposed.

SIR J. DORINGTON: It is proposed to place such contracts within very narrow limits.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): I shall not oppose the Second Reading, but it will be necessary to postpone the Committee stage for a few days to admit of Amendments being prepared.

Question put, and agreed to.

INFLAMMABLE CARGOES IN PASSENGER SHIPS.

*EARL DE LA WARR, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether some regulation might not be enforced to prevent inflammable substances being carried as cargo in passenger ships, and to move a Resolution, said: My Lords, I rise to move for a Report of the Board of Trade relative to the recent outbreak of fire in the cargo of the City of Richmond liner while crossing the Atlantic. Until the Report which I have asked for is before your Lordships I cannot enter minutely into any particulars relative to the recent accident to this great steamship from the fire which occurred on board on her last voyage. We do not, of course, know for certain the exact cause of that accident, whether it was owing to carelessness or whether it was from spontaneous combustion in the cargo. It is, I believe, a well known fact that under certain circumstances in bales of cotton (which formed the chief cargo of this vessel), closed up in a ship's hold, and which has been in contact, either before being put on board the ship or after it is shipped, with any drying oil such as painters use, chemically speaking, oxygen is produced, which subsequently goes on to produce combustion. It is impossible until the Report is given to your Lordships to say much on this point, but I think we may take it as almost certain that this was the cause of combustion in the present instance. Other substances of a greasy nature will also, I am informed, produce chemically the same effect. It is not at all, as your Lordships are aware, an uncommon thing to happen for the contact of two substances to produce combustion. For me to enlarge on this now is unnecessary, but there is a question arising out of it of the greatest importance, which is referred to in the latter part of what I have proposed for your Lordships' consideration—whether regulations could not be enforced to prevent, or at least to control and specify, the conditions under which such inflammable and dangerous cargoes may be shipped on passenger vessels. It is the practice, as your Lordships are aware, to put large cargoes of cotton on board those ships, especially vessels trading between England and America, a large number of the best of the Atlantic carrying-ships, being at the same time for passengers. The large liners are fitted, as your Lordships know, in the best manner for the conveyance of passengers with every convenience, and also with every provision for safety. They are well manned and well commanded; but unknown probably to most of the passengers who travel by them there is this quantity of material taken on board, which, under certain circumstances, is very likely to ignite. Such was the case with the City of Richmond. After having left the coast of America, and proceeded some three or four days on her voyage, at midnight, in the middle of the Atlantic, the alarm of "Fire!" was heard. It was blowing at the time a heavy gale, and there was a heavy sea running. The greatest consternation naturally prevailed; and though the fire could not be extinguished, it was happily kept under until some vessels were sighted, which came to her assistance, and helped to conduct her safely to Queenstown. Now, on board that ship there were nearly 300 passengers, and a crew, I think, of 146, making a total of about 450 persons, who for some time were in the greatest possible danger; but providentially, by the arrival of those ships, with the help which they rendered, the vessel was brought safely to Queenstown without any loss of life. It is a case which I have thought it right to bring before Her Majesty's Government and the Board of Trade for their consideration, to see whether anything can be done under the circumstances I have mentioned to prevent these large ships, which are carrying 300 or 400 passengers, being exposed to such a danger, probably the greater part without their knowing it; whether it would not be proper that the Board of Trade should have the power of regulating, if not, as would, I think, be preferable, of preventing passenger ships carrying large cargoes of an inflammable nature such as, under certain circumstances, cotton is. I would move, therefore, for the Report of the inquiry which has probably been made by the Board of Trade into this accident, and, at the same time, I would ask Her Majesty's Government to consider whether such regulations as I have suggested could not be enforced, or, if not, the carrying of inflammable cargoes by passenger ships prevented altogether without the consent or under conditions imposed by the Board of Trade.

Moved, "For Report of the Board of Trade relative to the recent accident on board the Inman liner 'City of Richmond.'"—(The Earl De La Warr.)

THE EARL OF RAVENSWORTH: Before the noble Lord rises to reply perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words on this matter. It is quite natural that a Peer who takes such an interest in all that concerns the safety of Her Majesty's subjects as does the noble Earl should be moved by the occurrence of so great and mysterious an accident as that which happened on board the City of Richmond, and I have no doubt the production of the Board of Trade's Report, for which the noble Lord moves, will be a document of very great interest to himself and to others. In the absence of that Report, I should be indisposed to make any observations upon a matter with the details of which I am not yet acquainted; but I should like, in reference to the second part of the question of the noble Lord, to be allowed to make two or three observations—they will be very short. Your Lordships are probably well aware of the circumstances under which the Atlantic navigation is conducted. It is one of the wonders of the world, and the noble Earl himself has done justice to those who conduct that navigation. It is carried on under the strain of very close competition, and under circumstances which entail enormous cost; and I would venture to tell the noble Lord that, unless cargoes were carried in passenger ships, it would be impracticable and perhaps impossible to carry on that navigation at all. The strain of competition is excessive with regard to the accommodation given on board these vessels, which is so well known to many noble Lords that I need hardly remind them of it; it may generally be said that it is more luxurious and costly than can be found in many private houses. The rate of speed maintained by them is another of the commercial triumphs of the present day, and that also is achieved at an enormous cost; and I repeat that unless these magnificent liners were enabled to carry cargo they must travel at a greatly reduced rate of speed. Then comes the question which the noble Lord raises: he wants some regulation to be enforced to prevent inflammable substances being carried on board these passenger ships. But I would ask the noble Lord what are inflammable substances? Probably one of the most inflammable cargoes, as far as I know, is coal, and as we know from bitter experience on many occasions explosions have occurred from spontaneous combustion on board coal-laden ships; but I have never heard it suggested that regulations should be framed to prevent ships—passenger or otherwise—carrying coals. A Committee of the other House of Parliament sat for a long time inquiring into this question of the spontaneous combustion of coal cargoes on board ship. I do not remember the substance of their Report, but I imagine the noble Lord, who will speak on behalf of the Board of Trade, will be able to tell us something with regard to coal-laden vessels. All steamers must, of course, carry some considerable quantity in the shape of their complement of coal. But there are many other substances besides coal which are of an inflammable nature, and the noble Lord has alluded to cotton. I would remind him that cotton is one of the greatest staples of the Atlantic trade. It is largely carried on board these Atlantic steamers. I would remind him of another very important freight, namely, mineral oil. I do not know that many of your Lordships are well enough acquainted with the trade to know whether the carrying of mineral oil on board of passenger steamers is permissible by law; but what I would remind your Lordships of is this: that anybody going down the Thames below London will see acres of ground in places closely packed with barrels, all containing petroleum, and those spaces of ground on either side of the river are surrounded by timber yards and dwellings, and are in the midst of a dense population. It is impossible to say what extent of calamity might occur in the event of a serious fire happening in those neighbourhoods. I only say that if precautions are necessary to be taken—and they are very necessary to be taken—on board our ships they are equally required in the places I have mentioned. Almost all cargoes are more or less inflammable, and when it is urged that additional regulations and restrictions are necessary to be imposed on the owners of these liners, I hope, and believe, that the Board of Trade will be extremely cautious in giving any pledge on the subject in the answer which may be given. Noble Lords must remember that if unnecessary or too stringent regulations are imposed on men who are thoroughly competent to conduct their business the business must suffer. The noble Earl has himself paid a thoroughly well-deserved compliment to the splendid manner in which these liners are served and worked; they are managed by large private owners who understand their business, and every possible precaution is taken at considerable cost to ensure safety, although every precaution is not supposed to be taken at present by the owners and by those responsible for the management of those great lines. I only hope this occurrence may not be made a handle for imposing what I may call over-stringent regulations upon the shipment of cargoes, because such a course would inevitably defeat itself in face of the close and severe competition which exists between our great ocean lines of steamships and those of the Continent. The effect would be rather to increase than diminish the chances of accidents at sea, inasmuch as such restrictions do not exist with regard to foreign vessels, and the result of imposition of restrictions might be to make competition with them impossible on this side of the water, and to throw the trade very largely into the hands of those who are not subject to the same restrictions. I venture to make these few observations in justice to those concerned in our Atlantic navigation, and for the purpose of pointing out that the imposition of restrictions upon that trade would be simply to prevent these magnificent steamers running as they do.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): My Lords, I should like to say at once that I think it is impossible to over-estimate the importance of the question which the noble Earl has brought before the House, and which has been spoken to by the noble Lord (the Earl of Ravensworth). Unfortunately, this subject is not a new one. There have been many fires in cargoes of cotton carried across the Atlantic, and there have been very many inquiries made by officers of the Board of Trade on the subject. In any case which seems to present any especial or new circumstances, or anything which cannot otherwise be explained, it has been the custom of the Board of Trade to hold an inquiry; but in this particular case no special inquiry has been held, and I will tell the House for what reason. These inquiries are held sometimes weeks afterwards, and when the facts have to be brought out sometimes secondhand, and consequently without any opportunity of actual observation on the part of the officers who hold the inquiry. In the case of the City of Richmond the Board of Trade got notice from Queenstown that a casualty had happened on board under the circumstances which the noble Earl has described. The Board of Trade telegraphed to Mr. Laslett, their Surveyor at Liverpool, desiring him to wait for the arrival of the ship, and attend during the whole time the cargo was being discharged, so that he might observe personally as much as could be seen, and therefore he had not to wait until any actual evidence which could be got in that way had passed from the possibility of being procured. There is no doubt serious risk of such casualties as this in cotton cargoes, and various theories have been put forward to account for the circumstances. The noble Earl who introduced the question seems to give some credence to the idea of spontaneous combustion, but I think, as the result of inquiries previously made, not only by the Board of Trade, but by the underwriters, by Lloyd's, and by the shipping community themselves in this and foreign countries, that idea is, if not discredited, at any rate much less generally held now than was the case a few years ago. I have endeavoured to put together some information from documents in possession of the Board of Trade which will convey to the House something of the knowledge we already possess. I should be sorry to trespass at any length on the time of the House in answering the question, but I think the extreme importance of the subject is generally acknowledged, and I will endeavour to put the matter as briefly as I can before your Lordships. In the last 10 years there have been 171 fires on cotton-laden ships crossing the Atlantic from America. Of these 81 occurred in the port of loading, 45 in the port of discharge, and 45 during the voyage. I call your Lordships' attention to the fact that out of the total number 81 have occurred in the port of loading. If spontaneous combustion were usually the cause, it is obvious that it would occur after the cotton had a little time to heat, and not so much in the early days after loading. Therefore, primâ facie, at any rate, that experience goes a good deal against the theory. I have looked through the tonnage of the cotton loaded at the different ports in America, and compared that tonnage with the number of fires which have occurred in ships coming from each of the ports, and I find that the number of fires is not very disproportionate to the number of ships leaving each port. I therefore think I am entitled to conclude that the fires do not occur, so far as America is concerned, from any local causes or causes which are prevalent in one port more than another, but from causes which are very general over the American Continent. Now, America is only one source of the cotton supply to this country, though undoubtedly it is the largest. We also get cotton from Brazil, Egypt, and India, very small quantities from Brazil and Egypt, but considerable quantities from India, the average from India reaching nearly 6,000,000 cwt. a year. Therefore, I will take the shipments from India for comparison with those of America. During the nine years up to 1887 only four fires have occurred in regard to Indian cotton, and since then there has not been a single fire in any cotton cargo from India. From that I am inclined to infer that the danger is not necessarily inherent in the cotton, but is probably due to some different circumstances of treatment or of packing. It is an absolutely admitted fact by almost every Court of Inquiry held under the Board of Trade, by the Committee of Lloyd's, and by Committees which have sat in America that the packing of cotton there, and its transit from the cotton-growing districts to the port, are not nearly so satisfactory in America as in the other places, especially India, which I have mentioned. Although, as I have said, there is no Report in the sense that the noble Earl has indicated, the Board of Trade Surveyor at Liverpool (Mr. Laslett), has made two Reports; and if it will meet the noble Lord's view I shall be glad to lay them on the Table. They deal exhaustively with all that can be said about the City of Richmond, which is the subject of the noble Lord's question. Among the causes of fire in cotton which have from time to time been suggested are matches left carelessly about while the cotton has been loaded, as has sometimes been proved to be the case at American ports. Indeed, the amount of carelessness shown is almost incredible. Another common cause is that a spark gets into the cotton through a ventilator or some aperture or otherwise after it has been stowed. I call your Lordships' attention to the importance of good packing. Tightly packed and well covered bales of cotton are less likely to catch fire than when they are loosely put together in a haphazard way, and it is one of the difficulties encountered in our inquiries that if a spark falls upon cotton it is often proved to have run along the edges of the bales until it has come upon some half-packed or improperly packed bale, where it settled. That is one cause which will account for some of the fires occurring in cotton cargoes coming from the country where shippers are perhaps least careful in the matter. There is no doubt whatever that but for the modern appliances with which the City of Richmond was fitted this casualty would have been much more serious. It was owing to the efficient machinery in the vessel for forcing steam upon the burning cotton that the fire was kept under as much as it was. I concur with the noble Earl who spoke last as to the competency of the shipowners to conduct their trade. I give them due credit for the efficiency of their appliances, but, at the same time, I must point that in the case of the City of Richmond this cargo of inflammable material was packed directly under the passenger accommodation, and that seems to me to be by no means a comforting fact. With regard to the second part of his question, I have to point out that there are no powers in the Board of Trade to make any regulations to prevent inflammable substances from being carried as cargo on passenger ships. Everything has been done to diffuse information on the subject, to show the necessity of careful packing, of stopping up every possible inlet by which sparks can get to the cargo, and of stopping the supply of air from the outside in case of fire breaking out in the cotton, which assists strong and rapid combustion. I would be very unwilling to propose any unnecessary restrictions on the trade with America in regard to the carriage of cotton cargoes, especially when that trade is so highly subject to competition; and in the first instance I should, I must confess, like to see the authorities principally concerned take further precautions at their own instance. If they would do so, and bring pressure to bear upon those engaged in the trade on the other side of the Atlantic, much good might be done, and possibly some further pressure might be put upon insurance agents to induce them to put pressure upon the companies to assist by raising premiums or in some other way. I am not authorised to say that the Board of Trade will attempt to legislate in this matter; but unless something can be done on the initiative of those chiefly concerned, I confess I think a strong case may possibly hereafter be made out for so doing. I do not think I need say anything more on the present occasion, but repeat that if the noble Lord will, with the permission of the House, withdraw his Motion, and propose that the Report of Mr. Laslett to the Board of Trade on the matter be presented, I shall be glad to lay the Report on the Table.

*EARL DE LA WARR: As I understand the noble Lord now to say that there is a Report extant on this occurrence, I shall be happy to adopt that course; but I thought the noble Lord said, in the first instance, that no formal Report had been made with regard to the City of Richmond.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: There is no special Report, because no inquiry has been held; but I can assure the noble Earl that all the information that could be obtained regarding the City of Richmond is contained in this Report which I offer to lay on the Table.

*EARL STANHOPE: My noble Friend says that a strong case may possibly be made out hereafter for legislation in this matter; but surely no stronger case could have arisen than that this great passenger ship, carrying so many lives, should be laden with a cargo of cotton. I hope the Board of Trade will direct their attention to preventing passenger ships carrying such inflammable cargoes as cotton and mineral oils. It is all very well to say that injustice will be done to the owners of these great liners which cross the Atlantic, and other oceans, by hampering them with restrictions in their competition with foreign vessels; but I do hope, speaking on behalf of the public, and as an occasional traveller in these vessels myself, that the Board of Trade will consider the matter with a view to legislation.

*EARL DE LA WARR: Do I understand the noble Lord (Lord Balfour of Burleigh) to say that no cases of combustion in cotton cargoes on board passenger ships have been traced to substances which might have been brought against the cotton either while on board or before it had been brought on board the vessel?

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: I did not assert the negative; I cannot say that no such cases have occurred, because the real origin of many of the fires which have undoubtedly been traced to cotton cargoes is obscure. They may have arisen from spontaneous combustion, which, however, as I have said, seems to be now rather a discredited theory in these cases, or, as some think, they may have been caused by electricity being generated from the iron bands encircling the cotton. Certainly I cannot assert the negative. All I can say is, that I think the information we possess from various sources in the inquiries which have been held points rather to the source I have indicated; that is, carelessness in packing rather than to the theory of spontaneous combustion; but I will not go so far, certainly, as to say that no such case has ever occurred.

EARL DE LA WARR: I beg to move that the Returns which have been offered by the noble Lord be laid on the Table of the House.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

CHELSEA HOSPITAL AND PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON, in rising to ask the Paymaster General whether he can give any assurance that the Gardens of Chelsea Hospital shall, at the close of the present Naval Exhibition, revert to their former use as pleasure grounds freely open to the public; and that no part of the land scheduled in the Act 7, George IV., chapter 16, shall be diverted from this purpose, said: My Lords, I am anxious to learn from the noble Lord the Paymaster General what are the intentions of the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital with respect to the Gardens attached to that Institution? As your Lordships are well aware, a large portion of those gardens have for the last two years been used for the purpose of Exhibitions—in the first instance, for the Military Exhibition, which was held there last year, and now for the Naval Exhibition going on at the present time. These Gardens have for a long period, longer than I can trace back, been freely open to the public as a place of recreation. Persons of all classes and ages have used them continually with evident enjoyment. Now, those two Exhibitions have greatly encroached on the space at the disposal of the public for purposes of recreation. I think I may say it is an established principle in these days that every effort ought to be made to preserve our open spaces to the utmost extent. My noble Friend, Lord Meath, as we all know, has done a great deal by the Society of which he is at the head, not only to preserve open spaces but to increase their number; and the smallest available pieces of ground in London have been taken up with that view. Now, here we have a considerable open space, a large portion of which has been occupied for the last two years for purposes which certainly exclude the public—using the word in its largest sense—from the use of these gardens which they had previously enjoyed. But, besides the general public, there are other persons who have an interest in the free use of these gardens, that is to say, the pensioners themselves. I was somewhat struck at receiving a letter last night from one of the old pensioners in the Hospital, saying that he had seen a statement that I was going to ask a question in Parliament on the subject; that he “begged to say it was the right of the pensioners to enjoy these gardens, and he did not see why they were to be turned out by Exhibitions.” I must say I think that old soldier had a great deal to say, both for himself and his fellow pensioners, from that point of view. But, although I am putting forward, and most sincerely putting forward the public interest in this matter, and claim to have these open spaces preserved for the public, I do not say that is the only ground on which I put the question to the noble Lord to-night. No doubt there are private interests which are very much concerned in this matter, and all those who live in the neighbourhood of these gardens have undoubtedly suffered a considerable amount of inconvenience from their being devoted to this unexpected purpose. I am myself one of those residents, and no doubt, in common with all those who live in that neighbourhood, I have suffered a certain amount of inconvenience; but there are persons residing close to these gardens whose houses indeed abut upon them who have suffered really serious injury from the existence of these Exhibitions. They have even suffered, I know some of them, in health. The noise is continuous; there are rows of cabs and omnibuses drawn up in front of the houses, and producing those odours which are apt to proceed from bodies of this description. The whole character of the neighbourhood has been materially changed, and certainly the residents there have been put to a very large amount of discomfort and inconvenience. If this were done for some great public object of course private interests must give way. I should be the last person to urge private against public interests; but I have endeavoured to show that the real broad public interest lies on the same side in this case as private interests, and it is as much for the benefit of the public as of private persons that such large portions of these gardens should not be occupied by similar exhibitions in future, but that they should be preserved as hitherto for free public use. When the first exhibition was proposed last year, it was felt that a Military Exhibition might not inappropriately be held in the gardens of Chelsea Hospital, although there was a good deal of lamentation about the noise, the trees that were ruined, and permanent damage that was done in that way. However, those concerned did not like to interfere in that case. Then came the Naval Exhibition, but, of course, no Englishman would like to do anything that would seem to interfere with the Navy, and so we held our tongues. But now we are threatened with future exhibitions, and I think the time has come when we may make an appeal to the Chelsea Hospital authorities, through the noble Lord, to preserve these gardens. The purposes of the two great Services of the country have been served by the two Exhibitions, and I think we may now very well ask that they shall not be put to further use of the same kind. There is one further matter. A rumour has been put about that the authorities propose to sell this ground, or part of it, for building purposes, or to let it on building leases. I think that would be a very improper step to take, and I hope the noble Lord will be able to assure us that there is no foundation for the report.

*THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (Lord WINDSOR): My Lords, I can well understand the feelings and motives which have prompted the noble Marquess to put this notice upon the Paper. Certainly I can understand it from anyone who had enjoyed the comparative seclusion and quietude of Chelsea Embankment and Cheyne Walk and that neighbourhood, but the question he has put upon the Paper deals rather with two separate matters: in the first place with regard to the Exhibitions themselves, and in the second place as to the use that is to be made of the land upon which these exhibitions have been held. In reply to the first part of the question I may say that the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital have considered that the Military and Naval Exhibitions stand upon a totally different footing from any other Exhibition, and in putting the gardens of the Hospital at the disposal of the promoters of those Exhibitions, their chief consideration was that they thought they were conferring a real benefit upon those two Services, rather than as regarding the Exhibitions from any other public point of view. I can, therefore, say that the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital have no intention whatever of giving the use of these Gardens to other persons for Exhibitions of a more ordinary character, and that at the close of the present Naval Exhibition the land that has hitherto been open to the public will again be free to them... But the latter part of the noble Marquess's question embraces rather a wide field, upon which I must say a few words. There is a plot of land, about 3½ acres in extent, which is now covered by a part of the Exhibition buildings. When the Gardens were, I think, first thrown open to the public that plot was under a lease which only expired in 1890, last year, just before the Military Exhibition occupied the ground. That piece of land, therefore, has never as yet, so far as I know, been opened to the public; and, furthermore, I may point out, that at the time the Act was passed to which the noble Marquess refers, 7th Geo. IV., cap. 16, this piece of land was described as then under lease, and it was certainly not at that time open to the public. Upon one more point I have to say a few words—as to the form of the question. The noble Marquess asks for a rather wide assurance that no part of the land scheduled in the Act 7, Geo. IV., cap. 16, shall be diverted from this purpose, that is to say, as a pleasure ground, I presume freely open to the public. What I wish to point out is, that the land scheduled in that Act includes every bit of the land held by the Chelsea Hospital Commissioners. It includes the Governor's house and his gardens, and the actual ground on which the buildings stand. I understand, of course, that what the noble Marquess really means is that all the available ground should be open to the public; but I fear that I am not in a position at this moment to give any definite pledge upon this point, because the Commissioners have not yet, as far as I know, come to a decision upon the use that is to be made of this ground—I think it is called Gordon House, the ground of which the lease has just fallen in. Certainly within the last few months during the time that I have been a Commissioner this matter has not been before the Board, but I can assure him that it will be considered immediately, and necessarily so, because some use will have to be made of the land when the Naval Exhibition is over. But I hope the noble Marquess will be satisfied with the assurance that I can give him now—that at the close of the Naval Exhibition all the land that has hitherto—certainly for the last 40 years—been open to the public at certain times will be again open to them, and that the further question as to the land the lease of which has fallen in, will be at once considered by the Commissioners.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: Then I conclude that that means that there is no intention to sell or let for building purposes, the river frontage, for instance, which would interfere with the land hitherto open to the public?

*LORD WINDSOR: I do not think there is any intention at present of doing so, but I shall be happy to give the noble Marquess early information as soon as the Commissioners come to a decision on the subject.

MORTMAIN AND CHARITABLE USES AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.].—(No. 140.)

House in Committee (according to Order).

Verbal Amendment in Title agreed to.

Clauses 1, 2, and 3 agreed to.

Lord Windsor

Clause 4.

LORD HERSCHELL: There is an Amendment in this clause. It is with the view of introducing a new clause having for its object to carry out what I arranged with the noble Viscount opposite, that the obligation to sell or not to purchase should not apply to land actually required for the purposes of a charity, but only to land which is to be held as an investment.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 15, after ("but") insert ("except as hereinafter provided"). — (The Lord Herschell).

Agreed to.

*LORD COLCHESTER: My Lords, the Amendment I have to move in line 17 is intended to challenge the principle with regard to land left by will to charities having necessarily to be sold within one year. On the Second Reading of the Bill the noble and learned Lord, in replying to my remarks, said that I did not appear to understand the object of insisting upon these sales. My noble and learned Friend will, I trust, allow me to remark that having, as I believe, carefully followed him in his remarks in introducing the Bill on that occasion, I do not understand that he has himself been able to find any principle which underlies the legislation dealing with these bequests in recent times. He said himself, I think, that it was very difficult to say what the principle was, and, for my own part, I will venture to say that it is impossible to find in it one single ray of common sense. If you refer back to remote times, I can quite understand that in periods now utterly past there was a reasonable suspicion of vast accumulations of land from death-bed donations obtained by the clergy; but the period of those donations may be described as a dead past, and there is not the slightest reason why that suspicion should have anything to do with the legislation of the present day. The noble and learned Lord said there might be some difficulties raised in the other House if greater powers were given to charitable bodies to hold land. If there are persons who dwell so much on the notions of entirely bye-gone days, I should say, when the Bill goes down to the other House, suggest those restrictions if they think them necessary; but I do ask your Lordships not to sanction for a moment a principle of that kind, and to say that there is any reason for inserting these provisions in the Bill. No doubt there are greater objections to large quantities of land remaining inalienably in the hands of charities, but in the great majority of cases I think it may safely be left to the governing bodies of Charities to decide whether land in their possession should be sold or not. There have been instances where Charities have suffered as cruelly as individuals from depreciation in the value of landed property, and, therefore, where that is likely to occur it would be very undesirable that they should retain it; but there are other cases where land rises very greatly in value, and where its retention may very largely increase the resources of the Charity. What I ask, then, is that the Charity Commissioners, a body who have knowledge and experience in these matters, should be allowed to say whether or not these sales should be carried out. It has been suggested that the Chief Commissioners are a body who have incurred some unpopularity. They have had to perform the task of restraining extravagance and mismanagement of every kind which may occur, and that, of course, is not a function which creates popularity, but the contrary, in proportion to the diligence with which it may be discharged. But they are a body who, I think it must be admitted, have exercised well the powers entrusted to them by Parliament in place of those formerly exercised by the Court of Chancery, and they may therefore fairly be trusted with the discretion of saying whether lands given to charity should be sold or not. If the noble and learned Lord's Bill be so amended it will, I agree, be a great boon to charities; but if not, I think its benefits will be very doubtful. As in that case it would not be necessary to part with the land in the lifetime of the testator, much land may be left by will instead of given by deed. I think also when we look at that which is a new but important feature of recent legislation, a passion for uniformity and simplification, the question will be asked, why, if Charities are to be allowed to receive these gifts only on this condition, they should only be permitted to so hold them if given by deed. If these provisions are allowed to remain as they are the Bill will, in my opinion, be productive of more evil than good, and it would be a question whether, in that case its defeat in the other House would be a serious cause of regret. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment moved,

In line 17, after ("testator") to insert ("if such sale be consented to by the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales.")—(The Lord Colchester.)

LORD HERSCHELL: I certainly did not represent this restriction as one which was solely introduced with the view of meeting objections in the other House. I myself share the objections which I think would be taken elsewhere to permitting accumulations of land which by the proposed alteration in this Bill would be rendered possible in the hands of Charities. It must be remembered that you are by this Bill giving a power for the first time for this purpose, and putting aside certain exceptions which have been made by past legislation—that is to say, a general power to devise the land by will to Charities, which has not hitherto existed at all. I do not think it is desirable that when you are giving that power you should enable Charities to hold, it may be, large quantities of land not required for the purposes of the Charity, but merely as investments. Again, I do not think that Charities are likely to be themselves the best managers of property in such circumstances. Notoriously of late years real property has been subject to great fluctuations in value and in the income produced by it; and in addition to that, I think it is against the policy which has certainly prevailed in later years, and the advisability of which is felt by me I must confess very strongly, that you should not so deal with land as that it is not likely to come freely into the market. I do not think it can be disputed that if land is devised by an individual to a Charity to be held from generation to generation it is less likely to come into the market than land held by individuals; and certainly it has been the policy of late to encourage the holding of land by as many persons as possible. I do not think anything could be worse than that you should do anything to encourage the ownership of large quantities of land in Charities and prevent its being distributed among a number of individuals. Those are my reasons for objecting to the noble Lord's Amendment. I do not think it would be for the advantage of the Charities themselves, I believe it would be much better that they should have such land converted into money, and thereby have a, comparatively speaking, fixed income on which they can count, rather than that they should hold investments of this description; and I was glad to find that my view was shared by the noble Marquess at the head of the Government. I think that being so it will not be regarded as a radical or extreme view of this matter that a distinction should be drawn between land held for the purpose of a Charity as distinguished from land held as an investment. For these reasons, I cannot accept the noble Lord's Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I venture to mention to my noble and learned Friend that I have received a large number of communications upon the subject of this 4th clause. I do not propose to either move or support any Amendment at present, I will only say that I think it is questionable whether he has not drawn the line too tight in providing that the sale must be carried out within one year from the death of the testator. Upon the other point I quite sympathise with the argument he has advanced, but I think a great deal may be said about the restriction he imposes being too narrow, that is the limit of one year, involving for its extension an application to the Court of Chancery. The objections which have been urged upon me in that respect by many persons, might, I think, be met by some Amendment in the Standing Committee, and I only mention the matter now in order that my noble and learned Friend may consider it before that time arrives.

LORD HERSCHELL: I certainly intend to propose Amendments which I believe will meet the objections mentioned by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, providing that power to extend the time for sale shall be given not only to the Court, but also to the Charity Commissioners. I think those Amendments will meet my noble and learned Friend's view.

*LORD COLCHESTER: The argument of the noble and learned Lord would, I think, have greater weight if there was any great probability that, as he says, vast quantities of land might accumulate in the hands of Charities in England. I have not the least wish to see Charities become great landowners, and what I suggest is simply that the land should not be sold where the proper authority in these matters thought it injurious to the interests of the Charity to sell it. My noble and learned Friend dwelt upon the fact that land if in the hands of a Charity is less likely to come into the market than if it were in the hands of individuals; but if it be the case that a sale will only be objected to on the ground that it is likely to be injurious to the Charity, I do not see that the result would be to keep great quantities of land in the possession of the Charities; and as power is possessed by Charities to hold land which is given them by deed, I certainly do not see that there is any objection to their holding land bequeathed to them by will. I am compelled to say that I feel so strongly on the matter that if there is a prospect of support from any quarter of the House, I shall certainly divide upon the question.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 4, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5.

*LORD COLCHESTER: I had an Amendment in line 22, after ("thereof") to insert—

"such lands shall be sold under the orders of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, if they consider such sale can be effected without prejudices to the interest of the charity.") and to leave out remainder of clause; but as it is mainly consequential I shall not press it. There is one point, however, in reference to it to which I wish to call attention, and that is that in this matter I think the proper authority to act should be the Charity Commissioners, and not any other. At a later stage I think it would be desirable to alter Clause 4 so as to substitute the Charity Commissioners for the Court of Chancery or the Judge in Chambers. The provision with regard to the Official Charity Trustee appears to me to be entirely new.

LORD HERSCHELL: The noble Lord will see that the Amendment which I propose in the next line really does away with that criticism. The Official Trustee becomes as now a mere bare Trustee, and the Charity Commissioners are to order the Trustees in whom the land is vested to sell. That satisfies the Charity Commissioners, and it is, in fact, at their suggestion that I have done it. The Amendment which I spoke of just now comes next.

Amendment moved,

In line 23 to leave out all the words after ("official") and insert ("Trustee of charity lands and the Charity Commissioners shall thereupon take all necessary steps for the sale or completion of the sale of such lands to be effected with all reasonable speed by the administering Trustees for the time being thereof, and for this purpose the said Commissioners may make any order under their seal directing such Trustees to proceed with the sale or completion of the sale of the said lands or removing such Trustees and appointing others, and may provide by any such order for the payment of the proceeds of sale to the official Trustees of charitable funds in trust for the charity, and for the payment of the costs and expenses incurred by the said administering Trustees in or connected with such sale, and every such order shall be enforceable by the same means and be subject to the same provisions as are applicable under the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, and the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, respectively, to any orders of the said Commissioners made thereunder.")—(The Lord Herschell.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 5, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 amended, and agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL: I propose here a new clause carrying out what I stated when I moved the first Amendment. It enables authority to be given to the Charity to hold any land which it needs for the purposes of the Charity, or to spend any money to be laid out in the purchase of land where it is needed for the same purposes.

Amendment moved after Clause 6, to insert, as a new clause—

"It shall be lawful for the High Court of Justice, or any judge thereof sitting at chambers, or for the Charity Commissioners, if satia-fied that land assured by will to or for the benefit of any charitable use, or proposed to be purchased out of personal estate by will directed to be laid out in the purchase of land, is required for actual occupation for the purposes of the charity and not as an investment by order to sanction the retention or acquisition as the case may be of such land."—(The Lord Herschell.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL: I beg to move a new clause after Clause 7, which is to retain the exemptions in regard to institutions which under the existing Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act are excluded from its operation.

Amendment moved after Clause 7, to insert, as a new clause—

"Nothing in this Act contained shall limit or affect the exemption of the assurances mentioned in the seventh section of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, from the application thereto of Part Two of the said Act."—(The Lord Herschell.)

Amendment agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

UNDERGROUND EMPLOYMENT IN INDIAN COAL MINES.

MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether women and children work underground in coal mines in British India; if there is any legislation dealing with the labour employed in these mines; and if he will obtain and lay upon the Table of the House a Report on the condition of those employed in the mines, with particulars of the legislation, if any, which at present affects them?

*THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): There is no legislation in British India which regulates the labour employed in coal mines, and there is no statutory prohibition against the employment of women and children underground. But I am informed that, as a matter of fact, in the State mines women and children are not employed, while in private mines they are. The hon. Member will see, from Papers which have already been laid before Parliament, that the Secretary of State has called attention to the subject in connection with the working of mines in British India, and I am informed that the Government of India are now in communication with the Secretary of State upon the matter.

ACCIDENT AT THE GARTSHERRIE IRONWORKS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the bursting at Gartsherrie Ironworks, Lanarkshire, on Monday last, of a blast furnace, and the serious injury of a number of workmen; has he any information to show whether it is true, as stated, that the furnace adjoins one "that burst last February, and caused the loss of five lives, besides injuries to six others;" whether any inquiry beyond that instituted by the Procurator Fiscal was instituted into the fatal catastrophe in February, and whether the results of any official inquiry into it were communicated to the public or to the sufferers or their representatives; and whether he will consider the propriety of instituting a public inquiry into the accident of Monday last?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to the accident at Gartsherrie Ironworks, and I have been in communication with the Scotch Office, who inform me that the Secretary for Scotland has directed an inquiry to be instituted by the Inspector of alkali works in Scotland. If the hon. Member desires further information, perhaps he will be good enough to address himself to the Scotch Office.

THE GUNBOAT SWINGER.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is true, as stated in the Daily Telegraph of Tuesday, that the obsolete gunboat Swinger, having been ordered to be sold in Melbourne at a reserve price of £5,000, and having failed to fetch that price, has been ordered home; whether it is true, as stated, that it will take her over six months to make the voyage; and what is the estimated cost, including coal, pay, and expenses, of bringing her home?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The selling price of the Swinger is estimated, with stores, at £5,000. No offer to buy the ship having been made in Australia, she was ordered home. She sailed from Sydney on May 12, and is expected to arrive in England in October next. The pay and victualling of the crew would not form an item of additional expense in bringing home the Swinger, as the men would have to be maintained at the public expense wherever they might happen to be serving; and as the Swinger will make a large part of the passage home under sail the exact consumption of coal cannot be estimated. Against this expense, however, would have to be put the cost of the passages, £1,300, which the Admiralty would have been obliged to pay had the crew been brought home by packet. By the arrangement made a two-fold economy has been accomplished, as the vessel is saleable here and the cost of bringing the crew home has been saved.

THE ALLOTMENTS ACT.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will agree to the Return relating to Provisional Orders under "The Allotments Act, 1887," which stands on the Notice Paper this day?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am glad to be able to state that there have only been two cases in which it has been deemed necessary to make Provisional Orders for the compulsory taking of land for the purpose named in the question. As I have on several occasions stated, it has always been my desire that the land required for allotments should be obtained by voluntary arrangement rather than by compulsory purchase. I shall be glad to give the hon. Member any information that the Local Government Board may have as to the Orders referred to, and this will probably answer the purpose he has in view.

THE CASE OF MARY MILLARD.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make inquiries as to the case of Mary Millard, aged 20, who, on 26th June, was charged by the police before the Aldershot Bench with being a disorderly prostitute; whether the report is correct that Police Constable Bradbury swore positively that she was a well-known prostitute, and Police Sergeant Cottle stated that there was no doubt whatever that she was a prostitute; that, at the suggestion of the Chairman, the case was adjourned in order that Miss Millard might be examined by a doctor, and afterwards, on the resumption of the case, Dr. Gibson swore that he had examined her, and that the charge that she was a prostitute could not possibly be true, the Chairman stating that the case fell through, and that the police should be very careful how they run people in on such a charge; and whether he will bring the facts before the Public Prosecutor, so that Police Constable Bradbury may be indicted for perjury?

MR. JEFFREY'S (Hants, Basingstoke): May I ask whether the Magistrates did not give the young woman every assistance in proving her innocence; and whether, considering the sworn evidence, the Magistrates could have done otherwise than have heard the case and dismissed it immediately after hearing the medical evidence?

The following questions also appeared upon the Paper:—

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of Mary Millard, who on Friday, the 26th instant, was falsely charged by the police at Aldershot with being a disorderly prostitute; and whether he will institute an inquiry as to the conduct of the police?

MR. W. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the case of Miss Mary Millard, the Magistrates are correctly reported to have suggested to her mother that she should have her daughter medically examined; and whether he will inform the Magistrates that proof of virginity is not needed in order to rebut the charge which was brought against the girl?

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): To ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been directed to a case before the Aldershot Magistrates last Friday, when two policemen swore that a certain girl was a well-known prostitute, which evidence was proved to be entirely untrue; and whether he will call the attention of the Public Prosecutor to the matter, with a view to the prosecution of the constables for perjury?

MR. W. M'LAREN: To ask Mr. Attorney General whether Miss Mary Millard, who was charged by two policemen at Aldershot with being a disorderly prostitute, when it was subsequently proved that she was entirely innocent, has any remedy against the police; and, if so, what it is?

MR. H. J. WILSON: To ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been directed to the case of Mary Millard, who was arrested at Aldershot on Monday, 15th June, on a charge of being drunk, and taken before a Magistrate on Tuesday the 16th June; is he aware that she was kept in the police cells from the 15th till the 18th, and was brought before the Magistrates in Petty Sessions on 18th of June on the altered charge of being a disorderly prostitute, when a sergeant and a constable swore that she was a well-known prostitute, but the evidence of Dr. Gibson showed that the police evidence was untrue; is the Chairman correctly reported in dismissing the case because the evidence was untrue, nevertheless to have admonished the girl on the assumption that it was true; will he draw the attention of the Public Prosecutor to the sworn evidence of the police; and will he draw the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the language of the Chairman of the Bench?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Magistrates have acted with perfect propriety as far as I can judge. I have by the courtesy of the Magistrates and the Chief Constable of Hants been supplied with Reports in the case of Mary Millard, against whom a charge was brought by the Hampshire Police. These police are not under my jurisdiction. Upon a full consideration of the case, I think that an inquiry on oath will be far the most satisfactory method of establishing the truth. I have, therefore, requested the Director of Public Prosecutions to place himself in communication with a firm of solicitors who, I am given to understand, have undertaken to act for Mary Millard, and to inform them that if they will conduct proceedings against the police for perjury the Government will pay such expenses as may be properly incurred. It will be far more satisfactory that solicitors acting on behalf of the girl should have the conduct of these proceedings. My information is that the girl asked the Magistrates to allow her to be examined. They assented, and at the same time guaranteed and subsequently paid the doctor's fees, so that there might be no impediment placed in the girl's way. My information is that the charge was not altered, but that she was in the first instance charged with being a disorderly prostitute. The charge was made on the 15th and heard on the 18th, and she was in custody in the interval. It is not the fact that the Magistrates admonished the girl on the assumption that the charge against her of being a prostitute was true. On the contrary, the Chairman informed the girl that she had entirely proved to the Magistrates that she was not a prostitute, but at the same time told her to remember that she must not be disorderly in the streets.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): May I ask whether the Home Office will make the girl any compensation for having been detained in custody for two or three days?

No answer was returned.

INSPECTION OF THE YEOMANRY CAVALRY.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is the present system of inspecting the Yeomanry Cavalry; and whether it is proposed to make any change therein; and, if so, whether he will consider the expediency of utilising the services of the officers commanding districts under the direction of an Inspector General of Auxiliary Cavalry?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The Yeomanry Cavalry are inspected by the Inspector-General of Cavalry or by officers specially deputed by him. No change in this system is contemplated beyond some arrangement under which the same Inspectors will be more continuously employed.

THE RIBBLE NAVIGATION.

MR. CURZON (Lancashire, Southport): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when the final Report of the Ribble Navigation Commissioners, appointed under the Preston Corporation (Ribble Navigation) Act of 1889, and promised before the end of 1890, is likely to be issued?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Commissioners inform me that they are now considering their final Report and hope to issue it during next month. The subject is very complex and difficult, and requires much consideration and careful survey.

MAILS TO PERSIA.

MR. CURZON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that letters, in course of transit from Persia to Great Britain, and vice versa, are frequently tampered with en route while passing through Russian territory, being sometimes cut open, sometimes detained, and sometimes destroyed; and whether, in view of the fact that such practice is not in accordance with the amenities ordinarily observed by civilised nations, the Secretary of State will consider the propriety of making representations to the Russian Government on the subject?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Nothing is known of this matter in the Foreign Office, as no representations have been made of any such occurrences.

MR. CURZON: The instances of which I speak are instances which have occurred within my own knowledge.

*SIR J. FERGUSON: I need hardly say that if any authenticated instances are brought to the notice of the Secretary of State, proper representations will be made.

THE BRENNAN TORPEDO FACTORY.

MR. EDWARD KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Rochester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War why the Government workmen at the Brennan torpedo factory at Chatham, who have previously received accident and sick benefit pay, have lately had such pay stopped?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: It was found that accident pay was abused, and therefore the superintendent recently rearranged the rates of pay, making allowance for the fact that accident and sick pay had ceased.

CONTEMPT OF COURT.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been directed to the arrest of four men in the town of Swaffham, Norfolk, for contempt of Court in connection with a disputed right of way case; if he is aware that these men (one of whom is between 60 and 70) have been imprisoned, and that their families are destitute; and if he could see his way to any modification of the sentence?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; my attention has not been called to this matter. If the hon. Member will supply me with particulars I will consider whether it is a case in which I can properly interfere.

THE CHICAGO EXHIBITION.

MR. GROTRIAN (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the report is true that the Government intend spending on the Chicago World's Fair an amount less than half the sum set apart for the Paris Exhibition; and if it is their intention to give the management of the British section to the Society of Arts, and not to a Government Department?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The arrangements for this business are not made by the Foreign Office, but I believe that provision is likely to be made for a Royal Commission to provide for the representation of this country at the Chicago Exhibition at a lower cost than at the French Exhibition of 1878.

SCHOOL FEES INQUIRY OFFICERS.

MR. W. M'LAREN: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that some School Boards and School Attendance Committees have officers known as "School Fees Inquiry Officers," who receive salaries for this special work, quite apart from any salaries they may have as School Attendance Officers; and whether, as these officers will necessarily have their occupation taken from them after the Education Bill becomes law, he will recommend that some compensation should be given to them?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am aware that persons are employed in the capacity to which the hon. Member refers, but it appears to me that although the Bill may render unnecessary the actual work upon which they are engaged, School Boards and School Attendance Committees will be able to find plenty for them to do by the more strenuous application of the powers which they possess for the enforcement of school attendance; and if this course is adopted, it will not be one of the least satisfactory results of the measure in question.

Mr. Matthews

THE SHEFFIELD TAILORS.

MR. H. J. WILSON: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been called to a circular, issued in reference to a dispute between the master tailors of Sheffield and workmen recently in their employment, in these terms:—

"Master Tailors' Association of Great Britain and Ireland,—Dear Sir,—As a member of the above Association you are requested not to employ the following men who have been locked out of the various shops"

(names of more than a hundred men follow); and will he say whether such a circular can be legally issued?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): This question cannot be answered in the abstract. The circular, coupled with other facts, might be evidence of an illegal conspiracy, or, if issued maliciously, it might, if damage resulted therefrom, give rise to an action for maliciously attempting to deprive persons of their employment; but without a full statement of the facts no correct opinion can be formed as to whether or not the issue of the circular is illegal.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

MR. ELLIOTT LEES (Oldham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether there is any regulation which prevents the Trustees of the National Gallery from exchanging at stated intervals the pictures lent by them to provincial art galleries, under the National Gallery Loan Act, for other pictures in their collection, in accordance with the method adopted by the Science and Art Department of exchanging their collections of objects of art lent to provincial museums and art galleries once in every 12 months; and if there is no such regulation, whether Her Majesty's Government will advise the Trustees of the National Gallery to adopt the system of the Science and Art Department with regard to their loan collections?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The National Gallery Loan Act of 1883 enables the Trustees and Director conditionally to lend to provincial and other galleries any pictures or works of art belonging to them or under their control which, in their opinion, can be spared from the national collection. Accordingly, in 1884, all such pictures were distributed on loan to various institutions which had applied, but at present there are few or no pictures that could be spared. The Trustees point out that the value of most of the works is far too great, and their presence in the National Gallery far too important, to justify their being circulated through the country, even if such a scheme were practicable, without involving the most obvious and perilous risks.

THE EDUCATION CODE.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, looking to the advanced period of the year covered by the Education Code, 1891, and to the fact of the financial arrangements of School Boards in Scotland for the current year having been all fixed upon the basis of the Code as originally issued, the Government will withdraw the amendment of the Code presently lying upon the Table of the House, and will leave the whole subject open and to be dealt with in the Scotch Code for 1892?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: This question was only put on the Paper last night, and I must ask the hon. Member to postpone it till Tuesday, when I shall hope to be able to answer it.

THE BELFAST POST OFFICE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the cause of the delay in filling up the clerkships and first-class sorterships in the Belfast Post Office declared vacant on the 2nd of April last, and whether the officers who will be promoted will in both cases receive the scale of pay to which their promotion will entitle them dating from the 2nd of April last?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Dublin University): The delay arose from the fact that a senior officer was employed in the Surveyor's Office, and as I did not wish to pass him over it was necessary to arrange with the Treasury that he should, when promoted, be borne as redundant on his class. This has been done, and steps are being taken to fill up the vacancies. The promotions will be antedated, so that the officers who may be promoted will not suffer.

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is a fact that the duty of sorting clerks in the Belfast Post Office is split into four terms, commencing at 4 a.m. and ending at 8 p.m., thus extending over 16 hours; on what grounds the same rule is not applied in the Belfast Sorting Office as exists in the telegraph office, where no duty extends over more than 12 hours; and if the present established force in the Belfast Office is sufficient to meet the extra work which the acceleration of the mails will involve; and, if not, what steps does he intend taking to meet the case?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member's question, which was only placed on the Notice Paper yesterday morning, I have to state that I yesterday called for a Report as to the facts of the case; and that when I have the necessary information I shall be glad to communicate with the hon. Member.

BELFAST AND MERSEY STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Belfast and Mersey Steamship Company applied on the 14th January last to the Northern Counties Railway of Ireland to be placed on equal terms as to through fares and divisions with the Belfast Steamship Company; and whether the Board of Trade can use their authority for the purpose of securing equal terms for the Belfast and Mersey Steamship Company?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am aware, Sir, that the Belfast Steamship Company applied to the Northern Counties Railway for a through rate to certain stations in England. I have no power to order such a through rate; that can only be done by the Railway Commissioners. But communications on the subject are being made by the Board of Trade to the Railway Company, which I hope may have a satisfactory result.

IRISH AND ENGLISH TRAFFIC CONFERENCE.

MR. MACARTNEY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has any control over the proceedings of the Irish and English Traffic Conference; and whether traders can take any steps to protect themselves from the claims of the Conference to adjust the traffic as to through booking, &c., between Ireland and England; and, if so, to what authority does the appeal lie?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No, Sir; I have no control over the proceedings of the Irish and English Traffic Conference. If traders have any complaint to make against any Railway Company, party to such Conference, which the Railway Commissioners under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, have power to entertain, it is open to such traders to apply to the Commissioners.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (EXEMPTION FROM THE STANDING ORDER.)

Ordered, That the Proceedings of the Committee on the Elementary Education Bill, if under consideration at Twelve o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the provisions of the Standing Order, Sittings of the House.
—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

(No. 355.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3.

*(355.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham) moved, in page 2, line 34, the omission of Sub-section 3, which gives the Education Department power, after the expiration of a year from the commencement of the Act, upon representation being made that in any district there is a deficiency of free school places, to require, after inquiry, such deficiency to be supplied in the manner provided by the Act of 1870. The hon. Baronet said: In moving the omission of this sub-section, I make the last stand that can be made, and urge the last pleas that can be urged, on behalf of the voluntary system and of the Church schools. My contention is that while the voluntary system in the villages is fairly protected by this Bill, the voluntary schools in our large towns will be most seriously affected by this clause. They are schools of a superior order, which have hitherto held their own against the competition of the School

Mr. Macartney

Boards in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and other Northern counties; and it is against these schools that this sub-section will be principally directed. To them this sub-section is as the shaft that sticks in the wounded side, "hæret lateri lethalis arundo." Now, I would ask the House to join with me for a few moments in grappling with the operation of this sub-section, and I shall be able to show that the provisions therein contained, with regard to the principle of the Bill, are unnecessary. What is the ordinary type of these schools? They may have four classes of scholars, one class with a 3d. fee, one with a 4d., one with a 6d., and one with a 9d. There may be a number of schools of this type in a town, carrying on the entire elementary education without help from the School Board or the rates. And there are many towns in the North thus situated. The average income would range from 15s. to 20s. a head. Now, if by the operation of this section the managers were compelled to accept an average grant of 10s. per head in lieu of these fees, thus depriving them of half their income, the eventual fall of those schools would be financially certain. The voluntary system would be no longer able to keep its head above water, and must strike its flag to the pirates of the School Boards. But I hope it will not come to this. The House is aware that in the schools I have mentioned attention is paid to the 3d., 4d., 6d. and 9d. classes. Now, the operation of this Bill will be to free the 3d. class; thus in every one of the large cities there would be this 3d. class absolutely free. In most of these schools also there will be some children educated free at the charge of good Church people. Accordingly the children, when they begin their school life in the lowest class, will be free, but when they enter the higher classes they will have to pay a fee according to the scale above mentioned, less 3d. in every case according to this Bill. I hope that the parents will consent to continue the payment of fees for the educational and social advantages their children will receive. Now, these arrangements would work automatically, and would provide free places everywhere, so far according to the principle of the Bill. And this would be satisfactory to the voluntary managers. On the one hand, there would be always free places at the bottom, while in the upper classes the income of the school would be sustained. And there was no need to make further provision. But by this sub-section representations can be made to the Education Department, not by Local Authorities nor by Representative Bodies, but by any body of persons—they may be opponents of the Church, and objectors to the voluntary system—that the amount of free accommodation provided is insufficient. If there is such free accommodation for 50 provided by the above arrangements, they will say it ought to be for 100; and if for 100 they will demand they will demand 200, if for 150 they will demand 300, and so forth. This may be done by agitators with the knowledge that such demands must kill these voluntary schools. And to whom are these representations to be made? They are to be made by irresponsible persons to the Education Department. I would certainly trust my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council with the interests of the voluntary schools; but, unfortunately, my right hon. Friend cannot live for ever politically, and the power will some time pass to right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Now, who are they? They are the very statesmen who have declared that the policy of the Bill ought to be the introduction of the School Board into every large town, and ultimately everywhere. I am not imputing to them anything they have not themselves declared in this House. They have been drumming it into our ears every night for the last 10 days, they have been drilling us into this belief, and they cannot be surprised if we take them at their word. These representations will, therefore, be made to Ministers who have a predilection for School Boards, and the effect will be that the free places in voluntary schools will be augmented by order, not according to the wants of the parents or of the children, but according to the wishes of those who have an ulterior purpose to serve—the supplanting of the voluntary system by Board schools. Yet, further, this kind of mischievous agitation may ultimately affect the minds of the parents, and instead of being content with free places in the third class, as above explained, will begin to think that they ought to have their children's education free in those classes where higher fees prevail. [Opposition cheers.] The Committee will see that I am rightly interpreting the views of hon. Members opposite. Then we should come back to the danger with which I started. The school would lose 20s. of fees and receive 10s. in compensation, and so must succumb. The effect of the sub-section must be to bring the School Board into all those large towns of the North of England where hitherto the voluntary system has worked quite well, and, once established, the School Board will never stop until it has absorbed all the elementary education. The School Board is an ogre that eats up everything within reach, and it regards the voluntary schools just as a cannibal might regard an African traveller. You may ask how it is that I know. My answer is that I belong to a School Board, and have seen this done under my own eyes during the last seven years. I hope that, after all, the voluntary schools may survive the danger with which they are threatened, but that danger ought never to have been thrown in their way. The disposition of every School Board will be to act after its kind in every town where it is introduced. Once the thin end has been inserted the wedge will be driven home in all its length and breadth. The mill of the Board may grind slowly, but in the end it will pulverise everything opposed to it. I have myself received notes of warning from Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, Bradford, Salford, and Sheffield, and I have no doubt there are many other towns in which the feeling is the same. Indeed, I believe it is true of every town in the North of England where Churchmen do congregate. The voluntary system may surmount the peril by renewed exertions. Not in vain, but with entire success, has the net been spread by the Opposition in the sight of my right hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench. But school managers will now know of the danger which impends, and, in combination with their supporters and with the parents, will, I hope, present an unbroken front to the School Board as common enemy. I say this in no spirit of hostility to the School Board, which has its proper duties in such localities as East London, the southern bank of the Thames, and wherever there is darkness, poverty, and misery in any town or district. In such places the Board does noble work, which could be done by no other agency. Such work it can becomingly do without trenching on the goodly preserves of the voluntary system. I have conferred on this sub-section with the Chairman of the London Board (Mr. Diggle, who understands the subject probably better than anyone else in England, owing to his combined knowledge of the School Board and of the voluntary system, and I find that he also is seriously alarmed for the safety of the upper-class voluntary schools. I have hopes that, in spite of everything, the voluntary schools will succeed in passing through the danger—a danger which ought never to have been provoked, as it is by this clause. As one who has given his brains to the School Board, while his heart was with the voluntary schools, I have thought it my duty to warn my hon. Friends around me that this sub-section implies a menace, and threatens to hand over to the spoiler that which we regard as one of the most precious of our national possessions.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 34, to leave out from the word "if," inclusive, to the end of the Clause.—(Sir Richard Temple.)

(4.15.) MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I merely wish to avail myself of this opportunity of pointing out to my hon. Friends who sit on this side of the House that they have now an opportunity of showing that they still entertain the principles they have always advocated. They need not fear the defeat of the Government now, because the supporters of the Government are to be found on the other side, and not upon this. Perhaps it is only right and proper that it should be so, because the Bill is founded on principles which the Opposition have always maintained, and which we on this side have always repudiated.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): As I have not intervened in these Debates before, I hope I may be allowed to say a few words. I do not propose to follow the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple) into his scriptural illusions, but as I am entirely opposed to any grant being given from the Public Purse to any school in which any form of sectarian religion is taught, I hope the prediction of the hon. Member that the voluntary system will be destroyed by this Bill may be accomplished. No doubt the voluntary system has done good work in the past, just as the old stage coaches did; but as it is now as extinct as the dodo or the stage coach, I think the time has arrived for relegating it to the limbo of all useless things.

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I am inclined to think that my hon. Friend has made this grave and serious matter almost humorous. I look upon the matter as a very important one, and join with my hon. Friend (Mr. H. T. Knatchbull-Hugessen) in the hope that a few of what I may call the flabby Members on this side of the House will pluck up courage to vote against the clause. I know that we shall not be able to beat the Government, but we ought to make a better show than we did on a recent memorable Division. What is this clause? It is the agitating clause of the Bill. If any agitator wishes to make out that something is wanting in order to attack the denominational schools, he will be encouraged by this clause to do so. [Mr. LABOUCHERE: "Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for Northampton says "hear, hear," as I expected he would; for there is a certain section of Members on the other side of the House whose only idea of the Bill is to convert it into a machine for agitating against the voluntary religious schools. This clause will not only give them the power; but directly encourages them to do so. The Education Department are, under the clause, to be themselves satisfied before they take action. I have every confidence in the Education Department as at present composed. But it will not always be managed by its present political head, and the next head may desire to do away with the voluntary schools, which the hon. Member for Northampton so much dislikes. The clause puts power into the hands of the Department that will enable that object to be accomplished. Such a clause offering direct encouragement to agitation is, to my mind, both unfair and unwise. There are some people who think that School Boards ought to be universal. If it is thought desirable to have School Boards and nothing else, very good. I and many others should regret it, but we should know what we were about. It is a remarkable fact that the pamphlet recently issued by Mr. Fitch, of the Education Department, on the effect of free schools in America, Belgium, and France, shows that in those countries there is a regular agitation growing up to try and get more of the very system which we are so anxious to abolish, namely, the extension of religious, or what we call voluntary schools, and to partly, at least, support denominational schools out of the public funds. For these reasons I strongly support the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Evesham, although I know that it will be altogether futile, and that hereafter the Education Department will have to give in to the continual agitation, chiefly political, of those who desire to stir up strife and injure denominational schools.

(4.23.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): May I express a hope that the Amendment will be put in such a form as will enable other Amendments to be moved, after it has been disposed of.

THE CHAIRMAN: I propose to put "That the words 'if at any time' stand part of the Clause."

MR. BARTLEY: What does that do? Does it get rid of the sub-section?

THE CHAIRMAN: No.

Question proposed, "That the words 'if at any time' stand part of the Clause."

SIR W. HART DYKE: I desire to say a few words upon the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Evesham. He made a somewhat amusing speech, but he drew a very gloomy picture of the immolating effect of the clause upon voluntary schools. His picture of the attitude of School Boards in the Metropolis was scarcely fair. He spoke of them as poaching upon what he called the "rich preserves" of the voluntary schools, but I have only to say, as I have said before, that such gloomy anticipations and prophecies as those in which my hon. Friend has indulged I altogether disagree with. I believe that the result will be entirely the other way. It will be treated simply as an educational measure, and not as one that is to get rid of the voluntary schools. My hon.

Friend has suggested that, in place of this sub-section, which provides that any person may represent to the Department that free accommodation is needed, there should be inserted a provision for placing voluntary schools in the hands of Local Authorities.

SIR R. TEMPLE: No; I did not suggest that.

SIR W. HART DYKE: I certainly took down the words "Local Authority," and I understand that the suggestion of my hon. Friend was to place more power in the hands of the Local Authority. Now, I venture to submit that if one thing could be more injurious than another in regard to the future of the voluntary schools of this country it would be to place them in the hands of Local Authorities. It is perfectly obvious that if the Local Authorities were opposed to voluntary schools, they might, from political motives, set this clause to work. As the clause stands, the third section will, I believe, work extremely well in regard to the voluntary system in future. It will mean this—that any aggrieved body of parents may sign a Memorial and present it to the Education Department, and from that simple channel it would become known to the Department that free education was demanded. My hon. Friend argues that the clause will be utterly destructive to a large number of voluntary schools. Now, the average fees paid in the Church schools in England are 10s. 8d. per head. In the Wesleyan schools the average fees amount to 16s. 2d., and surely my hon. Friend knows that the Wesleyan Body consider that the financial arrangements of the Bill constitute a very handsome offer, and are prepared to meet any emergency. The advocates of Church schools, which only receive an average fee of a little more than 10s. a head are going a little beyond the mark when they say that the Board schools, under this Bill, will bring about the absolute ruin of the voluntary schools. I would only urge again, as I have urged before, that a good deal may be done by a system of grouping and co-operation, especially after the very large concession which Her Majesty's Government have already made in regard to the inclusion of children between three and five years of age. I do not think I need detain the House any longer on this question. I have only to repeat that I appreciate the difficulty in which the schools in the North of England will be placed, but I am confident that if they boldly meet the emergency they will prove equal to it, and that the gloomy prognostications of my hon. Friend and the aspirations of hon. Members opposite in regard to the denominational schools will alike be disappointed when the measure is fairly tested.

*(4.32.) MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): The right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken has referred to representations which have been made on this subject, and I feel it to be my duty to place before the Committee a representation from another important body which holds views very different from those expressed by the right hon. Gentleman—the Stockport District Teachers' Association—comprising over 300 certificated teachers, and representing a considerable section of Lancashire as well as Cheshire. This Association have passed a resolution calling for the withdrawal of this part of the clause, on the ground "that it will lead to the extinction of the best voluntary schools," and "that its insertion is not in accordance with the pledges that nothing in the Bill should injure the voluntary system." This view of the consequences of this clause is that taken by the Party opposite, almost to a man. It is one of their principal reasons for supporting the Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President says that hon. Members opposite are mistaken in their conclusions—that they are under a delusion in imagining that the Bill, or this particular clause, will have any injurious effect on the voluntary schools. Of course this, to a great extent, must be a matter of mere belief, for experience can only practically settle the question. But all we know is that the language which has proceeded from hon. Gentlemen opposite has pointed with entire unanimity to the threatened destruction of the voluntary schools. There is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Brightside Division (Mr. Mundella). We have seen him during the past few days in all his glory, telling us that this clause must stand and the other must go out. He has lost no opportunity of launching his diatribes against the schools of Lancashire. He seems to hate a Lancashire school almost as much as he does a Lancashire mill. In this connection it is not unimportant for us to consider that at some future time, sooner or later, the operation of the Act may be placed in the hands of the right hon. Member for the Brightside Division and his friends, and, after the opinions they have expressed, there can be no doubt as to the spirit in which the Act will be worked by them towards the voluntary schools within it, the elements of endless mischief. Worked industriously with the rancour which characterises the language of the right hon. Gentleman, we cannot doubt what the fate of the voluntary schools will be. Then let us consider how this clause may be used. Any number of persons may demand a free school, or free accommodation in a voluntary school. We will suppose that in a school of 200, 100 demand it. If they are to be provided with free accommodation, why should the others go on paying fees? [Opposition cheers.] Aye, hon. Members opposite see all these points quite clearly. Nobody is blaming them for not discerning them, but it is astounding that Conservative Members do not see these things. It is to them I am addressing arguments, which on hon. Gentlemen opposite would be quite thrown away. In the school I am supposing 100 persons demand free education. Well, how is the matter going to work? Lord Cranbrook has explained the whole matter in a speech reported in this morning's papers. "No school," he says, "need be entirely free so long as free places are supplied as far as they are required." This is indeed valuable information. A number of children walk into a school paying nothing. A number of others, belonging to precisely the same class, continue to pay fees for the honour and glory of the thing. But those who pay must give more than they did before, to make up for the loss occasioned by others refusing to pay. And this is to go on for ever, one man making great sacrifices and the other coolly accepting them. Time will soon dispel these visions. It will soon be seen that a mere handful of discontented persons in a district may be able to light a fire that will not easily be put out. They will wish for political or other reasons to strike a blow at certain school managers; they will send up their demand to the Department, the order will come down, the school will be cut in half, or closed altogether. But we go on saying, these things can never happen, because we, the Conservative Party, are passing this Bill, and we are the friends of voluntary schools. It is notorious that we stand by our friends and our principles. Those rapid conversions which are so deplorable in the present frivolous age are repugnant to us. But sometimes great parties have inflicted serious injuries on interests which they professed to serve, because they could not or would not foresee the inevitable results of their own measures. The summer-day's security which we are now enjoying will not last very long. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), who may probably be regarded as the true father of the present Bill, tells us what is before us. He is always clear-sighted and practical, and he informed us in the Debate of February 21, 1890, that "No parent would send his child to a voluntary school where a fee was charged, when he could send the child to a Board school free of charge." He "expressed his own personal opinion that denominational schools were a bad thing." And in the Debate on the introduction of the present Bill, speaking of Stockport and other places similarly situated, he said, "The result would be that the voluntary schools would have to make their schools free, or else new schools would have to be established." All this is very plain and very true. We have no right to complain of the right hon. Gentleman. He finds this Party ready to perform a work which he never could induce his own to undertake, and he makes use of it. No doubt, he must secretly enjoy the spectacle of the Conservative Party embarking upon a policy which must destroy the voluntary schools, but his ingenuity fully entitles him to this performance, in which we make the faces, and he speaks the words. These are the things the friends of voluntary schools should consider. But they have had no time to consider them. The Bill was introduced at a late period of the Session, and thus far it has been pushed through at railroad speed. In our proceedings in Committee no concessions have been made to this side unless they were also demanded by the Party opposite. Was not that a memorable incident which occurred the other night, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer explained very fully that a certain demand from the other side could not be yielded; that it would throw all the finances of the country into confusion; that chaos would overtake us if he gave way. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham soon changed all that. He waved his magic wand, and there was a transformation scene. The Chancellor of the Exchequer vanished through a trap door, and the First Lord of the Treasury came forward with his usual urbanity and gave what was demanded. Sir, I am aware that it may be said, Look at the United States—there it is the Board schools which are growing weaker, while the denominational schools increase in strength. If that be so, it seems to prove that the people do not set so much by this inestimable boon of free education as you seem to imagine; that they do not want it, and prefer to have what they do want, and pay for it. In that case, why are you going to inflict an additional £2,250,000 of taxation upon the country? Why do you provoke a battle of the schools in all the populous districts of the land? In reality, the analogy attempted to be drawn between this country and the United States is misleading. The increase of voluntary schools there only takes place in districts where a majority of well-to-do persons reside. Where all the parents are persons of narrow means, voluntary schools cannot flourish side by side with Board schools. One set of parents, earning no more than another set, will not go on paying fees when there is a free school just round the corner. We oblige the children to go to school; the United States do not. There is no general compulsory law there, and in the States where it does exist it is almost a dead letter.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): No, no.

*MR. JENNINGS: Of course, the right hon. Gentleman who contradicts me, knows better than anybody else. When hon. Members presume to make a speech about education he usually begins his reply by telling them they do not know what they are talking about, and ought to go home. The more, however, the right hon. Gentleman examines into the question the more he will see that my statement is in accordance with the facts. The children in the United States go voluntarily to school, and in many parts of the country they are sent to denominational schools, because the parents wish to keep their children a little select. Even in Republics these objectionable ideas prevail. But we have a compulsory law, and now we say to the parents, "you shall send your children to school and shall not pay for their education unless you like. We will cast the burden upon another section of the community, many of whom are almost as poor as you are." Supposing they put on any of those aristocratic airs which excite so much indignation on the other side, and say, "We do like to pay for their education, they must be fined for it." If the thrifty artisan sends his child to a select school and pays the fees as long as he can, you say to him, "Not only shall you pay for the education of your own child, but you must pay something towards the education of your thriftless neighbour's child." That is a severe sacrifice to ask of him. The thriftless man has hitherto been paying, say 3d. a week, for the education of his child. That 3d. will represent to him a pint of beer and a screw of tobacco. He will consume the pint of beer, smoke the screw of tobacco, and leave somebody else to educate his child. My belief is, that this clause will end in the destruction of the voluntary schools in large towns. I believe it will throw the educational question into the roaring cauldron of Party politics, and the result will not be good for education or for politics. I believe that it will sow dissension among large classes of the community, and that it will be a tax on the provident for the benefit of the improvident. Believing these things, I shall vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

*(4.52.) MR. ELLIOTT LEES (Oldham): We are, after all, friends of education on both sides of the House, although, whilst we prefer voluntary schools, gentlemen opposite prefer Board schools. While I support the voluntary school I do not object to the existence of the Board schools, and I hope that

Mr. Jennings

Gentlemen opposite in their support of the Board school system do not mean to imply that the voluntary school system is altogether bad. I represent one of the great manufacturing towns in Lancashire where the School Board has existed side by side with the voluntary schools ever since the Act of 1870 came into force. The Board School system there has by no means destroyed the voluntary schools, and I do not think that, even under this sub-section, it is likely to do so. We can still find plenty of money to support our voluntary school system, and I think we are likely to be able to do so. I should like to ask the Government and Members opposite to give us a little more time than is granted under this section to recover from its effect. Hon. Members opposite are no doubt anxious to improve the cause of education. They have shown their sympathy by promoting many educational reforms, using for the purpose what I may call, without meaning any offence, the socialistic agency of the State. We on this side are endeavouring to further the cause of education by means of the individualistic agency of voluntary subscriptions. Hon. Members opposite must admit that while they generally call the tune we generally have to pay the piper. I do not object to paying the piper for what will be done under this sub-section, but I think we ought to have a little more time to prepare for doing so.

(4.56.) MR. HOWORTH (Salford, South): I rise for the purpose of supporting the Amendment. It is a most remarkable fact that not a single Member on the other side has risen in this Debate. If we wanted a complete justification of the attitude we take when we say the Bill is drafted in the interests of Members opposite, I think we could not have a more complete and absolute proof of that fact than the circumstance I refer to. The vice which a great many of us see in this Bill, and more especially in this clause, is that it absolutely ignores the fact that England does not constitute a homogeneous community. There is a rural England and an urban England, and we hold that to a very large extent this Bill will eventuate in the sacrifice of rural England for the purpose of conciliating urban England. In some respects it will be of great advantage to the rural districts. Every eleemosynary gift to poor people must bring some advantage, although whether it is a lasting advantage is another matter. But we hold that the benefit has been purchased at the cost of demoralising our educational system in the great towns of the North of England. I rose, however, to speak not so much on the side of the voluntary schools as on the side of education itself. We have struggled for 30 years past to build a great many schools, and have been impressing on our artisans who are getting large wages that it is a great advantage to them in every way to have schools where high fees are charged, and now we are going most effectually to destroy that kind of initiative among them. But we are going to do something that is much worse. We are going, in my view, to increase the gap which separates the very poorest portions of the town population from the artisans who earn considerable wages. If the voluntarists are to fight their battle it must be by constituting select schools in which to collect the cream of the working classes. I represent a constituency consisting almost entirely of artisans and wealthy manufacturers. The former live in the town, but the latter have homes 10 and 12 miles away from it. Can it be expected that this wealthy class will continue to subscribe to maintain voluntary schools which are threatened with absorption by the School Boards? I foresee danger and disaster awaiting education in our northern towns. Hon. Members are indulging in fantastic ideas when they suppose that it is possible in those towns to induce all classes to make use of the same schools. There are many classes amongst the masses, and artisans who receive good wages will insist that their children shall be separated from the dregs of the population, the children of the pavement. I hold that the Government are making a great mistake. It has been the privilege of the Conservative Party in the past to advocate and support great measures of social reform, and it will, I hope, be our privilege in the future to do so again, but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the present measure is a form of legislation that strikes at the fundamental principles of our political faith. I am afraid that the real motive to which the existence of this Bill is due is a belief that it will pay. With an appeal to the country impending, it is no doubt tempting to try to conciliate a large section of the community by legislation that is popular though capricious, but I warn Her Majesty's Government that having once embarked upon these enterprises they will be unable to stay their hand. They will create an inexhaustible appetite for legislation of this kind, and their conduct and that of the Opposition reminds me of a race between steamers on an American river when the passengers encouraged the captain to sit on the safety valve and to put the cargo in the stoke-hole, and when the result was an explosion.

(5.5.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I have listened with great pain to the observations that have fallen from my hon. Friends. Their speeches are speeches against the Bill, and the provision which they now specially attack is essential to the measure. Without it the Bill could not be passed. The hon. Member for Stockport has used language imputing that the Bill has been sprung upon the Conservative Party as a surprise. I would remind my hon. Friend that two years ago the Prime Minister announced that this education policy was the policy of the Conservative Party, and would be carried into effect as soon as financial considerations should permit. In my opinion, it would be difficult to draw a Bill less disagreeable than the present one to the voluntary schools which charge high rates of fees. There have been vaticinations of a terrible kind as to what will be the effect of this clause upon those schools. I remember very well that in 1870 some of my hon. Friends entertained precisely the same views as to the consequences of the Elementary Education Act which was introduced by Mr. Forster, and which I supported. I am, however, glad to be able to say that my hon. Friends' forebodings were not realised, and that the voluntary schools throughout the country—not only Church of England schools, but Wesleyan, Roman Catholic, and Congregational schools—rose to the occasion and made every effort to supply still better education. In answer to some of the criticisms that have been passed upon the clause, I may appetite of the ferocious ogre he has alluded to. I brought forward a Motion to refuse the new fee grant of 10s. to Board schools when the school rate amounts to 1s. in the £1, which would have had the effect of muzzling the ogre, but he did not give me the support I might have expected, and allowed the opportunity to pass. But I hope all those who appear to be opposed to this sub-section will, when we come to consider the question of extending the time when this Bill will come into operation, support the hon. Member for Oldham should he think it necessary to take a Division.

*(5.36.) MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I do not think with the First Lord of the Treasury that if this sub-section is rejected it is tantamount to a rejection of the Bill. I was sorry to hear him say that, for I am afraid that I must vote for the omission of the sub-section, and, therefore, my vote may be construed into one given in hostility to the Bill, though in my conscience I do not think that will be the effect of voting against the sub-section. If the sub-section is the very kernel of the Bill, without which the Bill cannot pass, we cannot be accused of a desire to unduly delay progress if we devote a little time to the discussion. I think my right hon. Friend must have found within the last few days that this Bill has caused a large amount of discontent, not to use a stronger word, among those whose interests he has a sincere desire to serve. I am not going to allow myself to be led into a Second Reading speech and argument, a course which by your kind indulgence, Sir, some of my hon. Friends have adopted; but I wish to point out that if some sort of concession is not made to our view, this sub-section may be made an engine of very serious evil against voluntary schools. If at any time it is represented—the Bill does not say by whom—to the Education Department that there is not the necessary amount of free school accommodation, then the Department may, with certain formalities, declare that the accommodation must be provided. Now, I call attention to this possible contingency. There are certain schools known as certified efficient schools, which do not receive a grant; they are inspected by Inspectors, and supported partly by fees and partly by subscriptions. What is to prevent anyone in that district, parents or not, representing to the Department that a certain amount of free accommodation is desirable? What is to prevent the peace of the parish—which has long existed in a peculiar manner, perhaps, but in a manner that commends itself to the inhabitants—what is to prevent the peace and harmony of the parish being upset for the sake of supplying accommodation that nobody desires or only a very inconsiderable number of persons demand. Surely the sub-section ought to have some provision that the representation should be limited in some responsible manner by inquiry by a Local Authority, or there should be some sort of guarantee or assurance that there shall be a bond fide expression of opinion by persons really interested, and that there is real need for the accommodation. It has been suggested that the difficulty might be met by the grading of schools, but it is acknowledged there would be a good deal of difficulty in supplying in voluntary schools the means for this sub-division. For instance, in Maidstone, taking that as a fair illustration of a town in the South of England, where there is a School Board, but no Board schools, there are, hitherto, only schools supported by voluntary contributions, and there the same difficulty will arise which has been referred to in connection with the high-fee schools in Lancashire and Yorkshire. But without going further into the merits of the question, I must say unless Her Majesty's Government will give a real consideration to the facts of the case as put before them by those who, having been engaged in the work of education ought to know, unless we get some sort of assurance that these facts are being considered and not merely met by official answer, I must vote for the Amendment. The sub-section may be used as an engine for destroying the system we have so long supported, and if we cannot get an assurance that it will be modified in the manner sketched out I must vote with my hon. Friend.

*(5.45.) SIR W. HART DYKE: My hon. Friend behind me has referred to the drafting of the sub-section, and has asked how the Department are to prevent bogus demands for free education. The security is to be found in the words

"If the Department are satisfied after inquiry that such is the case." This is the task which has been thrown on the Department ever since Mr. Forster's Bill became law, and the same intelligence has only to be shown in the future as had been shown in the past to avoid all the difficulties anticipated by the hon. Member. The hon. Member added that the Government have made no concessions to hon. Members behind the Treasury Bench. This is not so. The Government have made large concessions with respect to infants and half-timers.

(5.47.) Mr. LABOUCHERE rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

*MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I only wish to say, in reference to the concession to half-timers, that yesterday when Lord Cranbrook received the deputation on the subject, we demonstrated that there will be an actual loss of 2s. 6d. per scholar in the half-time schools.

(5.50.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 269; Noes 38.—(Div. List, No. 321.)

*(6.4.) MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to move the omission of the words "the expiration of one year from." I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, that this sub-section is essential in order to give a large portion of the population a chance of getting free education. But I am afraid that the provision of a delay of one year will act disadvantageously in districts such as Preston and Stockport, because the clause cannot begin to come into operation until after the twelve months have passed, and it will take much more than a year for the Education Department to go through the formalities attendant on the establishment of a School Board. What are the formalities which have to be gone through under the Act of 1870? First, the Education Department requires a return of the school accommodation in a given district; then the Department has to notify to the people of the district that there is a want of accommodation; then the people of the district may claim to be heard on the question, whether or not the statement of the Education Department is an accurate and trustworthy one; then a public inquiry may be ordered, and not until it has taken place will the Department issue a final notice that a certain amount of free school accommodation must be provided. Lastly, six months must elapse before the Education Department can order the establishment of a School Board in the district; then the Board has to be elected, and it has to set about building a Board school. All this lengthy process will have to be gone through under this section, and, therefore, I say that Stockport and Stalybridge, Preston and Prestwich may have to wait not one but three years for free education, instead of getting it simultaneously with the rest of the country. Hence, I ask the Committee to strike out these words. The Vice President of the Council informed us, in answer to a question, that during the year allowed by this sub-section, the tenth section of the Act of 1876 will be enforced. Now, we have been supporting this Bill very heartily, because among other reasons we hold that all connection between education and pauperism should at once cease, but under this sub-section parents during that twelve months will still in these cases have to apply for the remission of fees to the Guardians.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, lines 34 and 35, to leave out the words "the expiration of one year from."—(Mr. Summers.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'the expiration of' stand part of the clause."

*(6.10.) SIR W. HART DYKE: It is impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment. The clause has received very great consideration, and this section of it was framed with the very obvious object of giving the voluntary schools in the districts time to meet the exigencies of the case. I may point out that immediately the Bill comes into operation a vast number of schools will at once become free, because their average fee is less than the fee grant of 10s.

MR. MUNDELLA: I did hope that the Government would have given some consideration to this Amendment, and at least have met us half way. I am as anxious as any one to press forward the consideration of this Bill, but it is necessary to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that in some of our larger towns a year will elapse before the Department will under this section be able to move with a view to securing free education, and that the inquiry which will have to take place may delay the matter two years further. I think the Government might have met us by reducing the period from one to six months, but if they decline to do that then I trust my hon. Friend will rest satisfied with having made a protest.

MR. PIOTON (Leicester): One point seems to have altogether escaped attention. There is a marked contrast between this Bill and the Act of 1870 in this respect. The Act of 1870 immediately it was passed conferred its benefits on the people; there was no intervening period provided between its passing and its coming into operation. Yet under this sub-section a whole year is to be wasted. I do protest most heartily against that.

(6.16.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I hope the Government will not give way on this point, for this delay will give the voluntary schools an opportunity of meeting the difficulty in which the Bill will place them. I think too that in many cases parents will continue willingly to pay fees if by so doing they can avoid the necessity of establishing a School Board.

*MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): Although I think some intervening period is desirable, I hold that the two years which must practically elapse under this section is an excessive amount of time. I have been informed that the effect of this Act will be to immediately free every Board school in Birmingham, whereas the denominational schools will not be free for two years.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: May I point out that there will be nothing to prevent the voluntary schools coming to an understanding among themselves. They will at once get the full advantage of the Act, and will become either free schools or schools charging a diminished fee. I believe that many of them are already preparing for the change. It would, however, be a great hardship to compel them to come in without allowing them ample time to make the necessary arrangements.

*(6.20.) MR. ELLIOTT LEES: I think the interval provided for in this section should be longer rather than shorter. Although I am not in the least afraid of the effects of the Bill, and although I do not anticipate there will be any difficulty in getting the subscriptions for voluntary schools, yet I think it is rather hard to call upon the subscribers to make up the difference between the fee grant and the income they used to receive from fees, and at the same time, perhaps, have to provide additional accommodation. When once an expenditure is occurred on bricks and mortar there is no telling how heavy the burden may become. I trust that the Government will not give way on this point.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I hope that my hon. Friend will proceed to a Division on this Amendment. If we are going to give free education to the people the boon should be conferred upon them at the earliest possible moment. I wish to take this opportunity of pointing out the unfairness of the suspension of the 12 o'clock rule.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

(6.24.) MR. DE LISLE: There can be no reason for allowing two years to elapse. We may have a General Election in 1892, and then, if hon. Members meet with the success they anticipate, it will be in their power to give immediate operation to this provision.

(6.25.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 186; Noes 95.—(Div. List, No. 322.)

*(6.38.) MR. ELLIOTT LEES: I have an Amendment on the Paper to insert "two years" in lieu of "one year" in this clause, but after the discussion that has just taken place, and seeing that the Government will not give way under any circumstances I do not intend to move my Amendment. I am glad, however, that I put it on the Paper, as it may have enabled Ministers more successfully to resist the last Amendment.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): In what way is the necessity of providing free places to be brought before the Education Department?

SIR W. HART DYKE: The most obvious way of bringing to the knowledge of the Education Department the demand or necessity for providing free places in a school would be to send a memorial. The Department is deluged at all times with all sorts of complaints and requests. The whole system of the Inspectorate has been changed by the altered conditions under which the Code is administered, and through the visits of the Inspector the wants of a district in regard to this matter can be easily ascertained.

MR. PICTON: I am not altogether satisfied with this explanation. I would point out that we are creating a new right, and if only one parent insists on free education for his child, it ought to be given.

MR. MUNDELLA: I, on the other hand, think the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman is quite satisfactory, and that there is no doubt the Education Department would act on the representations made to it.

MR. CHANNING: The object of the Amendment I rise to move is to make Sub-section 3 apply not only to cases where the public school accommodation without payment of fees is insufficient, but also to cases where such accommodation is unsuitable for the wants of the population.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 38, after "fees," to insert "or that such accommodation is unsuitable for the wants of the population."—(Mr. Channing).

MR. MUNDELLA: I hope the Government will not object to the Amendment. It is better, in the interest of all parties, that the words should be inserted.

SIR B. SAMUELSON (Oxfordshire, Banbury): The case of the refusal of a School Board in Wales to sanction a Roman Catholic school, which had been referred to, showed that hardship might arise if the words were not inserted.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport), pointed out that the words were already in the Act of 1870. He had long been of opinion that the proper exercise by the Department of their existing powers would have put a stop to the grievances complained of by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton the other night.

MR. W. H. SMITH said the Government could not object to the insertion of the words.

Amendment agreed to.

(6.45.) Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 38, to leave out from the second "and," to the word "case," in line 40, inclusive.—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): Will the right hon. Gentleman accept the words "suitable and sufficient?"

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): The right hon. Gentleman in a previous clause has already accepted the words sufficient and suitable accommodation.

MR. SUMMERS: Will the right hon. Gentleman insert the word "suitable?"

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is for the Inspectors of the Department to see that the accommodation is sufficient, and it is not necessary to repeat the words over and over again.

SIR H. JAMES: As a matter of drafting the words "suitable and sufficient" might be accepted, and it would then be the work of the Department. The word "insufficient" will not do. It rather represents building accommodation than the accommodation of the classes.

MR. CHANNING: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will accept the words of a subsequent Amendment which stands in my name.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I beg leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 38, after "fees," to insert "or that such accommodation is unsuitable for the wants of the population." — (Mr. Channing.)

MR. MUNDELLA: I believe both sides of the House are agreed; and I think it is better in the interests of all parties that you should insert the words of the hon. Member.

SIR B. SAMUELSON: If I remember rightly, a case has several times come before this House, as it certainly came before the Education Commission, in which the Roman Catholics properly complained that a School Board in Wales had refused a Roman Catholic school. That case shows how easily hardship might arise unless words were inserted which make it clear that the accommodation shall be suitable to the population. It is a most important thing that there should be no proselytising of children by forcing them either into denominational or into the Board schools.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): May I point out that there would be no great harm in applying those words.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: Not only would there be no harm, but they are already in the Act of 1870, and I have been long of opinion that had the Department properly exercised its power in respect of requiring suitable accommodation, a stop would have been put to such complaints as we heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton the other night. They have power to compel managers either to give up teaching in a way which is objectionable, or to require the establishment of a School Board in the parish. I hope words will be inserted which will emphasise the opinion of the House of Commons that the accommodation ought to be suitable.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We do not object to the insertion of these words, as it appears to be the general desire.

*MR. CHANNING: Perhaps the words could more properly be inserted after the word "age."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 38, after "age," to insert "or that such accommodation is unsuitable for the wants of the population." — (Mr. Channing.)

Other Amendments made.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E. Darwen): I beg to move what is only a verbal Amendment. It is to insert after the word "age" the words "requiring such accommodation." As the words stand, application might be made for a greater number of free places than are required, whereas the object is only to supply them to those children who are in need of free accommodation. The object of the words I propose is to supply free education only to the extent necessary.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 38, after the word "age" to insert the Sir B. Samuelson

words "requiring such accommodation." — (Viscount Cranborne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MUNDELLA: The representation made to the Department is that certain accommodation is required, and that in itself is sufficient. The words proposed are unnecessary.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: All that I want is that it shall appear on the face of the Act of Parliament that free education shall be given only where the children require it.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I think the words would rather emphasise the meaning of the clause, and I cannot see that they would do any harm.

*MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): "Required" is an ambiguous term. If you insert these words, it would be necessary to inquire whether the parents cannot afford to pay.

MR. PICTON: This is an endeavour to mark a class distinction, and certainly goes to mar the beneficent principle of the Bill, which is that every British child may have a free education if the parents demand it. If you draw a distinction between those children who do not require free education and those who do, you at once destroy the rights which have been created by the Board. I earnestly protest against this very serious proposal.

MR. ADDISON: As I understand the word "require" is merely used in the sense of desire—when it is desirable that such accommodation should be afforded.

(7.0.) SIR G. TREVELYAN: It seems to me it would be a mistake to use the word "desires." Not one in 20 of these children will desire to go to school.

SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds): I would suggest the words "for whom such accommodation is desired."

*SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I think it is necessary that some words of this kind should be put in. It appears to me from the clause as it stands that if a single child were found in any district for whom there was not a free place, the Education Department would have to provide a free place whether there was a demand or not. That is not the intention of the Government as I understand it. It is only when parents require and demand a free place that one is to be provided.

MR. MUNDELLA: Has the right hon. Gentleman considered the alternative? The parents of the child will still have to go to the Board of Guardians to obtain remission of the fees.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the words "if such accommodation is desired," will accomplish the object we have in view.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment agreed to, in page 2, line 38, after the word "age," to insert "for whom such accommodation is desired."—(Sir L. Playfair).

(7.3.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Earlier in the evening we had the last wail from the denizens of "the cave," and we also heard expressed by Gentlemen opposite who represent important constituencies in Lancashire and elsewhere, their dislike of free schools, and more especially, their dislike of School Boards. The object of my Amendment is, to provide that, as between the fee-charging school and the free school, there shall be no social distinction, and no inferiority on the part of the free school. I know the Vice President has a great affection for variety in our schools, but I understand that his desire for variety is chiefly in reference to the question of fees. We contend, at all events, that the variety shall not extend to the quality of the instruction given, or to the curriculum, or the buildings, or teachers. The proposal I have to make will, I trust, have a limited scope, because it will not apply to the case of rural districts where there is only one school, and where, therefore, there can be no inferiority between one school and another, and I hope it will not apply to cases where School Boards exist. We desire that our School Boards should not free one school here and another there, as unfortunately they have done in some schools in Scotland, but that they should free every school they have under them. In towns, however, where there are no School Boards, if the parents demand free schools the demand will have to be accepted, and it will be against the interest of those who manage and own the voluntary schools there to give free education if they can help it. They will lose a certain amount of income if a free school is introduced, and they will desire therefore to discourage the demand for free schools on the part of the parents in those towns. There will, therefore, be a very great temptation indeed for them to throw some sort of stigma on the free schools, and to discourage parents from demanding a large number of free schools. Some words should be put into the Bill to prevent them handing over as free schools the worst they have. I think the right hon. Gentleman himself would desire to prevent that from taking place. We know quite well the great difficulty the Department have in condemning any school which is nominally efficient. We are not asking for any superiority for the free schools, but we say that it is not right that there should be any possible chance that these free schools should be in any way inferior to the fee-paying schools. We do not desire, and I think it would be a great educational evil to get back to the system of ragged schools which prevailed some time past in the country.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 38, after the words last inserted, to insert the words "or that such free accommodation is inferior in the character of the staff, equipment, amount or quality of teaching to the general condition of the schools charging fees in the school district, or that the premises do not conform to the rules for planning schools contained in the Code."—(Mr. Sydney Buxton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(7.11.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I am unable to accept this Amendment. The hon. Member has stated, and rightly, that I am in favour of a system of grading and of variety in schools; but the Education Department is responsible for seeing that each and every school is kept up to a certain standard of efficiency, and that duty the Department will continue to fulfil in the future as in the past. The acceptance of this Amendment would be an indication that Parliament considers the Education Department practically unequal to the performance of its duty. I do not admit that after the Bill passes free schools will be found—"inferior in the character of the staff, equipment, amount or quality of teaching to the general condition of the schools charging fees in the school district."

I can only repeat the assurance I have already given, then when the Bill becomes law the Education Department will be equal to the emergency of seeing that it is properly carried out.

(7.12.) MR. A. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I am sure the right hon. Gentleman is sincere in his desire and determination to have all the schools efficient, but as a man of common sense he must know that, as to condition of building and relative efficiency, some schools in the country are inferior to others. He will not deny that the Government Inspectors are of opinion that the buildings and fittings of some schools in some populous districts are far below the standard that the Department might reasonably desire to see them brought up to. I will quote a few words from one of his own Inspectors on the subject. Not long ago, speaking of some of the struggling schools, one of these gentlemen said—

“The Inspector must either refuse the grant, and thereby abolish the school, or he must recommend the grant for work he knows falls infinitely short of the standard laid down for him in the Code. He chooses, probably, the most merciful power he has, giving the grant for work that he knows falls infinitely short of the standard laid down by the Code, and from that hour he perpetuates bad teaching by rewarding imperfect effort.”

If one of Her Majesty's Inspectors can speak in those terms, surely it is impossible for the right hon. Gentleman to say that he has succeeded in the path he has marked out for himself of seeing that “each and every school is kept up to a certain standard of efficiency.”

I know several School Inspectors intimately, and I can say from conversations I have had with them that their difficulty has been that the only lever by which it has been possible to bring schools to a standard of efficiency has been the lever of condemnation. Some of the schools that have been known to be the worst schools have had warning given to them this year. I hope that the schools of the worst kind will be brought up to the level of the others, but the idea that all schools are of one standard—I was going to say is little short of ridiculous, but, at any rate, it does not correspond with the facts. When you have a group of schools affected by this Bill the managers will meet together and say, “It is quite clear we must have one free school;” and unless words such as these are inserted it will be only human nature to give up the worst. The school buildings vary in efficiency—some of them are modern; others are 30 years old—so that to say that they can all be brought up to the same standard is a theory which will not hold water. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council does not want to see the free children put into the worst schools. Some words ought to be inserted in order to show that where there are a series of schools that nobody pretends are quite efficient an effort, at least, shall be made to secure that a fair amount of efficiency is provided for the free school children.

*(7.17.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): The Amendment contains two very different propositions; one is that “the premises should conform to the rules contained in the Code.” That is reasonable, though I am not sure that the words are necessary. But the first part of the Amendment provides that the free schools shall be equal “in staff, equipment, and quality of teaching to the schools charging fees in the school district.” Now, the whole object of starting fee-paying schools will be to secure a larger staff or better equipment than can otherwise be obtained. The clause goes on to say that the Education Department shall “supply the deficiency;” that would mean in staff or equipment. But, as I understand, what is really wished is that the free schools shall be equal, not to those which, being specially well equipped, may fairly charge a fee, but to the general requirements of the Code. I am not sure that this object is not already secured, but if not, to carry out that object some modification of the words will be necessary. If my hon. Friend would modify his Amendment in that sense I think it would be well worth the consideration of the Government, but probably the best plan would be to ask the Vice President of the Council to consider the matter, and, if necessary, to bring up some words on Report.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I would submit that what the right hon. Baronet desires is already provided in the words “efficient suitable.” The Amendment aims at a condition of things which does not exist, and is not likely to exist, and it lays down a rule which would be unworkable.

(7.22.) MR. T. ELLIS: The hon. Member has not dealt with the arguments of my hon. Friend, and least of all with that remarkable quotation which has been read to the Committee from a Report of one of the Inspectors. That Report shows that there are many schools that are unfit for the Parliamentary grant, and do not come up to the requirements of the Act. They are simply allowed to exist from considerations of pity—because it is known that if the grant is not continued the school will collapse. There is a distinct danger that in certain towns a poorly equipped school would be given over to the non-paying children, and I say that if that happened it would be a calamity in itself. It would be wholly against the spirit of this Bill; and not only that, but I venture to say that if a condition of things of this sort were allowed to continue in some of our towns for a number of years the worst evils contemplated by the Mover of the Amendment would be brought into existence. I trust the Amendment will be adopted, and if it is I can assure the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council that he will earn the gratitude of the country for putting the free schools in the same position as to efficiency as the schools where they happen to have fee paying children.

(7.23.) MR. MUNDELLA: I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, either in Committee or on Report, to agree to the insertion of words to insure that where a free school is accepted it shall be a school up to the general standard of efficiency that prevails, I will not say in the district, but in the country. I would suggest words which would not be objected to, namely, "or that such free accommodation is inferior in the character of the staff, equipment, amount, or quality of teaching to the general standard of public elementary schools." That, I think, a very reasonable Amendment, and one the Government could hardly refuse. The right hon. gentleman has agreed that in towns where the parents rely on voluntary schools they may assign such and such schools for the supply of free education. It is because

I do not desire to weary the Committee, or to raise the ire of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that I do not quote the Reports of the Inspectors; but I could, if necessary, point out passages in which these gentlemen have described some of the voluntary schools as "old dingy sheds," which ought to be swept off the face of the earth. Schools of this kind are perfectly useless, and if they do not come up to the requirements of the Education Act they should be got rid of. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen cheer that, but they are not got rid of. There is not a large town in the North of England where there is not a school of this kind. These schools are not got rid of, and I am afraid will not be got rid of for some time to come. Time is given to these schools to raise new subscriptions, the difficulty of raising new subscriptions is pointed out, the compassion of the Department is appealed to, and as a result schools that are totally inefficient and do not comply with the requirements of the Code are allowed to go on from year to year. Unless this clause is amended a group of schools in a large town receiving large grants may pool their fees, take over the excess grant, and assign the worst schools in the district to free education—schools that are deficient in building, in teaching staff, in light and air, and every reasonable requirement. I think the free schools should be at least fair average schools. Will the right hon. Gentleman secure that? If the right hon. Gentleman will give us that, I do not think we ought to press him any further.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I am afraid I cannot answer the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman in the affirmative. The effect of this Amendment would be practically to pass a vote of censure on the operation of the Education Department. It has been said that there are schools existing which ought not to exist. But there is a continuous operation going on under the New Code by which such schools are diminishing as fast as possible. There is the strongest motive power to further this decrease. Beyond that, the Department has decided again and again that this accommodation is to be suitable and sufficient accommodation, and I consider that those words cover the whole case.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman does not see his way to the acceptance of the Amendment, and it seems to me that he does not fully appreciate the point raised. The object of the Amendment is in no way to pass a censure on the Department or the Inspectors, but to protest against a state of things which has been shown to exist. The object of hon. Members opposite is apparently to make the parents dislike free schools, in order that a large amount of support may be given to the other schools. As the right hon. Gentleman is unable to accept this proposal we shall have to press it to a Division.

*SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I would point out that there is a sanitary aspect of the question relating to these schools which seems to have been somewhat overlooked. Many of these schools are extremely unhealthy, and if there is one class of scholars which ought to be looked after in this respect it is the poorer class. There are all sorts of defects in many of these schools as regards light and ventilation, as well as the amount of sanitary accommodation afforded to the children. I think we should see these defects remedied, and in the interests of public health, as well as of decency and morality, we ought to take care, not only that the children should receive their education free, but that every precaution should be taken to put the schools in the best possible sanitary condition.

Ayes 54; Noes 104 —(Div. List, No. 323.)

*(7.50.) MR. TALBOT: The object of this Amendment is to give a period, after the wants of a district have been ascertained, during which voluntary aid might be provided to meet those wants. Towards the end of the year after the passing of the Act, and within a month or even a day of that time, some one might go to the Department and represent that there was an insufficient amount of free public school accommodation, and the supporters of the voluntary schools might know nothing of it until it was too late to supply the deficiency, although they might be willing to do so. Nobody would be damaged by this Amendment if accepted; because it does not matter, looking at the subject from an educational point of view, who provides the education so long as it is provided. I think a year is not too long a period to give for providing the required accommodation. I assume that it is not intended to use the Bill as a means to promote the Board at the expense of the voluntary schools, and my object is to provide that everybody shall have a fair field and no favour.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 40, after "case," to insert "The department shall publish a notice of their decision as to the amount of additional free public school accommodation which appears to them to be required for the district, and directing such accommodation to be supplied; and if not otherwise provided within one year from the time at which such order was issued."—(Mr. Talbot.)

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I am afraid I cannot accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend. The first objection to it is that under Sub-section 3 a year must elapse before any representation can be made to the Department; and after that the Department would be bound to make a local inquiry upon notification being made to them. Then by Section 9 of the Elementary Education Act of 1870 the Department must give notice of their decision. Therefore, so far as the earlier part of the Amendment is concerned, its object is met by the Bill, which provides that the deficiency is to be supplied in the manner provided by the Act of 1870. Then my hon. Friend further asks that another year should be given. Her Majesty's Government have carefully considered the new position created by the sub-section as it stands, and they believe they have provided machinery which will adequately meet all demands, and if another year were to be added very great difficulty might arise.

(7.55.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: I wish the Committee to consider the way in which this measure would work in certain parts of the country. In places such as Darwen, which I have the honour to represent, the Bill, when passed, would be received with absolute consternation. No one would have the least idea what places would be required. They would contemplate the position with stupor, and do nothing at all. I do not understand by what machinery it is proposed to find out how many places would be required. Is there to be a house-to-house visitation? It is evidently intended that a little grace should be given, for the Bill provides that no step can be taken until a year after it has passed. It is quite obvious the important time for delay is not after the passing of the Bill, but after the decision of the Department that a certain number of places are required. Every delay is of value, but there is no very particular value in the year after the passing of the Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman would consent to transfer the period from the passing of the Bill to after the decision of the Department, I, for one, would assent to the alteration. I appeal to the Committee as to whether this is not a perfectly reasonable proposition. For my part, I do not believe that any sound argument can be brought against it.

*SIR L. PLAYFAIR: I should like to ask the noble Lord by whom this Bill will be received with consternation? Certainly not by the people; because the purpose of the Act is to give them free education, and they would hardly exhibit any consternation, for they would expect the voluntary schools to adjust themselves to the Act. Well, what does the Amendment propose? Why, that three years' delay shall take place. First of all, one year is to be allowed before any action is taken, and another year will be spent in an appeal. Now it is actually proposed that a third year shall be added to these two years before the free education in the Bill is provided. It is said that no one would be damaged, but certainly if this Amendment is passed voluntary schools will be damaged. When the people know the intentions of Parliament, will they consent to allow voluntary schools three years' grace before they receive the benefits to be conferred by the Act? If it were a question of Party interests, I should be delighted to give the three years' grace, because it would have an effect at the General Election very prejudicial to the Government; but in the interests of education the third year's delay ought not to be granted.

*(8.2.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish earnestly to appeal to my hon. Friend not to press the Amendment, because no greater injury could, I believe, be done to voluntary schools than would be done by accepting it. A year has been left, during which it is hoped the managers of voluntary schools will make their arrangements in their respective districts, and at the expiration of that time they will, under the operation of the Act of 1870, have ample time to do what is required. If it should be shown that voluntary schools are standing out against a public demand for free education that will be a great misfortune for the voluntary schools, and it will not only stimulate a general desire for School Boards, but it will shake the confidence of the public in the devotion of managers to the cause of education. My hon. Friends who support the Amendment have not sufficiently realised the arrangements that are provided for in these cases. The Bill allows a year, which intelligent managers will make good use of. It is my impression that as soon as any school becomes free there will be a general ferment with regard to free schools, that the population of each district will make known their wants within a limited period, and that managers will be able to arrive at a satisfactory idea of the extent of the accommodation that will be required. I am confident that they will provide before the end of the year the free school accommodation that is required. I believe in their intelligence and in their devotion to the interests of education and of religion, which has induced them to make sacrifices for voluntary schools, and the proposals the Government have made, after the most careful consideration, are ample to give all the time that is necessary to protect the interests they desire to preserve.

(8.8.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: I have to ask one question. I wish to know how much time is allowed by the Education Department for supplying the requirements made in their order?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If my noble Friend will turn to the Act he will see that the several stages are most carefully set out, and practically the time will be fully as long as is proposed by the Amendment.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: Rather longer.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is almost impossible that adverse proceedings could.

be taken against any managers much under a year.

MR. MUNDELLA: The position in these cases is altogether different from what it is when new schools have to be provided. The schools are already in existence, and therefore so much time is not required.

*MR. TALBOT: I hope it will not be thought I have made an unreasonable proposal. I quite understand that there are a great many stages to be gone through, and that considerable time must elapse before a final order can be issued. But it is after the final order is given that I ask for grace; I do not care so much about the intervening time. The people who have to act on the order want time to consider what they will do.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(8.10.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I propose to move the omission of the latter part of Sub-section 3 in order to place the words in a separate sub-section. The words are the following:—

"The expression 'public school accommodation in that Act (1870) should include public school accommodation without payment of fees."

These words, as they stand, would be limited by the context of Sub-section 3. But hon. Members will find on reference to Section 18 of the Education Act that a School Board is bound from time to time to provide such additional school accommodation in its district as may be necessary, and if the words I now propose to omit from Section 3 of this Bill were put in the form of a separate clause, the effect would be to give existing School Boards power to provide additional school accommodation at once, and without waiting for a requisition from the Education Department. I, therefore, move the omission of these words, with the object of placing them in a fresh section.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 42, to leave out from the word "and," to the word "fees," in page 3, line 2, inclusive.—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

*(8.15.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I must oppose this Amendment. The words as they stand are perfectly consistent.
Mr. W. H. Smith

MR. PICKERSGILL: Is it not the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to give existing School Boards the power to which I have alluded?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: They already have it.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I am aware they can provide fuller educational room in their own schools; but suppose the voluntary schools insist on continuing to charge fees, will the School Boards have power to erect new Board schools?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hardly think that point arises on this Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

*(8.16.) MR. CHANNING: Of the next three Amendments which stand in my name I only propose to move the third, which is to add, at the end of line 2, page 3, the following proviso:—

"Provided also that for the purposes of this Act it shall not be held that sufficient public school accommodation without payment of fees has been provided where a portion only of the school places in any school are made free."

I make this proposal in order to lay down clearly the right of a parent to have free education for his children without inquiring into his circumstances. I venture to assert that if the Bill remains in its present form it will not contain that principle. I have understood from the first that one of the main objects of the Bill was to put an end to the vicious system by which relief from fees can only be secured by applying to the Guardians or to the Remission Committees of School Boards. I may be told that the Bill as it stands will be sufficient to meet this difficulty, and that if a parent represents to the school manager his desire to have his children educated free he will get his wish complied with. But I do not think that that will be the case. We shall, I fear, still have discrimination by school managers between one class and another. Under this Bill the parent in some cases will still have to go to the Board of Guardians. That is what I wish to prevent. This Amendment will have the effect of preventing the managers of schools from discriminating between the scholars who pay and those who do not pay, and will thus remove the danger of the stigma of pauperism from attaching to those children who receive free education. The hon. Member for Evesham seems to think I have put these words on the Paper with the intention of embarrassing the action of voluntary schools. That is not the case. I believe there is only one place in which the principle of free places has been effectively carried out, and that is at Birmingham; but the evidence laid before the Royal Commission by Dr. Crosskey showed that even there the system of issuing free orders has led to men accepting them being taunted with the fact by their fellow men, with the result that bitter disputes have occurred. I believe if the Bill is not altered on this point, the effect will be that not only in large towns, but also in rural districts where the school fees have exceeded 10s. a year, there will grow up a system of free places in schools as distinct from free schools, and this I urge would be most undesirable. It will tend to perpetuate social discontent. That danger we ought to avoid; we ought not in our schools even to run the risk of differentiating between one class of children and another. Is not the right hon. Gentleman contemplating a power of discrimination between one class and another in schools in which the fees now slightly exceed the 10s. grant. I fear that he is. He said it would be the duty of the Department to see that the sum raised by fees in the future did not exceed the sum now received over and above the 10s. fee grant. But, at the same time, he admits that the Department will not have to take cognisance of the manner in which the sum is raised, and that the managers may distribute it as they think fit, and call upon certain parents to pay higher fees. This, I repeat, will result in certain children being subjected to the social stigma of pauperism. I press this Amendment most earnestly on the right hon. Gentleman. I hope that before this Bill leaves this House he will take steps to ensure that in the large towns school managers shall be compelled to place free schools in different parts, and give reasonable accessibility to them to those who desire it. As to the rural districts in cases in which the fees have in the past exceeded the 10s., I hope he will provide a means of preventing a discrimination between the children of poor parents and those who can pay a fee.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 2, at end, to add "Provided also, that for the purposes of this Act it shall not be held that sufficient public school accommodation without payment of fees has been provided where a portion only of the school places in any school are made free."—(Mr. Channing.)

(8.25.) SIR W. HART DYKE: Surely the hon. Member does not expect me to accept this Amendment. The result of doing so would be to destroy the whole framework of the Bill. It is essential that managers should have power to discriminate between the children, because it would be most unfair that a district where there are only 15 children whose parents desire free education should be put to the expense of providing free education for the whole of the children whose parents are able and willing to pay for them. The idea that any stigma of pauperism will attach to children who receive free education is absurd.

SIR L. PLAYFAIR: I hope that the hon. Member will not press his Amendment to a Division, but will be satisfied with having expressed his view that in large towns, at all events, there ought to be no discrimination made between the children in a school. In that proposition I am disposed to agree. I admit that there would be a great deal of difficulty in carrying out that proposal in the rural parishes. I should like to obtain from the Vice President an assurance that he intends to introduce a clause repealing the necessity for applying to the Guardians for the remission of fees, for, as long as that remains, the stigma of poverty will apply to those who have to so apply.

SIR W. HART DYKE: The right hon. Gentleman must see that we must, first of all, decide the actual interval. Then this point can very well be dealt with in the Schedule of the Bill.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I have heard with very great regret the decision of the Government. Scotland possesses universal School Boards and free education, and we in England ought to have a system which would prevent differentiating between various classes of children.

The very words the right hon. Gentleman has just used indicate clearly what will be the position of the poor people in the agricultural parishes. There are to be free places for the children of those parents who cannot pay fees. By this Bill you will really fix the stigma upon those parents, not only of inability, but of unwillingness, to meet the demand made by the managers of these schools. The measure of the Government, after all the professions that have been made on its behalf, really casts free education to the winds. I am quite satisfied that the sectarian schools in the towns must so accommodate themselves as to have free schools in every populous locality, but my anxiety is really for the 10,000 agricultural parishes where there is to be set up by this Bill a system of ticketing of the different classes in the same school—some children will pay nothing, others will pay a small fee, and others a higher fee. I am satisfied that in the interest of the schools themselves right hon. Gentlemen have made a serious mistake. This provision must create a deep sense of wrong, humiliation, and dissatisfaction, and that will simmer, and when a General Election comes I suppose the public in the rural districts will understand what it is that is being given to them—that a dole is really being given to them. We shall not hesitate to let the country understand that whereas this Parliament has given to Scotland a system of universal School Boards, it has withheld it from England, and placed a stigma upon the parents who cannot afford to pay school fees for their children. I am persuaded great injury will be done not only to the elementary education, system of this country, but also to what are known as voluntary schools.

*MR. H. J. WILSON: The Vice President objected to the statement that there will, by this clause, be set up in the schools a pauper distinction. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman knows that something of the kind exists at the present time, and that children are divided into two classes, those who pay and those whose fees are remitted. During the recent elections in the rural districts the barn doors were placarded in all directions with statements as to what the Government was going to do for the people; but now we find a good deal of all that was a delusion, and we now understand that distinctions which have hitherto prevailed are going to be maintained.

*(8.36.) MR. ROBY: Nothing could be more painful than some of the distinctions which were formerly set up in schools. I knew of one school in Yorkshire in which there were free scholars and paying scholars. The free scholars were put on one side of a partition and the paying scholars on the other, the master from his high desk being able to overlook the two bodies of children. The general terms applied to the two classes of children were sheep and goats. That is not so likely to occur in future, but hon. Members must remember that this Bill really provides for the admission of free scholars into a practically fee-paying school: free scholars can come in, as I understand, more or less as paupers. If the Vice President cannot make any provision of the nature indicated in the proposed Amendment I hope he will instruct his Inspectors to see that in the schools in which free places only are given no kind of invidious distinction shall be maintained or imposed.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: Let me point out to hon. Members that this Bill entirely alters all the circumstances by putting the children on the same level. No one child can say to another, "You are paid for and I am not," because the Government Grant of 10s. will pay for each—every child will be the recipient of State bounty.

(8.40.) MR. ILLINGWORTH: Let us take the case of a parish where there is only one school, where there are very few children for whom free places will be provided, where some of the children will be fee-paying children. There will be set up every week, by the bringing of fees in the hands of the majority of children, a pauperising stigma, a ticketing of the children who enter the school free. I cannot conceive a child placed in these circumstances who must not every day of his life realise the inferior position in which he is placed. On the other hand, suppose that a great majority of the places are made free in order to meet the poverty of the great majority of the parents. You will have a small selected fee-paying class. Does anyone believe that this small superior, or fee-paying, class will not be regarded as the first class in the school, to the infinite injury of the common life of the school? It is evident that Government have moved in this matter to save the voluntary schools from other changes which are impending. (8.42.)

(9.15.) MR. ROWNTREE: I wished to ask a question of the Vice President of the Council, but the right hon. Gentleman is not in his place.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present, (9.18.) MR. ROWNTREE: I am sorry if I have been the occasion of bringing the right hon. Gentleman back prematurely, but I wish to ask him a question in reference to some words used by him in reply to my hon. Friend, which may be somewhat misunderstood. The right hon. Gentleman in the course of his remarks said the Bill retains to managers the power of discrimination they now possess; and as the discussion was upon the question of procedure for the remission of fees, I think an impression was created that there might be a certain power of discrimination with managers as to free entrance to schools.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: No; I did in discussion use the word discrimination, but I was then following the line of argument of the hon. Member, and the word was used in relation to the different grades of fees, and I said it was desirable to retain that system. The discrimination I referred to was as between fee and fee, not as to any discrimination managers might exercise in regard to the allotment of free places.

*(9.20.) MR. CHANNING: I only wish to say why I think I must take a Division. The power of differentiating classes by fees is frequently made the means of excluding certain classes of children from a school, but that is not the point to which I attach the greatest importance. The power of going behind and considering whether parents are suitable persons to have for their children free places in a school is a power that may be used as a means of coercion and oppression in rural parishes where clergymen have the management of voluntary schools. I feel it my duty to press the Amendment to a Division.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to

Clause 4 omitted.

Clauses 5 and 6 agreed to

Clause 7.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 16, leave out from "the expression 'fee,'" to "on their behalf and," in line 19, both inclusive.—(Sir W. Hart Dyke.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 22, at end, add "and the expression 'average attendance' shall, for the purposes of the fee grant, mean average attendance calculated in accordance with the said minutes."—(Sir W. Hart Dyke.)

(9.25.) MR. MUNDELLA: This, I think, has reference to half-time attendance. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman what, under the Amendment, will be the amount of the fee grant in respect to half-time, whether it is to be in excess of the 10s., and, if so, how much—how much will be the demand of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for freeing the half-time schools, and why he introduces the fee grant in the case of half-time?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: This is introduced to meet what we consider the fair demand made by hon. Members behind me in respect to half-time scholars. It has been pointed out that the Bill as now drawn operates to place half-timers at a disadvantage, and this Amendment is proposed in order that half-time scholars may be on the same level with full-time attendance in regard to the fee grant as well as the ordinary Parliamentary grant. We believe that this proposal meets all requirements. We take the half-time attendance, and adding thereto 50 per cent., give a fee grant of 7s. 6d.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Half-timers are to receive 7s. 6d. instead of 10s., and

I am very much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the change. I think it must have been contemplated in the original draft of the Bill. I confess I have some regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not seen his way to go a step further. The half-time scholar is practically equal to the full-time scholar, and learns quite as much or very nearly as much in the half-time attendance as the full-time scholar does in full-time attendance, and the same appliances and teaching staff are required for the half-time scholars. It is much to be regretted that half-time is not placed on the same footing as full-time, receiving the 10s. grant instead of 7s. 6d. I do not think the distinction made merely because of attendance half or full-time is one that can be justified. It will be felt as a grievance in the schools in the North where the half-time system prevails, and I confess I do not altogether abandon the hope that before Report stage is passed the Government will take a further step and consent to the half-timers being placed in exactly the same position as full-time scholars as regards the fee grant.

*MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): In my opinion, the Government have made a fair and indeed a liberal offer in regard to half-time, but already the noble Lord is asking for more. It seems very difficult to satisfy the demands of the noble Lord. For my own part, I think the half-time schools deserve liberal treatment, and I am thankful to the right hon. Gentleman for having made this concession. I, for one, should very strongly object to their going any further in that direction.

*(9.30.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I hope my right hon. Friend will allow me to thank him for the concession he has made in favour of the half-timers. I can assure him that the subject has been discussed with great anxiety in our manufacturing districts, because we felt that the Bill as it stood contained a defect. I have received a communication from the borough of Wigan from which I find that the half-timer and the full-timer in many of our voluntary schools pay the same fee. The concession made by the Government will, however, not quite meet the case, and I hope that the matter will be fully considered before the Report.

*MR. AINSLIE (Lancashire, N. Lonsdale): I would appeal to my noble Friend (Viscount Cranborne) to give way on this point. The Government have made so many concessions that those of us who have been strong supporters of the voluntary systems are content now to leave the matter in their hands. I feel sure that those whose children are going to be relieved by the operation of this Bill will themselves support the Government, and I would appeal to Lancashire Members to put their shoulders to the wheel rather than their backs to the wall.

(9.33.) MR. MUNDELLA: I cannot allow these words to be added without making some reasonable protest in the interest of economy. The Government have made many concessions on this Bill, but I think the most gratuitous and extravagant has been on this question of half-time. We have always allowed that half-time counts for two attendances. It is only fair that should be so, because there is great difficulty in teaching the half-timers and in keeping them at all within reach of the ordinary full-time children. There is no doubt that nothing adds so much to the laboriousness of the teacher's work as having in his school a number of half-timers, and there can be no doubt that the half-timers do not keep abreast of the full-timers. [Viscount CRANBORNE: Yes.] The noble Lord contradicts all experience and all the common sense of the case. He appears to out-Herod Herod in this matter. It is fair to make some recognition of the labour the teacher has to go through in instructing half-timers. That is done by making an allowance on the attendance. Now you are going to make it on the fees also. In the Bill as it stood the Government dealt with half-timers—that is to say, they provided that two attendances should count for 10s. But there is a system which has grown up in Lancashire of charging half-timers extravagantly. If the conditions in the rich manufacturing districts of the North are compared with the conditions in the South, where the landed gentry contribute largely to the schools, the comparison is, in respect of fees, all in favour of the South. In order to satisfy the Lancashire discontent—which is not creditable to some of the Lancashire Members—the Government is now giving 10s. for the attendance of full-timers, and 7s. 6d. for half-timers. This is an extravagant fee grant, and will only tend to the multiplication of half-timers. I am not going to divide the Committee against it, because I know the Government would beat us, and I do not want to waste time, but I do enter my solemn protest, first against the extravagant charges with regard to half-timers, and next to the Government giving £22,000 or £25,000 additional grant by this Amendment. Happily we are indebted to some gentlemen in this House for having reduced by one-third the period of half-time. I hope, for my own part, we shall get rid of the other two-thirds some day.

* (9.39.) MR. TOMLINSON: It does not seem to me that the speech just delivered is particularly relevant to the question before the Committee; but, as to the abolition of half-timers, I should like the right hon. Gentleman to come to Lancashire and make such a proposal. I wish to thank the Government for the concession they have made to us.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I would make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman whether, in consideration of this great concession made to half-time scholars, he will not consider the desirability of compelling schools to take half-time children at reasonable fees?

*MR. F. S. POWELL: It is only fair to my North Country friends to remind the right hon. Gentleman opposite that equal payment for full-timers and half-timers prevails under the School Board of Bradford. I have just learnt that in voluntary schools at that place the half-time scholars only pay half fees.

Question, "That Clause 7 stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clause 9.

* (9.42.) MR. TALBOT: I beg to move to omit "September" and insert "November." As the Bill will not become law before the end of July, and as the month of August is a recognised holiday month, the managers of schools will not have proper time to make arrangements for availing themselves of the Act by the 1st of September. On the Treasury Bench this question is mixed up with financial matters, but I do not know why the Opposition should wish to rush the Bill through the House in this absolutely unprecedented manner. [Opposition cries of "Oh!"] No Bill of similar magnitude has ever been passed at such a speed. There can be no great necessity for hurrying on the operation of the Bill. What can it matter to hon. Members opposite whether the Bill comes into operation in September or in November? Do they imagine it will become unpopular in the interval? [Laughter.] Though my own fears are greater than my hopes, I am only proposing this Amendment with a view to secure the easy working of the proposed new arrangements.

(9.45.) Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 27, to leave out "September," and insert "November."—(Mr. Talbot.)

Question proposed, "That 'September' stand part of the Clause."

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): Although I have given notice of an Amendment to substitute January for September I support the Amendment in the interests of large districts. The proposal of the Bill will be all very well for some districts, but in many suburban districts where there will be a large amount of grouping there must be careful consideration before the Bill can be satisfactorily put into operation. To my mind six months would be none too long for the arrangements managers have to make. At all events, my hon. Friend's Amendment is necessary, because August is the general holiday month, in which it will be difficult to get managers together. In large urban districts, such as Liverpool, there will have to be grouping of schools, and the best way of meeting the Bill will be to arrange which shall be free schools and which graded schools, but these arrangements cannot be made hurriedly, and therefore the Amendment before the Committee is a reasonable one.

I am very much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the change. I think it must have been contemplated in the original draft of the Bill. I confess I have some regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not seen his way to go a step further. The half-time scholar is practically equal to the full-time scholar, and learns quite as much or very nearly as much in the half-time attendance as the full-time scholar does in full-time attendance, and the same appliances and teaching staff are required for the half-time scholars. * (9.42.) MR. TALBOT: I beg to move to omit "September" and insert "November." As the Bill will not become law before the end of July, and as the month of August is a recognised holiday month, the managers of schools will not have proper time to make arrangements for availing themselves of the Act by the 1st of September. On the Treasury Bench this question is mixed up with financial matters, but I do not know why the Opposition should wish to rush the Bill through the House in this absolutely unprecedented manner. [Opposition cries of "Oh!"] No Bill of similar magnitude has ever been passed at such a speed. There can be no great necessity for hurrying on the operation of the Bill. What can it matter to hon. Members opposite whether the Bill comes into operation in September or in November? Do they imagine it will become unpopular in the interval? [Laughter.] Though my own fears are greater than my hopes, I am only proposing this Amendment with a view to secure the easy working of the proposed new arrangements.

(9.45.) Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 27, to leave out "September," and insert "November."—(Mr. Talbot.)

Question proposed, "That 'September' stand part of the Clause."

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): Although I have given notice of an Amendment to substitute January for September I support the Amendment in the interests of large districts. The proposal of the Bill will be all very well for some districts, but in many suburban districts where there will be a large amount of grouping there must be careful consideration before the Bill can be satisfactorily put into operation. To my mind six months would be none too long for the arrangements managers have to make. At all events, my hon. Friend's Amendment is necessary, because August is the general holiday month, in which it will be difficult to get managers together. In large urban districts, such as Liverpool, there will have to be grouping of schools, and the best way of meeting the Bill will be to arrange which shall be free schools and which graded schools, but these arrangements cannot be made hurriedly, and therefore the Amendment before the Committee is a reasonable one.

(9.49.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): The reason for this Amendment is simply this; that we want our constituents to have the benefit of this legislation at once. The country is expecting this benevolent legislation to come into operation from the end of the school year, which terminates on the 31st of August, and all the Opposition desire is to see the original suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer carried out, and elementary instruction made free as soon as possible in the majority of elementary schools. As to time being given for the necessary arrangements to be made, in many districts there will be 12 months allowed, but under the Bill as it stands, the Act will come into operation at once. The people have a right to ask that now that Parliament has decided to give them this boon there should be no delay in allowing them the benefit of it.

*(9.52.) SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I hope that under no consideration will the Government accept this Amendment. There is a very strong feeling that the sooner this measure comes into operation the better. If it were possible I would say the 15th of August, instead of the 1st of September. I regret the line some Lancashire Members have taken in connection with this Bill—offering opposition in so many ways. I trust the House and the Committee on this and the further stages will take every necessary means to facilitate the progress of this most useful and popular measure.

MR. PICTON: The hon. Member for the University of Oxford has said it would not matter to us on this side of the House whether the date were September or November; but I would tell him that it matters a great deal to the parents of the children in our elementary schools. The school fees between September and November will average about 2s. for each child. If there are three children going to school, the fees will amount to 6s. The amount which would be paid by the parents would be one-sixth of the annual fees, or close upon £400,000. The Amendment would deprive the parents of this large sum and cause them grievous disappointment. It would be breaking faith with them.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I hope Her Majesty's Government will not accede to this Amendment. I think the least we can expect is that the Government should keep the promise they have made to the public outside. The hon. Member for the University of Oxford seems surprised that we should be in such a hurry to get the Bill through, but our answer to him is that we believe in free education, and want to see it enjoyed by the people as soon as possible. We shall support the Government in carrying the Bill through.

*(9.55.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid the Government cannot make the proposed change. They can hardly go back upon what they have proposed. I believe that from this time forward the managers of the schools that will be affected will see that it is necessary to make the arrangements that will be required on the 1st of September, and long before the holiday month of August they will have completed their arrangements. If I could meet the views of my hon. Friend I should be glad, but, looking at the engagements of the Government, I cannot do so.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 agreed to.

*(9.57.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR: I beg to move the insertion of the following clause after Clause 2:—

"It shall be the duty of the Education Department to secure, by provisions in the Code and by instructions to the Inspectors, that in the case of any school partly supported by rates or voluntary subscriptions or endowments, where the fee grant exceeds the total previous fee income of the school, such surplus (unless the Education Department certify that the expenditure is not necessary or inexpedient) shall, in the first instance, be expended by the School Board or school managers of such school in the improvement of the school accommodation, or in promoting increased efficiency of education under the conditions of the Code; provided, in the case of any school which is wholly supported by grants from the Education Department, or where the rates or subscriptions and endowment together do not amount to 5s. per scholar in average attendance, then the whole of such surplus shall be applied for the purposes aforesaid, and it shall be the duty of the Education Department to secure such application."

This clause deals impartially with Board schools and voluntary schools, and it is limited to schools in which the fee grant exceeds the previous fee income. I wish to appeal to hon. Members opposite to believe that I am acting in absolute fairness with regard to voluntary schools and Board schools. They are both part of the educational system of this country. The Board schools carry on their work with great advantage to the people over whom they have control in regard to educational matters, and the voluntary schools exercise a large and useful influence, and I do not wish to show any partiality to the one class or the other in this clause. We are giving this fee grant for the purpose of cheapening education, and making it better than it has been. We hope that more and more scholars will reach the higher standards of the Code. There are degrees of efficiency. For example, the principal grant under the Code is 14s. 6d. in the best schools, and 12s. 6d. in others. The first part of the new clause deals with Board schools and voluntary schools in the same sense. Some School Boards draw liberally from the rates for the cheapening of education. In Birmingham, for instance, the fees average 5s. 7d., and the difference is made up from the rates. In Somerset the subscriptions have been large and the fees low, and when the subscribers have been giving large subscriptions, and the fees have been low, and the schools have been efficient, they have quite as much right to be considered with reference to the surplus as the schools in Birmingham, in which the fees have been kept low at the expense of the rates. The first part of my clause deals, practically, equally with both classes of schools. Subscribers have as much as ratepayers to be considered with reference to the surplus of the fee grant over the fees, and it is equally right to use the fee grants in reduction of subscriptions as in reduction of rates. I do not believe that in either case they will do it, because they will prefer to advance the character of the education by the use of the surplus. If the schools are efficient they have the right, if they choose to exercise it, to diminish the rates or to diminish the subscriptions. I have said in the first instance that efficiency shall be secured. Suppose there are half-a-dozen schools in Birmingham that are not efficient. I say their surplus shall first be applied to secure efficiency, and having secured efficiency to the satisfaction of the Education Department, they may use the surplus either in the reduction of the rates or reduction of the subscriptions. I think that the managers of both voluntary and Board schools will admit that that is absolutely fair. The second part of my Amendment says that where there are no subscriptions the surplus shall be wholly applied to increase the efficiency of the school. There are 1,176 schools in the country which have no subscriptions at all. In future the fees are to be paid by the State. The schools cease in every sense to be voluntary schools, they are purely State schools, and it is surely right under these circumstances that any surplus there may be shall be used to promote the efficiency of the school. My right hon. Friend will agree with me that all schools are not efficient. In all probability the teachers in the 1,176 schools which receive no subscriptions the teachers are badly paid and are of an inferior class. I wish that any surplus may be used in obtaining more efficient teachers, a better system of teaching, and better school appliances. The hon. Member for Stockport said to me to-day that in my speech on the Second Reading of the Bill I spoke of the building of voluntary schools as an interesting historical reminiscence. I repeat that the building of such schools is an interesting historical reminiscence, and contend that it is the present participation of such schools in the act of education which makes them alone have a claim to be considered as voluntary schools in the future. How can the 1,176 schools be considered voluntary establishments? For their own sake, and in order that they may be useful to the education of the country, I ask that any surplus there may be shall in the first place be used in increasing the efficiency of the schools. Hon. Members know there are means of getting teachers cheaply. Some teachers do other things beside teach; they become the organist of the church, and in this way diminish the charge on the school. I desire it to be enacted that all the money shall be used for education. Up to that point I think all will agree with me. If you do not make this enactment, the voluntary schools that have no subscriptions will become the butt of every person who wants a Board School: he will say they are not voluntary schools at all. What is a voluntary school? I will read the remarks the Lord President made on the subject to a deputation from the Church School Association which waited on him two days ago. Lord Cranbrook said—

“The Royal Commission, you will remember, said, in one of its recommendations, that voluntary management was only excusable on the ground that people paid subscriptions.”

But here are 1,176 schools that have no subscriptions at all. If you wish to keep them as voluntary schools you will, at all events, agree to that part of my clause which provides that any surplus shall be employed in improving the efficiency of the schools. There may be a difference of opinion as to the third branch of my clause, but if the Government refuse to accept it, I believe they will do much injury to the voluntary schools. I do not want to intensify the isolation of voluntary schools from the people, but you will intensify it if you allow a number of voluntary schools to pay back the subscriptions out of the surplus income. There are a great many schools in the country the subscriptions to which amount to 1s., 2s., 3s., or 5s., and which will be paid back out of the surplus, unless we provide against it. In the Second Reading I pointed out that there are 129 schools in Wales which will be able to dispense with all subscriptions. If they used the surplus, which they can do, for paying back all the subscriptions, they will place themselves in the position of the 1,176 schools I have spoken of, that is to say, they will become purely State schools. There will be great danger to the voluntary schools if subscriptions are repaid out of the surplus. There will be a sham voluntaryism about the schools, for they will take public money and make no effort to fulfil the obligations which the receipt of the money entails.

Sir L. Playfair

Not only will there be great danger to the voluntary schools, but to the Church establishment also. Their enemies will point to the fact that there are in the country schools belonging to the Church of England that practically have no subscriptions, and yet claim their existence as a preserve of the Church. In the third part of my clause I prescribe that if the subscriptions do not amount to 5s. per scholar, any surplus shall be used for the purpose of improving the efficiency of the education. I commend the clause to the Committee, again assuring hon. Members opposite that I have tried to construct it with perfect fairness towards the School Boards and the voluntary schools. I believe that it will increase the efficiency of education in both, and that it will operate really to the advantage of the voluntary schools.

New Clause—[Fee Grant (surplus),]—(Sir Lyon Playfair,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

*(10.15.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I fully recognise the fair and impartial spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman has moved the new clause, but I shall endeavour to show that the Government will be perfectly consistent in refusing to accept it. The right hon. Gentleman has justly remarked that there are in regard to certain schools two different kinds of efficiency, and I am not disposed to differ with him in contending that, in cases where considerable sacrifices have been made by the ratepayers or by subscribers in the cause of education, and where the schools in such cases are efficient, it is only fair that those ratepayers or subscribers shall receive some relief. The right hon. Gentleman then passed on to deal with a class of schools which are not so efficient, and he fairly urged that some security should be given that in such schools, where the grant of 10s. is in excess of the fees charged up to a certain date, the surplus shall be devoted to increased school efficiency, and shall not go into the pockets of the subscribers. With this object the right hon. Gentleman has moved a clause at the outset of which he lays down that it shall be the duty of the Education Department to secure the object in view by provisions in the Code. But I appeal to the Committee whether it is necessary that such words should be inserted in the Bill at all. The Code is in the hands of the Department; it is the one and only instrument by which it can carry out the object desired, and by which efficiency can be secured, and I submit that if we put a dozen new clauses of this nature in the Bill, not one of them can be more operative or impose greater responsibility than the Code does at present. The demands of the new Code of 1890 are most explicit, and it is impossible by inserting any such clause as this in any Act to impose heavier responsibility than is now laid by the Code on the Education Department. The Code lays down distinctly that the schools must be efficient, and with regard to those schools to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, in connection with which there are no subscriptions, and which are not efficient, every farthing of the extra grant, under the proposals of the Government, will have to go to the improvement of the schools. And if no improvement is forthcoming in a certain time, the schools will be held to be inefficient. The Inspectors will report on them, and the result will be that on the report of inefficiency the penal provision of the Code will be at once brought into operation against them. I venture to urge, therefore, that the whole of the machinery of the proposed new clause now exists in the Code of 1890, and that no addition to this or any other Bill can make the Code more explicit in regard to the demands which shall be made on all the schools referred to. In these circumstances the Government cannot accept the new clause.

*(10.25.) MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): As I was the first person to put down this Amendment, and as the right hon. Gentleman was not in a position to give me an answer the other day, I think I have a right to ask him for an answer now on the principle of my new clause, as well as on that contained in the clause of the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for South Leeds. The object aimed at by both of us is the same, and the form in which we get this concession, if we are to get it, is comparatively immaterial. We are both anxious to see that by express enactment on the face of the Bill this surplus money shall be devoted to the cause of education, and I am all the more anxious for it as a friend and supporter of the voluntary system. I also foresee the danger to which the right hon. Gentleman who moved the clause referred—and I regard it as a real danger—that if in consequence of the Bill the subscriptions of the voluntary schools materially fall off, as I believe they will in some parts of the country, the voluntary schools will greatly suffer thereby. If the principle of the new clause is met by the Code—if, as the Vice President has said, every farthing of the surplus must go to increase the efficiency of the class of schools in question, what valid objection can there be to declare it on the face of the Bill? I believe that the presence in the Bill of such an express provision will, in numerous cases, be a guide and an assistance to the school managers, and will greatly strengthen their hands against the subscribers. It is not, in my opinion, sufficient—it is not at least so satisfactory—to provide generally that the money shall be expended under the regulations of some future Code. Let the managers of the country schools know how they ought, in the opinion of the Education Department, to spend the money, and there will be much less danger of its being wasted, and of the voluntary schools in the southern portions of the Kingdom being placed in a worse position than at present.

*(10.30.) SIR WALTER FOSTER: I have upon the Paper a notice of a clause expressing very much the same views as those expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds, and the hon. Member who has just spoken, and I have been induced to put down that Amendment, not only with the desire that the surplus should be applied to increasing the efficiency of the schools, but that in certain cases, and especially in rural districts, we should have the surplus applied to increasing the healthiness of the schools. In various parts of rural England this 10s. grant will exceed the amount of the fee income, and surely it is to the public interest that in passing such a measure as this there should be a distinct expression of the will of Parliament as to how the surplus should be applied. It will be desirable in some cases that the surplus should be applied to increasing the efficiency of teaching or curriculum, but there are a great number of schools in a condition far from satisfactory in a sanitary point of view: the schoolrooms and buildings being old and dilapidated, and the ventilation and sanitary arrangements being exceedingly bad. On a former occasion when I referred to this subject an hon. Member mentioned to me an instance of a school with 300 scholars where there was no sanitary convenience whatever, but this has since been altered by the action of the Inspectors under the new Code; but the Inspectors in many instances are exceedingly tender in reporting upon deficiencies in this respect, because they are anxious to avoid the closing of a school by their interference. They regard the sanitary deficiencies as a less evil than the loss to education from closing a school for not meeting the necessary requirements of construction. Some 12 months ago I brought before the House, by reference to a very graphic Report of the conditions of things in certain villages in Buckinghamshire, instances of schools in the most deplorable condition as regards sanitary arrangements, and now that school managers are about to receive a large increase of income, it is essential that Parliament should take security that the surplus shall be applied to remedying a state of things nothing less than disgraceful. In North Bucks I gave an instance in the village of Thornborough of a school with 86 children. The school will receive £43 under this grant, and this will be an excess of more than £20 over the fee income and of £7 over the total income from fees and subscriptions. In this school there is only one place provided for the natural convenience of children of both sexes, and this is a condition of affairs incompatible with ordinary decency among the children. Such cases as these I want specially brought under the notice of the Department, and I urge the Vice President to consider some such clause as this, which shall force the Inspectors to take notice of these matters and have these evils corrected without delay. At Twyford, again, in the same county, there is a school of 96 scholars with the sanitary arrangements so bad that the foul gas from a cesspool finds its way into the schoolroom, typhoid fever continually exists among the people, and the death rate among children is higher than in other rural districts, and even in large towns. Such a condition of things is bad for the educational interest of the people, bad for morality and decency, and for the physique of the rising generation; and I say we have no right to drive children into schoolrooms which are death-traps. Where we insist on attendance at school that the children may be educated for after life, we should equally insist that their health is not impaired in the process. At Padbury, in the same county, there is a school with 56 children who are allowed to take water to drink from a pump within 10 yards of a cesspool; at Maids Moreton, again, similar conditions exist, and in too many of our rural districts there is a condition of things disgraceful from a sanitary point of view, and which we should take the opportunity of this grant to at once put an end to. If we place in the Bill some such clause as this proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds, or the clause of the hon. Member for Somerset (Mr. Hobhouse), or that in a shorter form of which I have given notice, we should go far to make such a state of things impossible, by making it an imperative duty of Inspectors to report to the Education Department, and of the Education Department to see that the surplus of this grant is applied in the direction indicated. I make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman again to re-consider his position on this point with a view of making this Bill, which will shortly become an Act, as efficient as we can make it for improving not only the education of the children, but the conditions under which that education is carried on.

(10.37). MR. A. DYKE ACLAND: The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President when first he spoke upon the Bill pledged himself to the position that under this grant the education given in the country schools should be improved, and now we ask him to carry out his pledge and secure that his well-meant intentions shall be carried out. I confess that after hearing the words the right hon. Gentleman used, most of us looked forward hopefully to the result, and it is a great disappointment to find him refusing to insert words which would ensure that the surplus of this money should really be applied to improvements in education. I must say that in Wales, where I have knowledge of the popular feeling, this refusal of the Government to accept this clause will do much to increase the agitation against voluntary schools, because it will be recognised that a large surplus of some £10,000 or £15,000 will be directly given to voluntary schools without any instruction in the Bill that it shall be devoted to education. For my own part I prefer the words of the clause of the hon. Member for Somerset, because it gives a very wide definition of the various ways in which the money should be used not relying upon the Code and the instructions to Inspectors which the Vice President so often speaks about, but giving a clear indication by statutory enactment. By way of illustration I take a case that is within my own knowledge of a school in Wales, managed by the clergy in the midst of a Nonconformist population. The increase of the efficiency of the school was recognised as a necessity, and a voluntary rate was agreed upon to supplement the subscriptions. In the result £50 a year was the amount raised by the clergyman and his friends on the one part, and by the farmers on the other, in about equal proportion. Now, with the surplus this grant will provide, there will be a temptation to the one party or the other to withdraw their support, and no instructions to the Inspectors will ever get the money back again. But if such a clause as this were in the Act the Inspector could say to the managers of the school: "Bear in mind you have now £25 additional money which you must use for the benefit of the school," and the managers would take heed and do this, for if they did not the Inspector would report to the Department. In this particular school we were able to do something to improve the efficiency, but not all that was required. We were able to raise the miserable pittance of the teacher from £25 to £30 for instance; but without the clause there will be the greatest danger of the surplus being treated as a relief to the rate of subscriptions. I venture yet to hope that something may be done in the Bill itself which will have far greater effect than Code or instructions. When this question was raised at an earlier stage of the Bill, something was said about School Boards, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham said it would be reasonable that in such places as Birmingham, where the rate-payers had largely contributed towards the efficiency of the schools, the surplus of the grant should return to the rate-payers, but I am glad to see that the Birmingham Board have, by a majority of 7 to 2, adopted a resolution that the grant should go towards increasing efficiency, and they have expressed an opinion that the Bill should be amended to provide that managers should devote the surplus that the fee grant would give to improvement in building, teaching appliances, and staff until the schools could be said to be in perfect order. I feel convinced in my own mind that if nothing is done on this occasion we shall, especially in Wales, give force to the cry that we are endowing the Church through the Church schools. We have now an opportunity, which seems to me to be a fair one, of dealing with the question by labelling this money, and I cannot understand why we should not remove the grievance.

(10.46.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): There seems to be no difference of opinion as regards intention; but there is a difference of opinion as regards procedure. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down went so far as to say that if we confine ourselves to the Code and instructions to Inspectors as to efficiency, we shall, practically, give no effect to the Act, but if, on the other hand, we only insert a clause in the Act, we shall attain all the objects we have in view.

MR. A. DYKE ACLAND: No: I did not say that.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Something to that effect, or I do not quite understand the position of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. A. DYKE ACLAND: My point is this, that with such a clause, which Inspectors would be bound to bring to the notice of School Boards and managers, our intention would be more effectually carried out.

LORD G. HAMILTON: That gives me exactly what I wanted. The argument applies to only a certain class of schools where there is a surplus. Now, I have listened for many years to Education Debates in this House while I held a responsible position in the Education Department, and since, and I have noticed one peculiarity of those Debates, that the educationists who take part in them become so absorbed in the idea of the moment that they lose sight of all other questions, and thus it comes to pass that, in the course of 24 hours, arguments most inconsistent are used in support of successive Amendments. Now, the one statement of fact upon which I think there has been no difference of opinion expressed is that education is not regulated by the fees paid. It has been repeated again and again in reference to the fees paid in the schools in Lancashire and elsewhere, that the education is not the better because the fees are high, but that with high fees the education is frequently inefficient. It is a main argument then that high fees do not necessarily mean good education, but on the contrary, they are frequently associated with inefficient education.

MR. MUNDELLA: There may be low subscriptions.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I am talking only of fees. On the other hand, hon. Members have said education has been most efficient where fees are low.

An hon. MEMBER: And subscriptions high.

LORD G. HAMILTON: But what I am saying has nothing to do with subscriptions. I leave out the question of subscriptions. I am dealing only with the question of fees. I say the proposition laid down night after night has been this, that education is not regulated by fees, that where fees are high education is often inefficient, and where fees are low an efficient education is often given. Now, that being admitted, will hon. Members look at the clauses which have been placed upon the Paper by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds—both of whom have filled the office of Vice President of the Council—and by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Ilkeston Division. All these clauses have the same fatal administrative flaw, for they propose for the first time to lay down the proposition that where fees are low a higher test is to be applied than where the fees are high. ["No!"] Surely hon. Gentlemen do not understand the consequences of these clauses. I think I can demonstrate this. What is the proposition they advance? A certain test is to be applied where the fee grant is in excess of the fees now raised; therefore the clause moved would apply only to schools in which the fee is below 3d. That is undoubtedly what is proposed, and so, according to the argument which has so often been insisted upon, this test is to be applied only to schools which are most efficient. ["No, no!"] What, then, becomes of the argument that the fee does not regulate the education and that education is frequently more efficient where the fees are low? Again, let me remind the Committee that early in our discussions a considerable amount of time was occupied by hon. Members in showing that the one thing needed to improve education was to multiply Local Authorities, and that being proved to the satisfaction of hon. Gentlemen opposite, but defeated in the House, we have now a proposition that the opinion of the Local Authority is to be overridden and set aside by Parliamentary decree. For days past it has been urged that high fees are associated with inefficient education. ["No, no!"] Yes, I have heard it said over and over again by way of taunt to my hon. Friends behind me who have stood up in defence of the Northern schools where fees are high. But now a clause is proposed making the fee and not the efficiency a test, bringing the low fee school within the test, leaving the high fees above 3d.

outside. How can hon. Members support a clause which will have this effect? The test after all should be the result of examination, and what has hitherto regulated the conduct of the Inspectors and the action of the Department is not the amount of fees paid but the efficiency. But you would now absolutely put aside the efficiency of a school, and you say—

“What hereafter is to regulate the conduct of Inspectors is not so much the efficiency of the school as the amount paid in fees.”

Now, let me give an illustration. Hon. Members who have experience of such matters in rural districts will know that often there is an efficient school in one parish with low fees, and in the adjoining parish an inefficient school with high fees. To this efficient school, because the fees are low, the grant will give a surplus and this clause would apply, but because the grant is not in excess of the fees in the other case the school would be exempt from the operation of the clause. As a means of increasing efficiency where that is most needed the clause is obviously defective. It is evident you are proposing to introduce a new definition of efficiency which practically would be fatal to the efficiency of our whole system of primary education. Though I argue against the right hon. Gentleman's clause I sympathise with his twofold object to increase efficiency and not to check subscriptions. I have shown that the clause will not promote efficiency, and what is likely to be its effect upon subscriptions? The effect will be to penalise those schools according to the idiosyncracies of Inspectors where subscriptions are low.

*SIR L. PLAYFAIR: If the noble Lord refers to my clause he will see that the first part refers to the excess of the fee grant over the fee income, and that the sanction of the Department shall be required before such is used for the reduction of rates or giving back subscriptions.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I think I have shown that the proposition is one it is impossible for a Government administratively responsible to accept. We, however, quite sympathise with the object, and we have considered whether it would be better to adopt any part of the clause or to fall back upon the Code, and I unhesitatingly advise the Committee to rely upon the Code. It is clear that when four hon. and right hon. Gentlemen have ineffectually endeavoured to frame a clause to give effect to their desire, there is great difficulty in framing such a clause as will meet the different conditions of schools. We shall find a readier method under the Code, and it will be the duty of Inspectors to enforce compliance with instructions under it. One of the instructions is, that in the case of any less efficient school, unless an improvement takes place, the whole grant may be withheld, but it is necessary to give the manager of such school due warning in order that he may adapt himself to the conditions. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds asked me to deal with the question of subscriptions. I will take the case of Birmingham, which is the first big town which occurs in the list. Would it not be unjust to place Birmingham in a worse position than Bradford or Bristol? Under this clause it would be placed in such a position. It would surely be hard to say that Birmingham, because the schools are efficient, and the ratepayers tax themselves, should therefore have a further pecuniary obligation placed upon it which is not put upon others.

*SIR L. PLAYFAIR: I beg pardon. The first part of my clause is to provide for that. If the voluntary schools are efficient the surplus may, under the clause as it stands, be used for the reduction of the subscriptions, and in the case of Board schools it may be used in the reduction of the rates.

LORD G. HAMILTON: What the right hon. Gentleman provides is that where there is a surplus it shall be expended by the School Board or by the managers of the schools. The School Board of Birmingham would, therefore, be in a worse position than the School Board of Bradford, unless they can prove to the satisfaction of the Education Department that their education is efficient. But why should Birmingham, whose education is admittedly more efficient than that of Bradford, have this new test put upon it which has no relation to the efficiency of its schools, but simply to the fees paid? I do not propose to waste the time of the Committee further, but I think I have shown clearly that the propositions which have emanated from the other side of the House are propositions which are absolutely incapable of adoption, and it would be far better to fall back upon the assurance of the Government that in the Code there will be an instrument of promoting efficiency, not only in one particular class, but in every class of our elementary schools.

(11.4.) MR. MUNDELLA: I do not know whether the noble Lord contemplated that his speech would tend to shorten the Debate, but it seems to me the noble Lord has rendered it almost impossible to finish the Bill to-night. The noble Lord has ranged over the whole of the Debates of last week and has not dealt candidly with the clause before the Committee. A few nights ago the First Lord of the Treasury stated that there were two other clauses which aimed at accomplishing the same objects as the clause of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Leeds (Sir L. Playfair), and recommended the withdrawal of the clause then under discussion in order that the three clauses might be discussed together. The right hon. Gentleman rather indicated a preference for my clause. Under these circumstances I felt quite confident that one of the clauses would have been adopted by the Government. The noble Lord has spoken of the injustice which will be done to Birmingham, but the Birmingham School Board does not feel any sense of injustice, and is of opinion that the excess fees should be devoted to the improvement of education and not to the reduction of voluntary subscriptions. The noble Lord says the proper instrument for securing the application of the surplus fees to the improvement of education is the Code. But, assuming this to be so, there ought to be in the Bill an indication that it is the duty of the Department to see that the Code does secure it. There are efficient schools and efficient schools. A school may be efficient that teaches only reading, writing, and arithmetic. There are very few rural schools in England in which the excess of the grant might not advantageously be devoted to the improvement of education. Many such schools are greatly under-staffed, and it ought to appear on the face of the Code that it is the duty of the managers to devote the surplus to remedying such a defect. I believe that such a clause as I have placed upon the Paper would have the effect of maintaining the voluntary schools in a higher state of efficiency. All our contention about fees has been that the amount of the fee does not necessarily indicate the value of the education. I do hope we are not going to continue this discussion any longer. I did expect the right hon. Gentleman would for once have frankly met us, because I thought that on both sides of the House we were agreed that the money should be properly applied.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There is an agreement that the surplus shall be applied to the improvement of education, but the view of the Government is that that is better secured by means of the Code than by adopting an Amendment of this character.

*(11.13.) MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I desire to appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury with reference to the special case of Wales. I think the right hon. Gentleman has admitted that Wales has a special case on the subject of the surplus. Voluntary schools in Wales will by the Bill be rendered not only independent of school pence, but endowed with a surplus of £20,000 a year, and thus rendered independent of subscriptions also. Thus they will be in the unchecked control of their managers, who may make them more than ever nurseries of proselytism. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President has had fully in mind in the drafting of the Bill the importance of dealing perfect and even justice between voluntary schools and Board schools. There is a serious danger that unless some clause by which the surplus is specifically appropriated to education be incorporated in the Bill the relation of the voluntary to the Board schools in Wales will be disturbed in such a way as, by making the voluntary school absolutely autocratic within its sphere, seriously to injure the cause of education. In Wales the voluntary school is a Church school, and in most places it may almost be called an involuntary school. The Board schools have not, for obvious reasons, had the same chance in Wales as they have had in England. I do not desire to bring the religious question into the Debate, but there is a danger that if a measure of this kind comes into operation in Wales it will be regarded as a Party and sectarian measure, will fail of the success which everybody desires for it, and will aggravate the religious situation in Wales, which is already critical. Welshmen have not been slow to admit their obligation to the Government in the matter of education. Something has been done for higher education, and a great deal for intermediate education. The Government are now dealing with elementary education, which is really the basis of the whole system, and I hope they will place in the Bill some mandate providing that Church schools shall not be by this Bill rendered wholly independent as well of subscriptions as of fees, but shall require to maintain themselves in touch with the people, either by securing subscriptions or by giving the surplus to evening schools on advanced elementary purposes. If such a provision be adopted, there will, at any rate, be that form of popular check and relationship between the voluntary school managers and the people which the money relation naturally sets up. As things are, if you, by this large endowment of the voluntary schools of Wales, render the school managers wholly independent of any need to associate with themselves either the people or the parents, you upset the modus vivendi, which is at present barely tolerable, and run the risk of setting up a new source of irritation.

(11.20.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): This question has been argued almost entirely from the point of view of the voluntary schools, but I contend that a clause of this kind is equally necessary as regards Board schools. The practice of Board schools generally does not follow on the lines of Birmingham. In most places in the South of England it is impossible for the Board schools to get a high fee. At the same time, they keep down the rates, and can only make both ends meet by practically starving the schools. Seeing that they cannot get high fees, and that they keep down the rates at the lowest point, they have to go in for low salaries, cheap appliances, and so forth. I venture to say that there is a larger percentage of Board schools in a high state of efficiency than there is of voluntary schools, and, therefore, all the arguments made use of with regard to voluntary schools are equally applicable to the Board schools. Unless a clause of this kind is inserted there will be the same cry for economy in the Board schools as in the voluntary schools. There will probably be a bonus of 2s. or 3s. per head, and this, instead of being devoted to increasing the efficiency of the schools, will be used for the purpose of decreasing the rates. I think that on every ground, and certainly on the ground I have pointed out, a clause of this kind ought to be inserted in the Bill in order to prevent Board schools, especially in small towns, and particularly in the South of England, from applying the bonus which would fall to their share to the reduction of the rates, instead of increasing the efficiency of the schools. I think it would be better for the Government to formulate some words of their own, or else to accept the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Somersetshire, instead of going to a Division which may force them to accept the clause now under discussion. If a clause of this kind be not passed, however earnest the managers of voluntary schools may be in their desire to apply the bonus to increasing the efficiency of the schools, there would always be a suspicion that the money was devoted to relieving the subscribers.

(11.26.) MR. T. ELLIS: I am glad to see that the hon. Member for Bordesley has shown quite clearly that this Amendment will apply just as strictly to Board schools as to voluntary schools. I am glad of this, because I hold that local control is better than irresponsible control. At the same time, I admit that many School Boards are extremely lax, and willing to let popular clamour for the reduction of the rates get the better of their desire for education. The noble Lord who has recently addressed us has objected that the Amendment would involve different tests for different schools. Well, suppose we admit that it will impose stricter tests on the schools; ought it not to be the aim of the Department to raise the standard of education even in the best schools? Suppose it does inflict a more rigid test upon some schools than upon others. Is it not the aim of the Education Department to raise the level of the very best schools? Is not the right hon. Gentleman at one with the Chairman of the Birmingham School Board that the schools there are not perfect?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I described them as being not quite perfect.

MR. T. ELLIS: I will take the right hon. Gentleman's word that they are not quite perfect. I want to give him under this clause the opportunity to improve the education of Birmingham. As far as I understand, there is only one higher grade school there. The right hon. Gentleman will admit, I suppose, that Parliament is granting this money not to reduce the rates but to improve the education, and I desire to see the Act carried out in that spirit. I say it is unfair to take as your standard such perfect schools as you have in Birmingham. You ought rather to take the common average of Board and voluntary schools throughout the Kingdom; and I venture to say every Inspector will admit that there is great room for improvement in the vast majority of them. When the Government is making a grant of £2,000,000, a surplus of £20,000 over the fees now paid, is it not right to ask from the Local Authorities some quid pro quo in the form of increased efficiency? I will quote a few cases to illustrate my meaning. I am only sorry that the First Lord of the Admiralty did not deal with the concrete case brought forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham. You are about to make a gift of £20,000 over and above the fees now charged. What is to become of it? Is it to be thrown away? Is it to take the place of voluntary subscriptions, or to go to the reduction of the rates? Parliament never intended that that should be the case. I will take the case of two voluntary schools, one in Carnarvon and the other in Denbigh. Take first the country district. In the Carnarvon school there are 162 children in average attendance; the income from fees was £33 2s. 9d., and for subscriptions £13 3s.; total, £46 5s. 9d. The fee grant to that school under this Bill will be £81. That will obviate the necessity for charging school fees and collecting voluntary subscriptions, and give the managers a surplus of £34 12s. Then take the case of a town district. In the Denbigh national school the average attendance is 259; the income from subscriptions, £21 10s.; the income from fees, £66 18s. 10d.; yet the fee grant to this school will very considerably exceed the income derived from fees and subscriptions. Will the Education Code meet such a state of things as this? Lest the right hon. Gentleman should think I have an animus against voluntary schools, I will take the case of a Board school. There are 16 Board schools in one district in the County of Monmouth; the average attendance is 4,898; the fees amount to £1,298, and the fee grant under this Bill will exceed the fees by nearly £1,150. In the district of Aberystwith adjoining there are seven Board schools; the average attendance is 2,564; the fees amount to £658, and the School Board will make a profit of £600 on the fee grant. In a national school in the same district the average attendance is 387; the fees amount to £44, and the school will make a profit of £147. Yet in all this vast industrial district there is not a single evening school or advanced elementary school. With the windfall they are about to receive they should be compelled not to decrease the rates, but to increase the efficiency of the education they give, to establish evening schools, and schools where picked boys and girls may obtain picked education. Under the present system Welsh children go back to their homes at the expiration of their school days very little the better for the so-called education that they have received. I appeal to the Vice President and to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who has had considerable influence in the drafting of this Bill, to see that the money now voted shall be productive of increased educational efficiency, and shall go some distance towards repairing the damage which has been done to the educational system of Wales. If such a clause were inserted in the Act it would practically command the School Boards in districts of Wales to establish district schools; it would give an impetus to the cause of education in the Principality, and it would be in accord with the spirit of Parliament by securing not a reduction of rates, but increased educational efficiency.

*(11.41.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I should have been glad if together with this great additional grant from the Exchequer there had been some steps taken to improve the education in the schools generally; but why should we impose this obligation merely on one class of schools? If the subscriptions are low and the fees high, this clause will not apply; but if the subscriptions are high and the fees low, then additional obligations are to be imposed. Then my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds proposes to insert the words "unless the Education Department certify that the expenditure is not necessary." But surely there is no case in which schools might not be improved by more money being spent upon them. The clause is good so far as it goes, but I cannot understand why it should be confined to cases where the subscriptions are high and fees low. Subscriptions may fall off, they are not permanent like endowments, and it is unreasonable to impose liabilities in the future on account of subscriptions in the past. I wish to see this limitation omitted in order that the obligation may be made general, and so make this great grant the means of improving the efficiency of the schools generally.

(11.45.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): The right hon. Baronet asks why the clause is limited to a particular class of schools. The reason is that it is in those schools, and those schools only, that there is a surplus. If the other schools were to have a surplus we would extend the clause to them. We must cut our coat according to our cloth, and not fritter away a surplus. The real question, therefore, is whether we are to fritter away the surplus and let it go back to the subscribers and in relief of rates because there are other schools that have not got a surplus. The words in the clause "to promote the efficiency of education" are too vague, and unless we specify such points as the improvement of the buildings, the increase of the staff, or the teaching of some additional specific subjects, it will be impossible to prevent the surplus from being applied eventually in relief of rates and subscriptions. I should prefer the clause of the hon. Member for East Somerset, because it gives specific directions. The great danger is that voluntary subscriptions will not be forthcoming in the future if the subscribers discover that the school managers are in possession of a large surplus, and therefore the money will go into the pockets of subscribers, unless we insist on a higher standard of efficiency.

(11.51.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR: I am quite willing to withdraw my Amendment in favour of that of the hon. Member for East Somerset; it seems to be more generally preferred than mine.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

*(11.53.) MR. HOBHOUSE: I move the new clause standing in my name.

New Clause—

(Appropriation of surplus on fee grant.)

"In the case of any school where the fee grant exceeds the amount received in fees during the school year ended last before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, an annual sum equal to such excess shall (unless the Education Department certify that such expenditure is not necessary or expedient), be expended by the school board or managers of such school in one or more of the ways following (that is to say): on rebuilding, enlargement, or improvement of the school buildings, the provision of school books, plant, and apparatus, the payment of additional staff or of special teachers for drawing, cookery, laundry work, science, drill, or manual instruction, or for any other proper educational purpose from time to time sanctioned by the Education Department,"—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Clause be read a second time."

*MR. BARTLEY: It seems to me there is some justification for this clause, because it will insure that the public will get some return in the form of increased school efficiency for the money which is to be expended out of the Exchequer. It will insure that at least some of the money is used to improve the education of the country.

*MR. HENEAGE: I regret that the Government are not disposed to accept the clause. I understood on Wednesday that a clause of this kind would be viewed favourably by the Government. The only interpretation which I can put upon the speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty is that the Government oppose this proposal in order that the school managers may be able to appropriate the surplus for their own uses. That would be a shabby and unworthy policy, and I regret that it has not been repudiated by hon. Members opposite. Hitherto, I have supported the Government in every Division, but on this occasion I shall certainly vote against them. We desire that the money should be used to make our schools more efficient. Under the New Code drawing has been put down as one of the subjects to be taught, and the schoolmasters have been warned that if they do not qualify themselves to teach it in a given time their certificates will be withdrawn. Now, what better object could this money be devoted to than the teaching of drawing and cookery?

Ayes 96; Noes 120.—(Div. List, No. 324.)

(12.5.) MR. BRUNNER: I beg to move that you, Sir, do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. It is perfectly evident, from the state of the Paper, that if we go on with the idea of finishing the Bill we are in for a very long Sitting—and that with no idea on this side of the House of prolonging the discussion, but because the Amendments on the Paper will render it impossible to get through. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury last night said he would move the suspension of the 12 o'clock Rule in order to enable the Bill to be disposed of, supposing that it would not occupy more than half an hour. Much more than half an hour will be required.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Brunner.)

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I should be very sorry to ask the Committee to sit to a late hour unless there is a reasonable hope of getting through to-night. There are several clauses on the Paper which I believe are out of order and cannot be discussed, and it may be convenient to make a little more progress. Then if there is no hope of finishing the Bill I will consent that Progress shall be reported.

MR. MUNDELLA: We have all been in hopes that the Committee would be closed to-night, and I am greatly disappointed at the result. We lost two hours and a half in a Debate during which no Member on the other side uttered a word. Will the right hon. Gentleman say what new clauses he can accept? I would ask you, Mr. Courtney, also, what clauses are out of order?

(12.10.) THE CHAIRMAN: The clause of the hon. Members for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson), the Ilkeston Division of Derbyshire (Sir W. Foster), East Northamptonshire (Mr. Channing), the Brightside Division of Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), South Glamorganshire (Mr. A. Williams), Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), are out of order.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I trust that, under the circumstances, the hon. Member will not persevere in his Motion. We all came here this afternoon for the purpose of finishing the Bill, as all hon. Members on this side will agree.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. ELLIS: I beg to move the clause standing in the name of my hon. Friend (Mr. Lloyd Morgan) as follows:—

"Except in schools under the control or management of a school board no fee grant shall be paid to any school of which at least one-sixth of the total expenditure is not met by voluntary contribution."

I do not think this proposal needs many words from me. If the right hon.

Gentleman in charge of the Bill believes there should be any local effort to meet these vast grants from the Imperial Exchequer, the least he can do is to accept this clause, more especially after rejecting, to the vast injury of education and of the Imperial Exchequer, the clause of my hon. Friend the Member for Somerset.

New Clause (Payment of Fee Grant,) —(Mr. T. Ellis,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I am afraid we cannot accept this clause.

Question put, and negatived.

(12.14.) MR. A. DYKE ACLAND: I beg to move the following new clause:—

"The accounts of every school receiving a fee grant shall be audited by the district auditor in accordance with regulations to be made by the Local Government Board, and a certified copy of the accounts shall be sent within fourteen days after the conclusion of the audit to the local educational authority, who shall permit inspection thereof, and allow copies thereof to be taken at all reasonable times."

Our School Boards are placed under public audit, and I think that, as most of the money for voluntary schools will come from public sources, it is reasonable to place all these schools in the same position as the Board schools. I know it will be said that the audit is twice done, that is to say by the managers, who have a so-called audit of their own, and by the Inspector. I do not wish to say anything about the so-called auditor who audits the ordinary voluntary school accounts. As to the Inspector's audit, I can only say I have witnessed some which have not been of a very admirable character. In many rural districts the Inspectors have to drive some miles before they can reach the schools, and they really have not time to carry out a proper audit.

New Clause (Audit of accounts), (Mr. A. Acland,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(12.16.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I think if there were any necessity for this proposal it would be quite fair to press it upon Her Majesty's Government; but I wish to point out what is the state of affairs with regard to the accounts of the voluntary schools. The Inspector has power to make the fullest inspection of all the school accounts. He can examine every possible item of account, and demand a voucher for each one. In the Code of 1890 a provision was inserted to the effect that there must be publication of the accounts. Besides that, there is an audit by the Education Department itself, and it often happens that different items are criticised by the Department. Hon. Members are aware that in certain cases these accounts are subject to deductions, and, with this object, they also come under the eye of the Auditor General. I think, therefore, it is unnecessary to adopt this clause.

MR. BRUNNER: I trust the right hon. Gentleman will accept, if not the whole of this clause, at any rate the latter part of it. To my mind, it is a mockery to order the managers of a school to nail their accounts on the door. The great advantage of examining such accounts as these can only be obtained when the accounts of one year are compared with those of another year. If they are merely put on a door just before a shower, of what use are they? It very often happens that the ratepayers' lists are treated in this way, and they become entirely illegible. It would be a great advantage if the accounts of the schools were accessible to all the ratepayers, and not only to those who happen to go by the doors of the school during certain times of the year. When they are so difficult of access they are practically of no good at all. I hope my hon. Friend will press this Amendment, which is thoroughly reasonable.

(12.33.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: I propose to postpone until the Report stage the new clause of which I have given notice, giving power to the Education Department to pay the fee grant to a group of schools. I should like, however, to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury whether he cannot hold out some hope to the large number of persons who are interested in these matters that between now and the Report stage he will consider this subject in a manner favourable to my view?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will consider whether it will not be possible to bring forward a fair and reasonable proposal on the subject.

MR. BRUNNER: I have now to move a new clause, which runs to the following effect:—

“In the matter of fees payable in any school in receipt of the fee grant no preference or advantage shall be given to any child and no disadvantage shall attach to any child on account of his belonging or not belonging to any religious denomination.”

That, I think, is a proposal which appeals to the sense of fairness of every Member of this House who sympathises with the idea of religious equality.

New Clause (Equality of scholars.)—(Mr. Brunner.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I would point out to the hon. Member that there is no advantage given by this Bill to any child on account of the denomination to which it belongs, and I hope the hon. Gentleman will not persist in this Amendment.

*MR. CHANNING: Would it not be much better to have the clause printed and brought up on the Report?

MR. BRUNNER: I will ask leave to withdraw the clause for the present.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule agreed to.

MR. MUNDELLA: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury what is to be the further course in regard to the Bill, and on what day he will ask the House to take the Report?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We cannot take the Report before Tuesday; but we will Viscount Cranborne

put our Amendments on the Paper on Monday.

*MR. TOMLINSON: Would it not be well to give a little more time to the electors throughout the country to consider the Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope my hon. Friend will not desire to fight over again this battle.

*MR. TOMLINSON: I do not want to fight the battle over again.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Monday, 6th July, 1891.*VISIT OF THE GERMAN EMPEROR—VOLUNTEER REVIEW AT WIMBLEDON.
OBSERVATIONS.

THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Earl BROWNLOW): My Lords, a great many questions having been asked with regard to the arrangements made for the forthcoming Review as to tickets for Members of the House of Peers, I should like to make a short statement on the subject. There will be 150 tickets issued free to Members of the House of Lords; besides which there will be given to the Peers 250 10s. tickets up to 10 a.m. on Wednesday. If any of those tickets are not required by your Lordships they will then become available for Members of the House of Commons. Members of the House of Commons will have 350 10s. tickets issued to them, and if they are not required by Members of the House of Commons they will become available for Members of your Lordships' House. Applications for tickets will have to be made to the Lord Chancellor's office.

LORD DORCHESTER: With your Lordships' permission I rise to put a question of which I have given private notice to the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for War. It reads as follows:—

"Whether on the occasion of the Volunteers' Review on Saturday next by His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Germany, it is proposed to make any grants in the shape of marching money, or extra pay to the privates and non-commissioned officers of Volunteers, many of whom come from a distance and sacrifice the emolument of a day's employment."

I believe I shall be called to task upon this notice by, perhaps, the most competent authority in your Lordships' House upon Volunteer questions, in reference to pay for Volunteers; still, I submit to your Lordships that a Capitation Grant may, although perhaps faultily, be interpreted as pay. My notice raises the question whether men, many of whom are perhaps earning only 5s. to 10s. a day, though in some instances, of course, much more, should bear the whole of the expense to which they will be put. One case I may mention of an officer who told me that the Review would cause him a loss of £25, and there will be many distinguished advocates no doubt who would have been engaged on that day who will have to throw up their briefs, to the disadvantage of their clients, and the detriment of their own pockets. The question is, whether artisans, who in great numbers enter the Volunteer Force with patriotic feelings, are, without any allowance being made them, to sacrifice a, to them, considerable sum as their daily earnings by attending this Review, which will necessitate parading, as I am told, in many, indeed in most, instances very early in the morning at distant stations, a trajet of perhaps a quarter or half an hour to Wimbledon, and kicking their heels about Wimbledon Common for five hours. I cannot believe that Her Majesty's Government will allow so loyal and patriotic a body of men to waste their day without making them some kind of remuneration. The most powerful Military Sovereign perhaps in Europe, closely allied to the Royal Family, is at present in this country enjoying Her Majesty's hospitality. His great object has been, I am told, from the first to see our Volunteers. He knows what British soldiers are and what they have done, and how small a show, from their being scattered over the globe, we can make in comparison with the great military displays made by the forces at his own disposal; but he has never seen a body of men who come forward actuated solely by national and patriotic motives, who may not only be said to serve for nothing at all, but at a considerable cost to themselves, as do the Volunteers of this country. It would, I think, be a matter for very great regret if some of these corps were unable or disinclined to join in this Volunteer display on Saturday next on account of the cost to themselves and to their officers. One officer, who commands a very distinguished Volunteer Corps, has himself informed me that it will cost him from 2s. to 3s. per man on this occasion. From that, I need not tell your Lordships that a very heavy charge will be thrown upon the Colonels commanding Volunteer corps. There are some corps, no doubt, whose members are well able to defray their own expenditure; but, on the other hand, there are others in which the men are not able to meet their own expenses, and who can, indeed, very ill afford the loss of a day's earnings that this Review will involve. Under the circumstances, I should hope that Her Majesty's Government would be inclined to pay any reasonable charges of the non-commissioned officers and men, and they would, I am sure, be cordially supported in doing so by the general feeling of the public throughout the country.

EARL WEMYSS: Before the noble Lord answers the question put to him by my noble Friend on my right I should like to say one or two words. My noble Friend has said that I intend to take him to task upon his question. Now, I should be very sorry to take my noble Friend to task for anything that comes from him relative to our Volunteers, for there is no better friend to our Auxiliary Forces, whether Reserves or Volunteers, than himself. He is always ready to do whatever he can in their interest, as he has shown this evening. But I think he means, by taking him to task on this occasion, that I do not agree with the wording of his question. I think they are calculated to lead to a misapprehension possibly on the part of His Imperial Majesty as to what our Volunteer Force really is. I would call your Lordships' attention to the two points of my noble Friend's question before giving any explanation. He refers, first, to the time of parade, which I must confess appears to me to be unnecessarily early. I should have thought that arrangements might be made by the War Office which would not necessitate the parade of the Volunteers until some time between 9 and 10 in the morning. It seems to me that a little organisation and effort, much less than would be required in time of war, would, in time of peace, enable these matters to be carried through more quickly, and take much of the burden and toil of the day off these men, who, without reward, give their time and services to—

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): I am very sorry to interrupt my noble Friend, but I must point out to him that he is not in order. It is, I am told, an extraordinary irregularity to discuss a question of which only private notice has been given, and of which, of course, everybody was uninformed until the last moment. I am sorry to interrupt the noble Lord, but I think that is a point of order which should be decided.

EARL WEMYSS: I am in the hands of the House. A question has been asked to which I presume the noble Lord (Earl Brownlow) is going to give an answer, and a speech has been made by the mover of the question to which no objection was taken. Of course it is for the House to decide, and I will not go on if that is the opinion of the House, but I should not have thought it was out of order to make a suggestion on the subject, especially as time presses, for the Review is to be held on Saturday, only four days hence. I am quite certain if my noble Friend had not interfered, the House would not have objected. I should have been allowed to proceed, and until the House interferes I shall venture to do so. The point to which I take objection in the question of my noble Friend is that he talks of giving to the Volunteers some grant in the shape of marching-money or extra pay, that is to say, to the privates and non-commissioned officers, many of whom come from a distance. Now, there is no such thing as pay to privates or non-commissioned officers in the Volunteer Force, and this might lead to the belief that the men who go to Wimbledon are paid so much for their attendance. Nothing of the kind. The Parliamentary grant is not a grant to the individual members of the corps. It is not their pay, or any payment made to them at all. It is an allowance to the corps in proportion to their efficiency. They earn what is called the Capitation Grant, which goes into the regimental fund for regimental purposes, and not a penny of it goes into the pockets of the individual members of the corps. It is simply as an old Volunteer officer that I venture to take my noble Friend to task upon that point, while at the same time heartily supporting his object, which is that all regimental expenses should be taken off the shoulders both of officers and men, and that upon this occasion their fares should be paid. I think they should have an allowance—call it if you like marching-money or camp-allowance—to meet their commissariat requirements; and my noble Friend has in my opinion done a great service in bringing this matter forward, only I wish his question had been worded otherwise. There is one other point to which I wish to call the noble Lord's attention. If there is one feature in the Volunteer Force more striking than another it is the batteries of position which were organised originally in Sussex by Mr. Derby, the Tithe Commissioner, the 40-pounder guns which are drawn by agricultural wain-horses and driven by teamsters in their smock frocks on foot. Anyone who has seen them must know the value of such batteries in case they should be required for national defence. Assuming those 40-pounders are, as they ought to be, relatively superior, according to their calibre, to the 16 or 12-pounders, no foreign army could bring guns into position that would not be annihilated by them. The fire of such guns ought to be able to crush the fire of any other guns that could be brought against them. I know from communication with the Authorities at the Horse Guards that they are of opinion there are great difficulties in the way; but if by any possibility those difficulties could be overcome, I am certain that the appearance of those batteries, which are unique of their kind—there is nothing like them in the world—as one of the main features in our Volunteer system, could not fail to create a very strong impression on the mind of His Imperial Majesty and his Staff. Perhaps the noble Lord might consider whether it is possible for this to be done; but failing its being done, I am still glad to have had the opportunity of calling attention at the present time to this valuable defensive Force.

EARL BROWNLOW: My Lords, in the question of which my noble Friend has given me private notice, I must say that the word "pay" in the draft he sent me this afternoon does not occur at all. I quite agree with the noble Earl on the Cross Benches that to give the Volunteer pay, even for that one day, would destroy the whole object of the Review. The object of the Review is to show His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Germany a certain number of our great citizen Army, and that he should know when they appear on the ground that these are men who give their services voluntarily to the State and not for pay. At the same time it would obviously not be right that these men should be put to personal expense, or that their officers should be put to heavy expenses in order to attend this Review. The Secretary of State has considered the matter, and what he proposes to do is to give 1s. per man as a travelling allowance, and a further 1s. per man for food during the day. It is hoped this allowance will meet the requirements of the case, and that no serious expense will fall either upon the commanding officers or upon the men themselves. The question of the 40-pounder guns appearing at the Review is one of which I have had no notice. It is a new point, and one which I have not had time to consider; but I am informed that the Adjutant General has considered the matter, and he finds the difficulties in the way of having 40-pounder guns present so great that he is unable to manage it.

EARL WEMYSS: I am afraid the 1s. for travelling money will be hardly sufficient.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LANDS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 96)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, owing to a decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland, it is obvious that considerable modifications will be necessary in this Bill. The Attorney General for Ireland has been in communication with me upon the subject, and has promised to make some suggestions with the view of bringing the Bill into harmony with the decision, and to remove certain objections that there would be to it in its present form. Of course, in the circumstances, it is impossible to go on with the Bill now, and I will put off its consideration to any day that is convenient to the House. Until this day week would probably give sufficient time. I hope then to be in a position to go on with it.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I am sorry the noble Lord has put off the discussion on this Bill to-night, because it will, I think, be rather inconvenient to noble Lords who have attended in the House now to discuss it. I may say that I think my Amendments, if the noble and learned Lord would accept them, would entirely obviate the necessity of Amendments in other respects. My Amendments were proposed with the view of meeting the decision to which my noble and learned Friend has referred, and I really think, unless the noble and learned Lord is very clear as to the necessity of putting off this Bill, it would be much more convenient for us to take it to-night.

LORD HERSCHELL: I should be happy to oblige the noble Marquess, but it is obviously a matter which, to a considerable extent, is out of my hands. The Bill was supported by the Government in the other House, and they have communicated to me that it would be impossible for them to support it in its present form without modifications. If they were satisfied with the modifications proposed by the noble Marquess, no doubt I should be content; but they are more important persons to be satisfied than myself, and, of course, it is impossible to deal with the matter in the absence of some understanding with them.

Committee put off to Monday next.

MUNICIPAL REGISTRATION (DUBLIN AND BELFAST) BILL.—(No. 200.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE EARL OF ERNE: My Lords, this Bill to which I am asking your Lordships to give a Second Reading is a very simple one. It merely proposes to alter the dates for revising the burgess lists in the towns of Dublin and Belfast, so that the revision shall take place between the 18th September and 19th October in every year, instead of between the 10th October and 10th November, as at present. The reasons which make the change necessary are two. In the first place, the nomination papers are filled up from the old list, whereas the election must take place upon the new one, and, consequently, the present state of things is calculated to lead to difficulties and litigation. Moreover, both in Dublin and Belfast, if any appeal is taken from the decision of the Revising Barrister, there will be no time for it to be heard. My noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal has authorised me to say that the Government offer no objection to the Bill, and I ask your Lordships to read it a second time.

The Marquess of Waterford

Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

ALLOTMENTS RATING EXEMPTION BILL.—(No. 184.)

House in Committee (according to order): Bill reported without amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

ROADS AND STREETS IN POLICE BURGHES (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 207.)

Read 3^a (according to order), with the amendments; a further amendment made; Bill passed and returned to the Commons.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR STANDING COMMITTEES.

Report from, That the Committee have added the Lord Colville of Culross to the Standing Committee for the consideration of the Forged Transfers (No. 2.) Bill. Read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, till to-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 6th July, 1891.

QUESTIONS.

THE INDIAN TROOPSHIP SQUADRON.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there is any foundation for the statement which appeared in the Times of the 19th June—

“That the Admiralty contemplated handing over the management of the Indian Troopship Squadron to the Orient Steam Shipping Company;”

if so, will he state the terms of the arrangement; whether he is aware that these vessels occupy (upon an average) 30 days on the outward passage to Bombay, being 10 days longer than that of merchant passenger steamers, besides consuming more fuel per day than similar modern merchantmen; and whether it is intended that these ships shall be fitted with more powerful and economical machinery?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): In reply to the question of the hon. Member, I have to say that there is no truth in the statement.

MR. E. D. YOUNG, R.N.

MR. H. S. WRIGHT (Nottingham, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to a letter which appeared in the Army and Navy Gazette of the 30th May, recounting the services of Mr. E. D. Young, R.N., in African exploration, in connection with the late Dr. Livingstone; whether it is a fact that this officer will very shortly be retired, in the ordinary course, from the post he has held since 1877, as Inspecting Officer of Coastguard at Dungeness, when he will have no rank but that of a gunner in the Royal Navy; and whether he will consider the question of promoting Mr. Young, so that he may be retired as a Lieutenant, and so receive the equivalent retiring allowance?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Mr. Young has been retired from the Coastguard on account of age, and as his services as a divisional officer do not qualify him under the Regulations in force for receiving commissioned rank on retirement, the Admiralty propose to specially memorialise the Queen in Council to confer upon him the honorary rank of Lieutenant. This honorary rank will not, however, carry with it any increase of pension. Mr. Young has been granted the full pension to which he is entitled as a gunner in the Navy, and this is the utmost the Admiralty have it in their power to give; but as Mr. Young has undoubtedly performed meritorious services in connection with certain exploration expeditions in Africa, I am in communication with other Departments with the view of ascertaining whether any special recognition of these services is possible.

THE SHENSTONE SCHOOL.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the evidence given in the inquest on the body of James Harry Russell, aged eight years and nine months, in which it was stated that the lad had been hit about the head with a strap and a stick by the schoolmaster of the Shenstone School, near Lichfield; and whether it is the intention of the Education Department to take any action in reference to this matter?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Subsequent to the verdict of the jury, the evidence in the case was submitted to the Director of Public Prosecutions, and I have authority for stating that it did not appear, upon a consideration of the medical testimony, that there was sufficient to justify criminal proceedings against the schoolmaster. In these circumstances, the hon. Member will see the difficulty in the way of the Department taking any action in the matter?

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: May I ask what remedy the parents have against gross abuses of this character, when the school managers refuse to take action in the matter, and still continue to retain this man as head master? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the parents are sending their children to a school three miles off in order to avoid Shenstone?

SIR W. HART DYKE: No, Sir; I am not aware of the extraneous circumstances mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. If the hon. Gentleman desires further information, and will give notice, I will make inquiry.

SEVERE SENTENCES ON JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the sentence passed by the Pershore Magistrates on three lads, of 12, 13, and 14, for a first offence of larceny, of 10 days in Worcester Gaol, to be followed by four to five years in a reformatory; whether he has noticed, in particular, the evidence of Police Superintendent Moore, who owned that "he listened outside the cell" to the conversation between the boys immediately their legal adviser had visited them; further, that he endeavoured to influence the Magistrates at the close of the evidence, by stating that "he was afraid this was not the only robbery they had been connected with," but without producing, or offering to produce, one tittle of evidence in support of such statement; and what action he proposes to take with reference to this case?

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make inquiries as to the case of three boys, William Hall, aged 14, Ernest Hall, aged 12, and Ernest Latty, aged 13, the sons of respectable tradesmen of Pershore, who were, on 16th June, sentenced by the Pershore Bench to 10 days' imprisonment, and afterwards to be removed to a reformatory for four and five years respectively, for having stolen 16s. 6d. from a shop, William Hall and Latty pleading "not guilty," and Ernest Hall pleading "guilty;" whether, in each case, it was the first offence; whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that there was only the slightest evidence given of William Hall having been, after the theft, indirectly connected with it, and no evidence whatever against Latty, and that it appears from the report in the local papers that upon the conclusion of the evidence for the defence, and before the Magistrates had retired to consider their decision, or had expressed any opinion on the case, the Magistrate's clerk said it was the intention of the Magistrates to send the boys to a reformatory, and then expressed his opinion as to their guilt; whether he is aware that the parents of the boys are not in a position to afford to appeal against the sentences; whether he is aware that great dissatisfaction exists among the tradesmen and inhabitants of Pershore as to the manner in which justice is administered on the Pershore Bench; and whether he will cause a thorough inquiry to be made into the cases of the three boys with a view of remitting, as to some or all of them, the sentences passed upon them?

Mr. Winterbotham

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I learn from a newspaper report that a police-sergeant overheard the boys, who were in separate cells, shouting to each other, and that he heard the conversation from the door of his room. This same police-officer also stated the result of his inquiries as to the characters of the boys in Court. The boys had not been previously convicted, but I am informed by the Justices that it appeared, from inquiries made by the police while the boys were under remand, that all three of them had been discovered perpetrating acts of theft on several previous occasions, and the artful character of the present robbery showed that the boys were not novices in crime. The evidence conclusively proved, in the opinion of the Justices, that all three defendants were guilty, Latty and Ernest Hall as principals, and William Hall as an accessory. The clerk to the Justices expressed no opinion as to the guilt of the boys, but after the Justices had jointly expressed their opinion he was directed by them to inform the parents, and to invite them to say anything they wished in behalf of the boys. I am not aware whether or no the parents are in a position to appeal, but both they and the boys expressed their desire that the case should be dealt with summarily. The father of the boys Hall expresses himself as quite in accord with the conviction and sentence, and believes it to be the best that could be done for the boys. The allegation that there is any dissatisfaction in Pershore with the manner in which justice is administered is emphatically denied; and I am informed that there is a unanimous opinion, especially among the tradesmen who have been pilfered, that the boys were properly dealt with, and that there was no alternative but to send them to a reformatory. The circumstances as reported to me do not disclose any reasons for advising interference with the sentences.

MR. COBB: Was there any evidence of any description against the boy Latty? Was there any evidence given by the police as to the result of their inquiry?

MR. MATTHEWS: I believe there was some evidence.

ESQUIMALT HARBOUR.

SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether compensation has been paid by the Admiralty to the owner of a foreign vessel in consequence of the British Admiral forcibly removing such vessel in Esquimalt Harbour last year to make room for a British man of war; what were the circumstances of the case; and whether the powers and authority of a British Admiral in command of Her Majesty's ships are, as regards such matters, in any way more restricted in Esquimalt Harbour than in the Naval ports of the United Kingdom; and, if so, by what circumstances, and for what reasons?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The sum of £82 4s. 5d. was paid to the owners of the J. H. Hustede through the Canadian Government. Admiral Heneage having caused the vessel in question to be removed outside the usual man-of-war anchorage, it was subsequently discovered that the Commander-in-Chief had not the control he ought to have over the man-of-war anchorage in Constance Cove. The Admiralty have now obtained from the Dominion Government the necessary legal powers to reserve the anchorage for the use of Her Majesty's ships.

CRETE.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any recent information as to the condition of the Island of Crete; and, if not, when he is likely to be able to do so?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The most recent Reports of the condition of Crete show that there are no insurrectionary bands on the Island, and that nearly all the outlaws who had landed in the Island from Greece have returned to that country. I regret to say that murders are still of frequent occurrence, the perpetrators being sometimes Mussulmans and at others Christians. When murders are committed, owing to the difficulty in discovering the murderers, a number of individuals, who think they may be suspected and imprisoned, take to the mountains, until an inquiry has proved their innocence, or they find an opportunity of leaving the Island to avoid punishment. These individuals are a source of danger to the tranquillity of the country. Murders have lately been committed by soldiers and gendarmes, and owing to the great conflict of testimony it is generally difficult to determine what amount of provocation, if any, they may have received. Further Papers will be prepared.

SALE OF NEWSPAPERS ON SUNDAY.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that last Tuesday week, at Bristol, at the County Sessions, Lydia Harvey, a widow, was summoned under the Statute of Charles II., at the instance of the Horfield Local Board, for selling newspapers on Sunday, and was fined 2s. 6d.; whether the prosecution was instituted in compliance with the provisions of the 34 & 35 Vic., c. 87; and, if so, what chief officer of police or Justices of the Peace gave the necessary consent in writing; whether it falls within the powers of a Local Board to initiate or suggest such a prosecution; and whether, as the Act of Charles II., so far as it relates to the sale of newspapers, has by universal custom become obsolete, he will direct that the fine be remitted?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Local Board that the information was laid by the superintendent of police in consequence of the complaints of the Local Board, and in compliance with the provisions of 34 & 35 Vic., c. 87, the consent in writing being given by two Justices of the Peace. I am not aware of any reason why a Local Board should not call the attention of the Police Authorities to any alleged infraction of the law. I feel, as the Magistrates appear to have felt, that, although I regret this prosecution and its result, I should go beyond my duty if I were practically to declare that the provisions of the Act in question are to have no effect, especially where a Local Representative Body and Local Magistrates have supported their application.

MR. COBB: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will include this Act of Charles II. in the Schedule of Acts to be repealed by the Statute Law Revision Bill?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): It is not for me to answer. It is the duty of the Statute Law Revision Committee to examine the Statutes and ascertain which of them are perfectly obsolete.

THE WIMBLEDON REVIEW.

MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether arrangements will be made for Members of Parliament and their wives to witness the Military Review which is to be held in honour of the German Emperor on Wimbledon Common on the 11th instant; and whether any provision will be made for the public upon the occasion?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The space on the stand will be exceedingly small; but a certain number of seats will be reserved for Members of the House and their wives, and tickets will be sent to the Speaker, who will distribute them. A certain number of tickets will also be reserved for sale to the public.

THE VIENNA POSTAL UNION CONVENTION.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is now in a position to state briefly the concessions gained to the public, and the reforms instituted, at the Vienna Postal Union Convention?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The British Delegates at the Vienna Postal Congress are now on their way home, and I expect to receive their Report in the course of next week. I shall be very glad to give the House full information on the subject as soon as I am in a position to do so.

EXPULSION FROM DENMARK OF MR. PATERNOSTER.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on what grounds Mr. Arthur Paternoster, a British subject, was expelled from Denmark on June 27th last; why before expulsion he was not allowed to lay his case before the British Consul; and what action the Foreign Office propose to take in the matter?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The individual named is reported by Her Majesty's Minister to have been arrested and expelled from Denmark under the provisions of Section 13 of the Danish Law relative to foreigners and travellers of May 15, 1875; he has also been served with an injunction prohibiting him from re-entering Danish territory. Mr. Macdonell states that the law in question is sufficiently clear, and that the case had not been brought to his notice by the Seamen's Union, which this person had organised in Denmark, or by anyone else. As the proceedings taken are reported to have been in accordance with the law of the country, Her Majesty's Government do not propose to take any action in regard to them.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I wish to ask, just for the sake of that obsolete thing, British honour, whether the right hon. Gentleman knows that Mr. Paternoster was detained by the Danish authorities for five days without trial?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I know nothing of the details.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Exactly; I am only sorry for British honour.

CORWEN.

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that, in view of the sanitary defects of the town of Corwen, and in deference to the view of the majority of the inhabitants, the County Council of Merioneth on the 6th of August, 1890, after full local inquiry, unanimously ordered the conversion of the township of Corwen into an urban district, but that the Local Government Board, in refusing to sanction the Order of the County Council, pointed out to the Rural Sanitary Authority its persistent neglect of the recommendations contained in the Report of Dr. Parsons, an officer of the Local Government Board, upon the state of the town in 1882; whether anything has yet been done to remedy the sanitary defects, and to divert the brook as pointed out by the Inspectors; whether he is aware that typhoid fever recently attacked the inmates of the workhouse situate in the centre of the town, that there was recently an outbreak of measles, and that scarlet fever is now prevalent in the town; that the Rural Sanitary Authority declined to adopt the Infectious Diseases Notification Act, though pressed by their medical officer to do so; and that at a meeting of this authority on 19th June, 1891, the Inspector of the Local Government Board reported that there were as dirty and crowded places in Corwen as he had seen anywhere; and whether the Local Government Board will forthwith confirm the Order of the County Council directing the formation of a Local Board of Health for Corwen?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): An Order was made by the County Council of Merioneth constituting the township of Corwen an urban sanitary district. This Order was appealed against, and in consequence an inquiry was held by an Inspector of the Local Government Board. The district which it was proposed to constitute has a population of less than 1,300 persons, and an annual rateable value under £3,500. The Local Government Board were clearly of opinion, under the circumstances, that the most satisfactory arrangement with regard to the district would be that the Rural Sanitary Authority should energetically exercise the powers which they possess rather than that a new authority should be set up. The Inspector of the district consequently had an interview with the authority, and I have since been informed that an important sewer has been constructed, and that connections are now nearly or quite completed; a branch sewer is about to be commenced, and the Directors of the Water Company are on the point of constructing a new reservoir. Nothing has as yet been done as to the brook, and the question whether the work should be undertaken at the expense of the rates, instead of at the cost of those primarily benefited by it, is one on which there is some difference of opinion. As regards typhoid fever, a single case appeared at the workhouse, and the disease did not spread. I am also informed that there have been a few cases of scarlet fever, but no important outbreak. The Sanitary Authority have not adopted the Infectious Diseases Notification Act. The Inspector of the Board attended a recent meeting, and directed the attention of the authority to a dirty locality in Corwen, but found that the Sanitary Authority were already taking steps to construct a branch sewer for the purpose of improving the place. It would be only under very exceptional circumstances that the Board would be prepared to assent to the constitution as a Local Board district of a district with only 1,300 inhabitants, and at present it is not my intention to confirm the Order unless the Rural Sanitary Authority show that they are not prepared to discharge their duty.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been directed to the prosecution of Thomas Sumner, at the Wigan County Police Court, about a fortnight ago, for failure to report a case of pleuro-pneumonia, when the penalty inflicted was a fine of 20s. and costs; and whether, in view of the large sums now being spent in trying to eradicate the disease, he will consider what steps, if any, can be taken to deter owners from concealing outbreaks of disease?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to the case of Thomas Sumner in the Wigan County Police Court, and the facts are as stated in the question. So long as pleuro-pneumonia is concealed it adds greatly to the difficulty of attaining satisfactory results from the large sums now being expended in the endeavour to stamp it out. I hope that in future, when the offence is proved, Magistrates may support the Board more effectively than they have done in this case; otherwise the Board will probably be compelled to exercise their powers of withholding compensation, either partially or wholly, for animals slaughtered by their orders in cases where the owners have been guilty of an offence against the Act.

ITALY AND GREAT BRITAIN.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, from the official statement that there is an existing understanding between this country and Italy, he will inform the House what is the precise nature of this existing understanding and to what Foreign Governments it has been communicated?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The "understanding" referred to is the cause of the communications which have been frequently mentioned as expressing the common object of maintaining the status quo in the Mediterranean, a principle which Her Majesty's Government, by declaring in Parliament, have publicly avowed.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, when voluntary schools to which building grants have been made have been closed, and the school premises sold with the consent of the Education Department, the building grants or any part thereof have been repaid to the Treasury?

SIR W. HART DYKE: It is the practice of the Department not to advise the Home Secretary to give his consent to any sale without requiring that such proportion of the proceeds of the sale shall be repaid as the grant bore to the original cost of the buildings, or that the money be placed in the hands of the Charity Commissioners to be dealt with as nearly as possible within the terms of the trust for educational purposes.

THE CASE OF S. W. CLOETE.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has observed the proceedings in the Central Criminal Court in the case of S. W. Cloete, who was charged with obtaining £16,000 by false pretences in connection with company promoting; that, after a long and careful inquiry, the accused was committed for trial, but the parties have now come to terms, it being stated in Court by the Counsel for the parties that "The friends of the accused had undertaken to follow a course which would recompense Mrs. Page to some extent for her losses," and that "Everything would be done to make full amends to Mrs. Page," upon which the prosecution was withdrawn; and whether, in the public interest, the Public Prosecutor takes any part in such cases where, under the English system of private prosecution, the Criminal Law is used till cases are compounded and the prosecutions are then withdrawn?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to this matter. I understand that, as there were serious legal difficulties in the way of establishing a criminal offence against the accused, application was made to the Court for leave to withdraw from the prosecution, and that the learned Recorder stated in Court that, having read the depositions, he concurred in the application. I also gather from a newspaper report that it was said that everything would be done to recompense the prosecutrix for the losses she had sustained. The Public Prosecutor had declined to conduct the prosecution. The regulations under which the Public Prosecutor acts enable him to intervene and take up prosecutions before a Justice or Police Court which are improperly withdrawn. He does not intervene where a Superior Court sanctions the withdrawal.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the utter futility of the so-called system of Public Prosecution.

IMPRISONMENT AT VALPARAISO.

MR. LEVESON GOWER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the reported imprisonment of a clerk at the British Consulate at Valparaiso, by order of President Balmaceda, on the charge of complicity in the attempted escape of the torpedo launch Guale; and whether, in the event of this report proving correct, they will take measures to procure his release?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: At present we have received no information on this subject, and it must be presumed that Her Majesty's Minister at Santiago has not found it necessary to refer the matter to Her Majesty's Government. But he has been requested by telegraph to report.

LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when the accounts of the Life Assurance Companies deposited with the Board of Trade, under "The Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870," for the year ending 31st December, 1890, will be published; and whether, considering that the corresponding volume last year was not published before the end of April, greater expedition in the publication of these volumes would be obtained?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Return referred to by the hon. Member will be presented next week. The delay has arisen mainly through the death of the actuary, but the Return will be presented earlier next year.

MR. DE COBAIN.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can state how the case of the Member for East Belfast now stands; and whether any Motion affecting Mr. de Cobain will be made during the present Session; and, if so, when?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have stated that in the view of the Government it was necessary to take all possible precautions, so that none of the privileges of hon. Members should be prejudiced. Information, however, has been obtained relating to this case, which will be laid on the Table of the House by the Attorney General for Ireland. On Monday next I propose to move that Mr. de Cobain be ordered to attend in his place on Thursday, July 23.

EMIGRATION FROM SCOTLAND.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the fact that the Government have signified their willingness to advance £150,000 to the Government of British Columbia to promote emigration from the Highlands of Scotland, on the ground that it is one of the recommendations of the Select Committee on Colonisation, they propose to give a like or any other sum for the purpose of promoting migration in the Highlands, which proposal is also a recommendation of the same Committee; and, if not, on what principle they distinguish between the various recommendations of the Committee?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I would point out to the hon. Member that the Colonisation Committee only suggested migration "where suitable," and they did not recommend that any action should be taken by Her Majesty's Government for this purpose. On the contrary, they stated that they were "unable to recommend any large scheme of migration," and the general tenour of their Report is not such as to encourage any experiment of the kind being undertaken by the Government. In these circumstances, the Government would not feel justified in asking Parliament to vote any money for this purpose.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: When will the Bill dealing with this matter, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to the other day, be brought on?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am unable to say.

THE WIMBLEDON VOLUNTEER REVIEW.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the appeal made by the Secretary of State for War to the public spirit of employers to allow Volunteers under them absence for the whole day on Saturday next, the Government intend to set the example by issuing a Treasury Order that all Civil servants or writers in Government Departments serving in Metropolitan Volunteer Corps are to be allowed a whole day's leave without loss of pay, or its being reckoned towards annual leave, or being required to make it up by overtime?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid it is impossible for the Government to give a general order to Heads of Departments in the sense desired by the hon. Member, because such Heads of Departments are alone in a position to judge whether the needs of the Public Service will in each case admit of such a concession. But I propose to direct the issue of a Circular from the Treasury expressing the hope that Heads of Departments will, as far as public business permits, give facilities to such clerks and copyists as are serving in the Metropolitan Volunteer Corps which are ordered to take part in the proposed Review on Saturday next in order that they may be able to attend.

SIR H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether there is any sufficient reason, and if so what, why the Review to take place before the German Emperor on Saturday next should not be held in Hyde Park, instead of at Wimbledon, so as to allow the Volunteers to assemble in large numbers without loss of either time or wages?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The review of 20,000 men in Hyde Park, if possible, would certainly involve such injury to the park and to the gardens that I cannot think that the proposal would be entertained.

SIR H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN: Is it not the case that on the last occasion 24,000 men were reviewed there, without damage; and still larger numbers—30,000—on a previous occasion?

MR. E. STANHOPE: That is perfectly true.

THE STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what are the intentions of the Government with respect to the Statute Law Revision Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for having mentioned this Bill, and for the course which he has thought it right to pursue with regard to it. I am perfectly at liberty to add that if he is willing, on behalf of those who agree with him, that the compromise which I suggested on Thursday last should be adopted, the Government will proceed with the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman was fully justified in objecting as he did to the Second Reading; for, although it is prepared by a body of public servants who give their time gratuitously to the task of Statute Law revision, still it is the duty of the House to watch with extreme jealousy any measure of this kind which they believe interferes with the living law. I propose to take the Second Reading this evening if the Bill is not opposed, and on the understanding that two of the measures included in the Schedule of the Bill—5 & 6 Vict.—shall be removed from that Schedule. The Bill will then be examined by a Select Committee, and I hope will be passed into law in the present Session. I shall ask the House to appoint a Committee, in concurrence with the House of Lords, to examine into the whole question of Statute Law revision early next Session.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): What is the principle of revision to be observed in the Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The principle is not to go down below the 5 & 6 Vict.

MR. HOWELL: Is it not the fact that that has been done already?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It does not follow that it is always right to continue doing what has once been done.

MR. HOWELL: Then I shall oppose the Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish the hon. Member to understand that he will be responsible for the loss of the Bill, because the Government will not proceed with it if there is any opposition.

THE ABDUCTION OF AN ENGLISH GIRL IN PERSIA.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any further information about the prospect of obtaining the release of Kate Greenfield; and whether there is any chance of the British Consul obtaining an interview with the girl in order to find out what are her real wishes?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The latest accounts received state that the Persian authorities have collected forces to disperse the bands of turbulent Kurds, who are mostly Turkish. Her Majesty's Government meanwhile are doing their best at Constantinople to induce the Porte not to object.

JUDICATURE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL [LORDS].

Read the first time; to be read a second time upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 403.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

REDEMPTION OF RENT (IRELAND)

BILL.—(No. 377.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(3.45.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I regret that my right hon. Friend has not thought it desirable to state the reasons for this Bill, because I regard it as a gross violation of all the principles on which my right hon. Friend holds his position upon that Bench. It is, therefore, impossible that I can allow the Second Reading to pass without a protest against it. In 1871 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) laid down the lines upon which the redemption of rent was to proceed, and the first attack upon them took place in 1887 under the present Government, who introduced a clause enabling a leaseholder in perpetuity to obtain a fee farm grant. No reason whatever is alleged in justification for the present measure. The tenants have made a fair and reasonable bargain for themselves, and the landlords have not insisted upon anything approaching what may be termed landlord tyranny in Ireland. Nor are the provisions of the present Bill the same as the clauses introduced into the Act of 1890 and the Land Department Bill of the present Session. Those clauses were confined to long leaseholders, whereas the present measure applies to fee farm grants. I take it that a leasehold of 999 years differs essentially from a fee farm grant. My right hon. Friend now proposes to break up that which is the absolute sale of a freehold interest between a vendor and a purchaser. It is not a contract for letting between landlord and tenant, but the absolute sale of the lease, and that is what my right hon. Friend is now seeking to do. Subject to the payment of rent, it is a conveyance of the fee simple of the land of the grantee. The Bill itself makes the expression "fee simple" cover all the land held on fee farm grant. Therefore, I take it that it conveys everything subject only to the rent. I certainly think that those who are interested in this kind of property are entitled to know from Her Majesty's Government what are their reasons for changing the policy which has been hitherto pursued by all Governments in regard to this particular kind of property. In 1887 there might have been a reason for alleging the unfair and inequitable treatment of the owners of short leases, but the owners of long leases were in an entirely different position. The class of tenants who will be affected by this Bill are, with the exception of about 2 per cent., under £50 valuation. For years they have been placed in a position which caused them to be envied by every other class of tenants in Ireland, and I cannot understand why, in regard to them, my right hon. Friend should introduce the principle of compulsory purchase. Under this Bill the landlords, if they go to the Land Courts, would have only one reasonable alternative practically offered to them, namely, to sell their property to their tenants. I do not desire to detain the House at any length, but I wish to state as concisely as I can my objections to this special class of legislation. I am aware that I shall probably not receive much support, and therefore I will not put the House to the trouble of a Division on the Second Reading, but I hope to hear the reasons why the Government have now, at the eleventh hour, turned round and altered the policy hitherto pursued in regard to this class of property. I object to this kind of legislation, which will still further weaken the integrity of contracts in Ireland; and I protest against it as a violation of the rights of property, and of all the principles on which the Government have arrived at their seats upon that Bench.

(4.0.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The hon. Member opposite has been much more prudent in his action than in his speech, and he has wisely abstained from taking advantage of his right to divide the House. If he had adopted that course he would probably find himself telling an empty Lobby, for I doubt whether a single Member would have followed him. Personally, I so far differ from the views of the hon. Member that I am of opinion that this Bill is far from exceeding the demands of justice. On the contrary, it does much less than justice to the Irish tenants. What is the difference between the Irish tenants dealt with by this Bill and the Irish tenants admitted to a fair rent by the Land Courts four years ago? Practically there is no difference at all, and the hardship is greater upon the tenants still remaining than it was upon those who were dealt with four years ago. In old times, when the will of the landlord was paramount, the tenants consented to take farms on the landlords' terms, in order to escape an increase of rent and eviction eventually. They paid a heavy fine, and they secured no reduction of rent in consequence of receiving these fee-simple grants. Unless this Bill passes, those tenants will have to go on paying the old heavy rents, while their neighbours have received some amount of justice. On what principle of fairness should the right to go into Court for a fair rent be given to a tenant with a 99 years' lease, and refused to another tenant who has a longer lease? There is, I repeat, no conceivable difference between the tenants dealt with by the law and those I refer to, except that the case of the latter is much harder. The hon. Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) speaks of a legal position, but what is this House for but to amend a legal position when it is shown to be inequitable. It is because the Chief Secretary is convinced of the hardship of the position and the equity of the claim that he proposes to amend the law. If the hon. Member took the view which generally prevails in this House as to the duties and responsibilities of landlords towards their tenants he is one of the last men who should raise an opposition to this Bill, for on the estate of his father the fee farm rents are so exorbitant as to destroy not only the fee farm interest but even the tenant right of the tenants.

MR. MACARTNEY: The only fee farm grant sold by my father was sold for 30 years' purchase.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. Member's father became the owner of the estate to which I refer in 1866.

MR. MACARTNEY: No.

MR. SEXTON: In 1866, or about that time, and he at once increased the rents; in some cases doubling them. In 1878 he told the tenants he was about to sell the estate, and he advised them to take perpetuity grants. He did not, however, sell the estate, but he holds it now. The hon. Member talks about the fee simple, but these tenants are prohibited from laying down corn beyond such proportion as may be fixed by the landlord, and if they disobey this injunction they are liable to pay a fine of £1 a year for every acre laid down in corn.

MR. MACARTNEY: That is an ordinary provision.

MR. SEXTON: But what benefit do the tenants derive from having, as the hon. Member says, the fee simple? I have said that when Mr. Ellison Macartney became the owner of this estate he increased the rents upon seven out of 12 farms by sums ranging from £7 to £38 a year. In one case the Poor Law valuation was £22 10s.; the old rent was £23, and the new rent, under a grant which the hon. Member says gives the tenant the fee simple, is £63. In another case the Poor Law valuation is £7; the old rent £15, and the new rent £20. In a third case the Poor Law valuation is £8 10s.; the old rent £16, and the new rent £35. In another case the Poor Law valuation is £39; the old rent was £39, and the new rent is £78, or exactly double. The hon. Member is quite right in taking his own course; but if he does so he must take the consequences, both in regard to his father's tenants and other tenants in Ireland. Tenants paying such heavy and unjust rents, no matter what the form of contract may be, are entitled to the interference and protection of the Land Court. The Bill is an extremely moderate one, and really does less than justice. It is only where men are in a certain position of hardship, and landlords will not sell at all, that the tenants will be able to go into Court and have a fair rent fixed. I admit that the position of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will not always permit him to go as far as circumstances demand, or as he perhaps wishes but as we cannot obtain full and complete justice for Ireland in the matter we must be content for the time with what is practicable.

(4.10.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I do not propose to discuss this Bill at any length, nor in reference to any particular estate, but I desire to say that there has never been introduced a more just and equitable measure than the Bill which has been introduced by the Government to-day. I agree with the remark of the hon. Member for South Antrim, that the proper time when the tenants in question ought to have been dealt with was when the Act of 1887 was passed, and the result of their being passed over has been that for four years these unfortunate men have been groan-incoming Council will say, "We are not responsible for the finances, because it was our predecessors who made the estimates. We have no time to examine them." The outgoing Council will say, "We are not responsible, because it is the new Council which spend the money." I am sure the Committee will feel that the opinion of Lord Lingen, Chairman of the Finance Committee of the County Council, both from his great official experience and from the fact that he has presided over our finances from the commencement, is entitled to great weight. He writes to me as follows—

"I cannot conceive how any one who thinks of the consequences can propose that the London County Council shall be elected in March."

He goes on to say that, while he is anxious to be as conciliatory as possible and to meet the views of Government wherever he can, on this point of the date, "we must endeavour to the uttermost to induce the Government to meet our views." I will not put my opinion as adding anything material to the high authority of Lord Lingen, but so far as it goes I would earnestly press the Committee and the Government to accept the Amendment on financial grounds and in the interests of economy. The Parliamentary reasons are scarcely less strong. In any case, the notices for new Bills must be given by the outgoing Council, but if the elections are in November the new Council will have ample time to consider the legislation proposed and determine their policy. On the other hand, by April their Bills may be, and, indeed, will be, in Committee. If the elections are in March, the outgoing Council will be liable to be told in this House that they do not represent London; and, on the other hand, the new Council will have to determine their policy on many points, often of great difficulty and complexity, with scarcely any time for information and reflection; it will take them some time to look into the questions, and till they have done so no one will be able to express the view of the Council. If, therefore, the Committee reject this Amendment, the result will be that every third year London will be paralysed for some weeks in the very middle of the Session, because there will be nobody in this House able to speak on behalf of the London County Council. And this difficulty will not merely arise in connection with the Bills directly promoted by the County Council. The great majority of the Acts of Parliament affecting London are not brought in by the County Council, but by railway, tramway, and other companies. Most of these are in Committee by March, and yet, by this proposal of the Government, the County Council will be deprived of the power of speaking just when it is most necessary it should be actively watching the interests of the public of London. My right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board wishes to make the elections for County Councils uniform. But London is really a municipality, and should be treated as such, and not in the same manner as a country district. If uniformity is desired, surely London elections ought to be at the same time as those of other great cities. November has been found most convenient for the holding of these elections in all towns and cities, and the same consideration applies to London also. Every other municipality holds its election in November, and London desires to do so too. Surely, that is essentially a matter which the London County Council might well be allowed to settle. The reasons given for opposing November are that the next Budget of the Council may show a considerable increase of expenditure, and that the outgoing Council ought to present their balance-sheet to the constituencies before the new election. That, however, is, on the face of it, proposing a permanent inconvenience to meet a single case; and let me point out further, that we should not have to present the Budget in any case, be the election in November or in March. The incoming Council will have to perform that duty, and my Amendment will afford them ample time to examine its details and determine what their policy shall be. Moreover, I see no reason why there should be any serious increase of expenditure next year, and, in saying that, I do so after consultation with the Comptroller and Lord Lingen. In any case, however, if the elections are to take place early in March, and the rate was not made until April, it is evident that the rate will be made by the new Council. The difference, however, is that, under the Bill as it stands, the new Council will have to make the rate immediately after they are elected; while, if the Amendment is carried, they will have time to consider and determine their policy. Let me remind the House that a very large majority of the Council, including those especially responsible for the financial and Parliamentary business of the Council—the Vice Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the Council, the Chairman and Vice Chairman of both our Finance and Parliamentary Committees, our Comptroller and our Parliamentary Agent—are all of one opinion, and strongly of one opinion, namely, that the holding of the elections in March will be seriously detrimental to the efficient government of London. I must apologise for having intruded so long on the Committee; but in the interests of London, and believing that the Amendment is of great importance both with reference to efficiency and economy, I earnestly recommend it to the favourable consideration of the Committee.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 5, at commencement of Clause, to insert the words “except as regards the administrative county of London.”—(Sir J. Lubbock.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

(4.45.) MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): I should like to say a few words as to the views of the moderate and consistent section of the County Council. The right hon. Baronet has very forcibly brought before the House the views of the majority of the Council, whom he represents, but I may remind him that there are those who hold that the ratepayers ought to be considered in the matter, and the information which has reached me induces me to believe that by them March is considered a more suitable time than November. In November we have the School Board elections, and it is very inconvenient to have two big elections in the same month, owing to the extreme apathy of the electors. Again, with regard to the introduction of Bills and the opposition to the Bills, whether the County Council is elected in November or March, the plans must be deposited by the end of November; and it must be remembered that the County Council does not actually expire; there are Aldermen to keep up its continuity; and the Bills are conducted, not by the County Council, but by the agents and counsel they employ. There are, no doubt, members of the County Council who desire to have a finger in the pie, but in my opinion it is not desirable that they should. I am, therefore, not at all sure that it would not be an advantage to the ratepayers of London to have an opportunity of saying at the polls whether they support or oppose a particular Bill promoted by the County Council. I can conceive cases in which a Bill promoted by the Radical and Progressive Party in the London County Council might be extremely distasteful to a large number of ratepayers, who would desire an opportunity of expressing their views on the question, but generally speaking, it is not desirable that the ordinary course in connection with the promotion of a Bill and its progress through Parliament should be interfered with. As to the objection that the new budget will have to be issued by the incoming Council, I did not know that there will be any particular harm in that, as it will afford them an opportunity of revising the estimates. In point of fact the estimates, although only presented in March, are prepared months beforehand, not by one Committee, but by several Committees, which have to make up their minds long in advance as to the work they recommend the Council to carry out, and it is exceedingly desirable that the voice of the ratepayers, who have to find the money, should be heard on the estimates. There is something behind all this opposition, and it has been revealed since the members of the County Council on one occasion voted one way, and on another occasion quite differently. In fact, they did not know their own minds at the time. The leader of the Progressive and Radical Party in the Council (Sir Thomas Farrer), in a letter to the Times, wrote as if the County Council had been taken by surprise by the Bill of my right hon. Friend. But it was perfectly well known for weeks and months beforehand that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to alter the time from November to March. Sir Thomas Farrer forgot to mention an important circumstance, and that was that at a meeting of the Radical and Progressive Party the wire pullers informed them that if they did not upset the previous decision of the Council they would lose their seats. Sir T. Farrer returns to the charge, and in a letter to the Times to-day he says that his former letter carefully avoided all political questions. Of course it did. It would not have done for him to state what had taken place at the meeting of the Progressive and Radical Party. Sir T. Farrer waxes exceedingly wroth; he says that if the Bill is not amended in this respect, it will be intolerable, and that the London County Council will be paralysed and emasculated by what is proposed. If some of its vitality were taken away from it, I am not sure but that it would be a good thing. Unless some very strong reason is shown against it, or the ratepayers feel very strongly on the subject, the Committee ought to adhere to the date mentioned in the Bill. This House has something to do beyond considering the political exigencies of the Progressive Party in the London County Council; its duty is to study the interests of the ratepayers, and their opinion is, I believe, that March is the best month for holding the elections.

*(4.57.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will fall in with the view of the President of the London County Council, which is a very different body from the County Councils in the country, and is, in fact, a great Civic Corporation. The County-Councils in the country have not power to promote Bills in Parliament, but the London County Council has, though, in my opinion, its powers are not yet sufficient. If the election is held in November it will be held on a new register, whereas in March the register will be six months old and 20 per cent. of the electors will have removed. The hon. Member has said that the people of London will desire to have an opportunity of expressing their views on the Parliamentary proposals of the County Councils, but they will have that opportunity if the elections are held in November; and if the constituencies are against the proposals, the Council can alter or withdraw them. The hon. Member who last spoke did not attempt to combat the arguments on the financial aspect of the question, and, as the right hon. Baronet the Member for London University told us, he was supported strongly by Lord Lingen and nearly all the responsible heads in this matter. I think the House ought to give full weight to that authoritative opinion. The election in March, as regards London, would be very inconvenient and very unfair. Further, nothing could tend to make the members of the London County Council more irresponsible than they would be if they were elected at a time when they would have had nothing whatever to do with the preparation of the Estimates, and when Parliamentary work would be so far advanced that they would not be able to interfere with it. Again, if the work done is good, their opponents would take the credit of it; and, if bad, the responsibility would be disclaimed; or if there are any proposals before Parliament that they disapprove, they will not have an opportunity for saying so and stopping the proceedings going on.

*(5.5.) COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): This is an interesting subject which should be approached without any of the Party feeling by which the London County Council is supposed to be divided. In most representative assemblies there are two Parties, but, at any rate, the question for this House is, what will be the better time for the elections? With regard to November the objection is that the register will not be ready until the 31st of December. So that, unless special provision is made to accelerate registration, the election will have to be held upon the old register. That, I think, would be very lamentable indeed. The experience which the Government have had of attempting to accelerate registration has not been of a nature to encourage them to provide a new register for an election in November. The School Board election is undoubtedly to be held in November, but it is upon the rate book, which is a totally different matter. The County Council register is to be revised by the Revising Barrister, who sits in September, and appeals from his decisions could not be heard until later; therefore, I do not see how it is possible to have the election in November except on the old register. It has been suggested that the election should be held in January, but that is usually a season of kindly social intercourse which one would not like to see interrupted by the unkind things which are said during an election. The point has been raised as to the preparation of the County Council's financial budget. I think there would be advantage in the estimates being framed by the Committees which have been in office for three years, and know where economies can be effected. There is another thing which should be considered, that if the new body were to frame the estimates, the whole blame of any miscarriage could be thrown upon them by their predecessors—and we know that it is not uncommon to avoid responsibility. If the election were held in March, the Bill should be made sufficiently elastic to allow the County Council to have the election on Saturday or any other day of the week that might be considered suitable, besides which in March there are some hours more of daylight in which to vote, and, on the whole, I think March has the best of the argument.

*(5.10.) MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): The hon. Member for Marylebone says that this has been made a political question. Who has made it a political question? There is a particular sect of Members opposite who, whenever a County Council Bill is brought forward, act in a hostile and partisan spirit. If a Bill is brought forward by some large Provincial Municipality all descriptions of Members for that town support the Bill. But if a Bill is promoted by the London County Council certain hon. Members opposite feel bound to go in a direction contrary to that pursued by the majority of the County Council. There is nothing political in this question; it is simply administrative and financial. And I would point out that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Lubbock), Chairman of the London County Council, is a staunch supporter of the Government, so that he treats these questions in no Party spirit. Lord Lingen, Chairman of the Finance Committee, abstains from taking any part in these political divisions, and I think it must be conceded that the London County Council is practically unanimous in making this proposal. So far as the action of the Caucus, or Progressive Party, is concerned, I am bound to say that I myself have absolutely abstained from taking any part in Party meetings or Party organisation within the Council. I look upon them as an unmixed evil. This Party feeling is due not merely to our own side, but to an exactly similar organisation or caucus which is supported upon the other side. With regard to November being an unsuitable month for the election, the right hon. Gentleman knows very well that after the last Reform Act, in 1885, November was deliberately chosen for an appeal to the country, and I think we are just as likely to have sufficient time for the electorate in November as in March. London is not in a position parallel to that of any other country. Other County Councils have no power of promoting Bills, and so far as their Parliamentary work is concerned it cannot matter to them when the election takes place. The London County Council inherits all the powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works, which are extensive and considerable, with regard to the promoting or opposition to Bills in this House. This, I repeat, is not an administrative and not a political question, and I hope my right hon. Friend will agree to what is plainly in the interests of the Metropolis.

*(5.15.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I certainly think that March is much the better month for the election. The public would then know whether it was the outgoing or incoming Council that was responsible for any particular action. If we have the election in November it will be upon the old register, and if we have it next March it will be on the register now being prepared. The hon. Member for St. Pancras dwelt a great deal upon political feeling, but I would remind him of the French proverb, "He who excuses accuses." No doubt the introduction of politics is much to be regretted, but it is a fact that politics are brought in; and it is a remarkable thing that the hon. Member did not say one word about what took place between the two meetings of the County Council, at the first of which they deliberately decided to have the election in March, and at the second of which they reversed their first decision in favour of having the election in November. There is a sort of haziness about what transpired. It is rumoured—perhaps the right hon.

Gentleman will contradict me if what I say is not correct — that Mr. Schnadhorst came down—[“Oh!”]—Yes, let us have this out—and pointed out to this so-called Progressive Body that if they had the election in March it would be perfectly fatal to their chances at the next election. That is the real fact. Nobody can get up in this House to gainsay the statement.

*MR. LAWSON: So far as I know there is no truth in it.

*MR. BARTLEY: All I can say is, I should like to get Sir Thomas Farrer and some others into the box and ask them whether any such political meeting were held or not.

*MR. CAUSTON: Does the hon. Member say that the statement is true?

*MR. BARTLEY: I am not a progressive member of the London County Council, but I challenge anybody to dispute the statement. That is how political feeling has been brought in. By the plan proposed the people of London will be in a position to see who has the credit of a reduction of the rates, and who is responsible for the increase of £4,000,000 of debt and an extra 4d. rate. The County Council came to the conclusion that March was the better month, and they changed their minds when politics were introduced, and they thought it would be against them.

*(5.20.) EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): The hon. Member has stated one or two facts on which I would like to correct him. First, he said that the other County Councils throughout the country hold their election in March. Now the cities hold them in November.

*MR. BARTLEY: They are not County Councils.

*EARL COMPTON: I do not wish to quibble on the question. I am speaking of the county boroughs, which hold their elections in November. I am well aware that in the country districts the elections are held in March. Then I wish to correct the hon. Member as to the date of the new register. I am clearly of the idea that it will come into operation on the 24th October.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The new register will come into operation on the 1st January.

Mr. Bartley

*EARL COMPTON: I think the speech of my hon. Friend (Mr. Lawson) is deserving attention. I believe I am called a progressive member of the London County Council, but when I stood I told the electors that I should have nothing to do with politics in the County Council, and it was upon that programme that both Liberals and Conservatives returned me. I regret extremely to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Marylebone talking about there being “something behind” the change of decision which the County Council made. There was nothing political in the change of views, and was it not better that they should withdraw from a conclusion which was proved to be wrong? It was shown that by having the election in March the Finance Committee would only have from the third week in March to the first week in April to decide what the estimate should be. Personally, it seems to me that it is impossible that they can do the work in the time. I should even prefer January to March if it could be so arranged, despite the fears about Christmas festivities, though, at the same time, I think November would be much more convenient. I would point out, further, that the County Council is much more likely to know what is for its own convenience than are Members of this House, who have very little acquaintance with the routine work of the London County Council.

(5.24.) MR. RITCHIE: I am sure the Committee will acquit me of anything like political feeling in promoting this Bill, or in declining to accept the Amendment submitted on behalf of the London County Council. I have no ill-feeling against that body, and I have always done what I can to assist it in carrying out its work. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Lubbock) urged this alteration of date from three points of view—first, the wish of the London County Council; second, the financial question; and, third, the election as connected with the Parliamentary work of the County Council.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: They are not merely our Bills, but those affecting London generally.

*MR. RITCHIE: Exactly; that is what I understand. I do not think the Committee will be surprised that on the first question I cannot accept the representations which have been made, and I must ask the Committee to disregard the last decision at which the County Council have arrived. The action which the London County Council has taken with regard to this matter is, I think, somewhat extraordinary. They first decided that January should be the month, and subsequently they decided in favour of March. It cannot be contended that this decision was arrived at without having all the objections against the month of March before them. Every single objection raised to-day was put before the Council, when they came to a decision in favour of March. I am not going to enter into the reasons which prompted the Council to so speedily rescind the resolutions they had passed. I know nothing whatever of the secret meeting held by the so-called Progressives with regard to this matter, although it has not been denied that such a meeting took place.

*EARL COMPTON: I know nothing about it.

*MR. RITCHIE: Perhaps the noble Lord was laid up with the influenza.

*EARL COMPTON: I know that such meetings take place, but I have not attended any.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: I know nothing of any such meeting. Does the right hon. Gentleman state that such a meeting took place?

*MR. RITCHIE: Oh, I know nothing about the meeting except what I have heard; but I have noticed that it is not denied that such a meeting took place, although, of course, I accept the right hon. Gentleman's statement that he knows nothing about it, and that there was no such meeting.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: I have only asserted that if there was such a meeting I know nothing of it.

*MR. RITCHIE: Well, whether there was such a meeting or not, something or other occurred which altered a large majority for March into a large majority for November. Looking to the fact that that was the third date fixed upon, and also remembering that the noble Lord who spoke last is even now prepared to accept January, I do not think the last decision arrived at by the London County Council would justify the Committee in assenting to the Amendment. This is not a matter on which, in any event, the decision of the London County Council ought to be conclusive. There are other Representatives of the London ratepayers besides members of the County Council. The question affects, no doubt, the financial administration of the London County Council, but it also affects the ratepayers, and we ought to be guided very largely by what is most convenient to the ratepayers. I have received a representation signed by an immense majority of the Members of Parliament representing London constituencies, in which they represent that March would be more convenient. I do not know why the noble Lord (Earl Compton) should smile. He repudiates any political bias.

*MR. CAUSTON: Is the representation signed by Liberals as well as Conservatives?

*MR. RITCHIE: Here, again, we see that hon. Gentlemen opposite, who repudiate all political motives and denounce every one on this side of the House who says a word on the question, are continually introducing politics themselves. It is quite immaterial from the point of view which hon. Gentlemen opposite profess to have adopted whether the representation was signed by Liberals or Tories. The fact remains that the large majority of the Representatives of the ratepayers in this House are favourable to March. The whole basis of the legislation proposed by the Bill is that the time given at present is not sufficient for an election to take place under the new register. The proposal in the Amendment is not to take the same date as that of the municipal elections, which is November 1, but to go to the very end of that month. Another point urged by my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the London County Council (Sir J. Lubbock) has reference to finance. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that the new rate has to be made in the first week of April. I do not find that is so. Last year the estimates were submitted and adopted on March 25, approved on April 7, and the rate was made on April 21.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: What I said was that the vote was passed on the 7th; the rate was formally made on the 21st; and the Vestries complain of the inconvenience resulting from the rate being made so late.

*MR. RITCHIE: My right hon. Friend stated that the rate was made in the first week of April. It cannot be made before April 1, because the financial year terminates on March 31. If the Committee accepts the proposal of the Government that the election shall be in March, the first meeting will be on March 16th, and there will be plenty of time to make the rate even before the time at which the present Council has been in the habit of making it. The right hon. Gentleman objects to the preparation of the estimates by one Council and their adoption by another. In truth the estimates are prepared mainly by the officials, of course in consultation with the heads of Committees, months before they are presented. I believe the preparation begins as early as November. It is not necessary that the estimates should continue to bind the new Council elected in March. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, there are always two rates made in the year. In the Local Government Act express provision was made empowering, and, indeed, almost calling upon, County Councils to revise their estimates after the first six months. So that, supposing that during the first six months of the new Council they revised the estimates handed to them by their predecessors, and they found them in some respects excessive, they would be perfectly at liberty to review them for the second half-year. Who would be damnified or injured by the estimates being prepared by the outgoing Council? If they were insufficient they could be added to; if they were excessive they could be reduced. There are no obvious inconveniences or difficulties in this revision of the estimates by the new Council. Besides the expenditure out of rates, there is the expenditure out of borrowed money. We are told in a letter which I saw in the Times to-day from Sir Thomas Farrer that the estimate for this year is £4,371,000, of which £1,745,000 is to be re-lent to other bodies, and £2,626,000 is required by the County Council itself. It is a very large sum, and very much in excess of the sum required last year, when the total was £2,808,000, and the sum to be re-lent £1,510,000. I do not think myself that there would be any disadvantage in the electors having estimates of this kind before them at the election. The whole administration of the County Council is practically based upon finance, and it would not be a bad thing that the rate-payers should have before them a concrete example of the financial policy of the County Council at the time of the election. It might be that at the time proposed for the election in March there would be no general exposition of the finance of the London County Council before the electors, yet, as notice of the financial Bill would be given in February, the broad features of the financial policy of the Council would necessarily be known, and I do not think that would be a bad thing. Supposing the Money Bill is prepared by the old Council, and the new Council has to administer it, there is no disadvantage in that, because the Bill deals with the maximum sum which has to be raised, and the new Council may take advantage of the maximum given to them in the Bill, or they may not. If they desire to retrench there is nothing to prevent them. Then with regard to the promotion of private business. Notices of Private Bills have to be given in November, and if any have to be opposed the necessary steps must be taken whether the elections are held in November or in March; whilst, as to the policy of the London Council in regard to opposition to Private Bills, it is not likely there will be any great difference of opinion between the old Council and the new. Apart from all other questions, March is by far the most convenient month for the election. The days are two hours longer than in November, when fogs are proverbial and daylight is a great advantage to all concerned in an election. Again, nothing could be more unfortunate than that the School Board election and the County Council election should be held within a few days of each other, not only because it would be difficult to interest the electors in the two elections at the same time, but also because in the School Board election the voting is cumulative and in the County Council election it is not—a difference which may have the effect of losing a large number of votes. As to a revolution being effected in the constitution of the County Council, it is probable that a large number of the present members will be returned again, and I do not think there will be anything like that break of continuity in the work of the Council which some seem to anticipate. For these reasons I ask the Committee to support the Government in adhering to the Bill.

*(5.55.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I will not detain the Committee for more than a minute or two, but I wish to point out that three years ago the right hon. Gentleman carried the Local Government Act, in which all these dates were fixed, and all the objections now taken—meteorological, administrative, or financial—were equally strong at that time. In 1888 the right hon. Gentleman proposed that the municipal year in London should commence on the same date as the municipal year in every other large town in England; and no inconvenience has been experienced in other towns from any of the causes named. Why should the municipal life of London be suddenly severed from the municipal life of the rest of the country? It appears that a majority of London Members of Parliament sitting on the other side of the House have suggested to the right hon. Gentleman that this alteration should be made.

*MR. RITCHIE: No; they did not suggest anything of the kind.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Then the alteration is proposed by the right hon. Gentleman of his own initiative.

*MR. RITCHIE: I did not say so. The alteration was suggested in the House by more than one Member on the Second Reading of the Bill for accelerating the registrations.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: It does not appear that those Members are now present to support the suggestion they made. The right hon. Gentleman said that the London County Council have formed two or three conflicting opinions on the subject of the date of the election. Well, other bodies higher than the London County Council have held different opinions, and yet the right hon. Gentleman does not repudiate their right to represent this country. I must say I do not attach any great importance to the financial or administrative argument. These elections take place once in three years, the Budget is brought in every year, and applications to Parliament are made every year, and if the London County Council are actuated by these dark designs of a political character they will take care not to leave themselves open to attack from opponents on their financial proposals. But what I would rather rest the argument upon is this: that the municipal year of England commences in November, and why should there be a difference as regards the London County Council?

*MR. RITCHIE: They proposed it.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: If there are no better reasons put forward we may well ask what reasons there may be behind? It is a very singular thing that the hon. Members who have distinguished themselves by an unswerving and constant opposition to everything that the London County Council have said or done are the gentlemen who are most anxious that this change should take place. Well, I am not anxious to prolong the existence of the County Council or any other institution for six months longer than Parliament has proposed. The Council was put into office for three years, and I see no reason for prolonging their existence. If they have forfeited the confidence of their constituents, if they have adopted a policy objectionable to those they represent, the sooner they go to their constituents and know their fate the better. I offer a suggestion to hon. Members opposite in reference to municipal elections—and that is, that I do not think they will find the cry about the increase of rates will be a very popular one. There are certain constituencies in which that cry will have force; but even under the cumulative system under which School Board elections are carried on, my experience is that elections turn upon the question of carrying on the municipal work in the best manner, and that the mere cry of saving the rates is not an effective one. I am bound to say I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has made out a case for changing the date he fixed in the Act three years ago and which Parliament with due deliberation sanctioned.

(6.5.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I most certainly agree that this is in no sense a political matter, and it would be foolish to make it so. I repudiate entirely all the statements made about Mr. Schnadhorst and the change being opposed on political grounds, and I do not see the advantage in any way of holding the elections in March. Whether the election is held in March or November, the London County Council will have to answer not for the policy adopted between the two dates, but for the policy pursued over three years. I cannot see that there is any ground for the expectation that the date will have any prejudicial or injurious effect on what is called the Progressive Party on the Council, and that is the view I have taken all along. Why we wish the date to be November rather than March has been sufficiently explained; and I listened attentively to the right hon. Gentleman's statement to see if I could find any crumb of reason for giving the preference to March, but I have found nothing to convince me. Only two reasons do I find advanced. As to the argument based upon the weather in this country, and especially in London, that, surely, is one that cannot carry much weight. This is a very small matter when you have the administrative convenience on the other side. Then, as to what has been said about the School Board elections, the whole of that argument went to show that it is intolerable to have the cumulative system of voting along with the system of Parliamentary and County Council elections. If the School Board elections were conducted in the same manner as the County Council elections, the whole of that argument would vanish. I should welcome the introduction of a Bill to change the system, but this proposal only adds to existing difficulties. But we simply oppose this change from November to March because of the financial and administrative reasons, and we wish the County Council of London to be recognised as a great municipal authority, on the same footing as the Municipalities of other great towns in the country. On these grounds I entirely support the proposal of my right hon. Friend behind me. I may recall to the President of the Local Government Board his own argument used some time ago, that registration was somewhat late, that it was difficult to get the registers out in time, and, therefore, he felt at that time it would be better to accelerate the register in some way. But the Bill fell through in consequence of the complicated difficulties met with.

*MR. RITCHIE: It was not due to complications at all; the Bill was withdrawn in consequence of the determined opposition of a few hon. Members.

MR. J. STUART: Well, surely this is a much less effective way of settling the difficulty. I believe that some hon. Gentlemen opposite think they can gain some political advantage from the proposed change, and I am sorry to find this position taken up. We founded our objections on arguments in no sense political, and these arguments are put forward by men who have identified themselves, and not as politicians, with the work of the London County Council, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Lubbock) and Lord Lingen. The proposed change will land the Council in considerable administrative difficulty. It will not do to say March offers no difficulty. We have to oppose Bills in Parliament, and the policy of the Council in respect to those matters must be shaped before March. There is an important matter to be considered next year, the Metropolitan Water Supply. The policy of the Council in this matter will be dictated by the people of London. You cannot expect a moribund Council to act with any great authority in such a case. Of course, this is a difficulty that may occur every three years. I sincerely regret that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board should have yielded to the political arguments advanced by hon. Gentlemen behind him, and allowed them to influence him against the administrative and financial reasons put forward in favour of the motion of the Chairman of the Council.

(6.15.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): The right hon. Gentleman seems to have forgotten the issue raised by London Liberal Members in relation to the Registration Acceleration Bill. The position we took up had reference to the alteration of the date of the qualifying period.

*MR. RITCHIE: I did not mean to refer to the London Liberal Members especially.

argument seemed to think that because we happen to have two elections in London, the School Board election and the County Council election, the electors might get confused in the use of the two sets of voting papers. But let me recall the fact that in 1885 we had within a few days a School Board election and a Parliamentary election, and I do not think the electorate found any grave difficulty about using the two systems of voting, and this experience should dispel all doubts on this account. I am quite at one with the right hon. Gentleman when he says that this matter concerns Members other than those who happen to be members of the Council. In opposing the change, I will not dwell upon the administrative difficulties, with which I am not familiar, but I urge now, as I urged when the Acceleration Bill was under discussion, we want the largest number of electors to vote on the new register. The election should take place as soon as possible after the register has been made, and I object to March being fixed on account of the long interval after registration and the possible disqualification of a large number of voters. I believe there would be no difficulty in getting the necessary printing done if the work is given to the proper firms, and I shall certainly support the Amendment.

(6.19.) SIR J. LUBBOCK : There are just two points upon which I would say a word. The hon. Member for Marylebone said there is nothing to prevent the County Councils making the rate at an earlier period, but there he is under a misapprehension.

MR. BOULNOIS : The estimates?

SIR J. LUBBOCK : Yes, estimates can be prepared, of course, but the point is about the rate, and that cannot be made up until the close of the financial year. The right hon. Gentleman said that last year we did not make the rate until April 16th, but the rate was passed on the 7th, though it could not be formally made because the Treasury sanction was not obtained. Even so the Vestries have represented the great inconvenience of this having reference to their own statutory objections, and have strongly urged that the rate should be made earlier in April. It is said the new Council could hold their first meeting on March 16th, but then they have to elect chairman and aldermen, and to form committees, which will take some days, and the result would be they would only have some 10 days to consider the estimates. Of course, the clerks would be preparing these in the meantime, but they would have to be approved by the new Council, and 10 days do not allow time for proper consideration. Some hon. Members advocate March because they say that the present Council ought to present the Budget for next year; but whether the election is in November or March, this will be done by the new Council.

(6.33.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I beg to move in line 6, after "councillors," the insertion of the following words, "in each county shall be such day between the first and eighth day of March as the county councils may fix." This is consequential to the decision just arrived at. It is admitted on all hands that the county councils should have seven days from which to select a day most convenient for the election. It would not be desirable for the Councils to stereotype the day.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.33.) MR. GURDON (Norfolk, Mid): I rise to move the substitution of January for March in the Amendment. In our Council there are no political parties, so that the questions which have been discussed on the last Amendment do not arise. We are unanimous in desiring that the month should be January rather than March, and I trust that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, whose desire is to assist the County Councils, will not set his foot down and refuse to consider my appeal. In the Eastern Counties March is about the most inconvenient month of the

it would be foolish to make it so. In the Eastern Counties March is about the most inconvenient month of the year. Though it is said that the days are short, and the weather is cold and gloomy, January has the advantage that it is a slack month—the slackest month in the whole year. There are fewer operations going on in the agricultural world, and in that month the fewest number of meetings are held. I will not repeat the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London, but as to the arguments of hon. Members opposite that in November the elections would have to be fought on the old register, I would point out that they would not apply to my proposal. In January the elections would be fought on the new register; and I would point out, further, in support of my Amendment, that the well-doing of County Councils depends upon the various committees of each Council being able to send in their reports to the Finance Committee in time for the preparation of the budget by the month of March. If the elections do not take place until March the financial reports will have to be adopted en bloc, and will have to be submitted to a Finance Committee that has had no experience. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board at first desired to fix the month of January for the elections, but he changed his mind in consequence of representations that were made to him. I trust he will revert to his first idea, and I, therefore, move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the word “March” and to insert the word “January.”—(Mr. Gurdon.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘March’ stand part of the proposed Amendment.”

(6.36.) SIR R. PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I hope the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board will not accept the Amendment now recommended to the Committee. The arguments which were urged at some length in regard to the previous Amendment are, in my judgment, applicable to the present case. There is nothing new to be said in suggesting that the date should be January rather than March. Whether we regard it from an administrative, or a financial, or any other point of view, it is impossible to fix any date that will not have some inconvenience, but the general balance of opinions points to the date in the Bill as the most convenient. I am not sure whether the hon. Member opposite is a representative on the Central Association of County Councils, but as I have the honour to be a member of that Association, and to have realised what is the general opinion of almost the entirety of the County Councils of England, I am in a position to inform the Committee that the enormous majority of the representatives of the County Councils on that Association have come to the conclusion that the proper date is March, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will adhere to that date. I may say, further, that it is at the instance of that highly representative Association that March has been put in the Bill. It was put in to meet their wishes, not suddenly expressed, but expressed after due deliberation and debate and vote. Over 40 County Councils have come to an unanimous resolution, and I regret that the hon. Member opposite has not been able to enroll himself amongst that large number who continued to impress on the President of the Local Government Board the enormous advantage of fixing March as the date—which date I hope he will adhere to.

MR. HENEAGE: I hope the hon. Member will not press the Amendment. He only speaks for the County of Norfolk. In every other county of England January is considered by far the most inconvenient month for the labourers. It is dark and cold, and very often there is a great deal of snow about. Besides that, in Lincolnshire the month of March will be convenient for other reasons. All the Michaelmas and Martinmas rent audits are being carried out in January, and that, therefore, would be an inconvenient month to have these elections going on. It would be inconvenient for another reason. Looking at the business before us, Parliament may meet early next year, and it would be inconvenient to have these elections going on at the time Parliament meets. At that season of the year, too, there are a large number of meetings being held for charitable and other purposes, and for these and other reasons I think it would to the advantage of the general community to have the elections in March.

(6.39.) MR. S. HOARE (Norwich): I am sorry the hon. Baronet opposite thinks it is a case of Norfolk against the rest of the country. However, I am quite sure the Committee will be willing to listen to what the people of Norfolk have to say, as there is a strong feeling in the County Council there, which has already been expressed by the Chairman (Mr. Gurdon). I think it is only right that we should state what is felt, without repeating the arguments used in the previous discussion, as to the inconvenience of the elections in March, just before the new Budget has to be produced. But I would bring before the Committee one point that has not hitherto been brought before it at all, and that is the inconvenience of having an election during the time that the House is sitting, and when probably every Member of the House is interested—or should be interested—in the formation of his County Council. In many cases Members are candidates themselves for the suffrages of the county voters, and it seems to me it would be highly inconvenient—unless the House were to adjourn for a week during the elections—for those of us who are interested in those elections to have to take part in them whilst Parliament is sitting. The hon. Baronet who has spoken is Chairman of his County Council, and there are many other Chairmen of County Councils in the House. I put it to those gentlemen who have to be elected or re-elected Chairmen whether it would not be excessively inconvenient for them to be elected whilst this House is sitting? Without arguing for or against January, I do think that March would be so inconvenient that the Committee ought not to agree to it.

(6.41.) MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): As I am one of the Members of the House who will suffer inconvenience from the election taking place in March, I wish to give my reasons for supporting the proposal that the elections should take place in that month. It is true that holding the elections whilst Parliament is sitting will inflict a certain inconvenience on Members of the House, but what we have principally to consider is the convenience of the localities and of the electors of the County Councils. I can fully confirm everything that my hon. Friend and Colleague (Sir R. Paget) has said as to the opinion of the County Councils as a whole. At a largely attended meeting of the Executive of the County Councils it was unanimously agreed that March was better than January, and the reason, I think, is obvious. The days are longer and the weather, as a rule, is much better. For myself I fail to see any countervailing argument that has very much weight. The financial argument has been raised. Well, in our county the Finance Committee meets, as a rule, in the latter part of March in order to prepare the Estimates for the April meeting. If the proposal of the Bill is adopted the Finance Committee of the new County Council will be able to meet in the latter part of March and the Estimates can be dealt with in due time. I do not think there will be such a great break in the continuity of the County Councils at the next election as some Members seem to think. As a rule the old members will be elected or, at any rate, many of the members will have had experience and will be able to prepare the Estimates. I hope the Government will stick to their proposal.

*(6.44.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I will not weary the Committee by repeating the arguments I used in the last Amendment, but I desire to say a word on behalf of the Chairman of the Finance Committee and the officials of the London County Council, and to support the hon. Member for Norfolk. If we cannot have November we should prefer January to March, for the reasons I have stated. The hon. Member for Somerset says we have to consider the convenience of the constituents and the electors. But there is something else to be considered besides that, and that is the business of the County Councils themselves. In the counties the organisation is simple and the finance is simple, but in London we stand on a different footing. We strongly support the Amendment. If we are to be considered a County Council we must have the advantages of the position, and in that case Norfolk does not stand alone in urging this Amendment on the favourable consideration of the Government.

*MR. RITCHIE: The right hon. Gentleman frankly acknowledges that the same arguments cannot be advanced for this Amendment for the counties as has advanced for London.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: I am not speaking for any place but London. I should not presume to speak for the counties.

*(6.46.) MR. RITCHIE: It is evident the financial question is much more important in London than in the counties. I understand that, at any rate, so far as London is concerned, the question was considered and decided practically by us as between our date and the date proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. Of course, if the hon. Member opposite succeeds in persuading the Committee to alter the date from March to January, the situation of London will change accordingly. But we consider that March ought to be adhered to in the Bill. I do not wish to enlarge on the argument because a mere statement of the facts is enough. That has been made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Somersetshire, and I can bear out what he says, namely, that so far as we are able to gather the opinion of County Councils generally in the country, they are, with the exception of Norfolk, certainly in favour of March. It is not, as the Chairman of the Norfolk County Council has said, a political question in the counties, whatever it may be in London. That is evident from the deputation that came to me to urge that March should be the month. It was composed of the hon. Member for Somerset, Mr. Andrew Johnson, Chairman of the Essex County Council—at one time known as a staunch Liberal—and Lord Thring; and Mr. Hibbert was to have been present but was unable to attend. The mention of these names will show that the deputation was of a non-political character. What are we to do? We have the opinion of the Executive of the County Councils Association, who say that they are unanimous on the question. We have had from almost every county in England—at any rate, from an enormous majority of them—representations in favour of March in addition to the representations I have spoken of. The sole county in England that has made any representation against March has been Norfolk. I am sorry we are not able to please the County of Norfolk, but I hope if the Committee assents to the retention of March that experience will show that the County Council of Norfolk is wrong in the position it has taken up, and that all the rest of the counties are right. I have very little doubt that that will be the result. I should very much deplore any inconvenience arising to any county, but we feel bound to adhere to what we believe to be the views of the immense majority of the counties.

(6.50.) MR. J. STUART: I trust the House will be perfectly clear that in supporting the progressive majority on this question, we, on this side of the House, are not actuated by those political motives which have been thrown in our teeth. I wish to make it perfectly clear to the House that I give the most absolute and categorical denial to the statements made with respect to the progressive members of the County Council being actuated by any political influence brought to bear by Mr. Schnadhorst or anyone else.

Question put, and agreed to.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Amendments agreed to:—Page 1, line 6, after "councillors," insert—

"(2) The ordinary day of retirement of county councillors shall be the eighth day of March in every third year, and on that day the county councillors then in office shall retire together, and their places shall be filled by the newly-elected councillors, who shall come into office on that day."

"Or such other day within ten days after the ordinary day of retirement of county councillors as the council of any county may from time to time fix for that county."—(Mr. Heneage.)

*MR. HOBHOUSE: I have put on the Paper an Amendment providing that each County Council shall have the power to fix, not only the day, but the hour of its meetings. This is most important because, owing to the long distance many members have to come, the hour at present fixed by Statute is sometimes very inconvenient.

Amendment proposed, after the word "councillors" in the last Amendment, to insert the words "and at such hour."—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

MR. RITCHIE: The words suggested by the hon. Member will not do as they are, but I agree that if we fix the hour of the first statutory meeting the County Council should have the power of fixing its own subsequent meetings, and I will take care the matter is put right.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Further Amendments agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(6.56.) MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): I beg to ask my right hon. Friend whether it is evident that the whole of the elections in each county shall take place on one day.

MR. RITCHIE: The elections for the whole county will take place on the same day, but the days may differ in different counties.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clauses 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, agreed to.

SIR R. PAGET: I beg to move the following new clause which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Sir John Dorington), namely:—

"The declaration required under sections thirty-four and thirty-five of 'The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882,' to be made by a person elected to a corporate office may be made within ten days after notice of the election, or within such extended time, if any, as the county council may authorise, not exceeding three months from the date of the election."

The object of the clause is very simple, and refers to the extension of the time during which the declaration of persons elected to corporate offices may be made. It will easily be seen that cases may arise in which it would be very advisable to have such an extension of time as is here proposed, and I would point out that there is a sufficient limitation contained in the words at the end of the clause, not exceeding three months from the date of the election.

New Clause (Amendment of 45 and 46 Vic. c. 50, ss. 34, 35, and 51 and 52 Vic. c. 41, s. 75, as to the declaration by a member of the council,)—(Sir R. Paget,)—brought up, and read the first and second time and added.

Schedule amended, and agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered to-morrow, and to be printed. [Bill 404.]

STAMP DUTIES BILL.—(No. 304.)

As amended considered.

*(7.5.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to move the new clause standing in my name, after Clause 23, insert the following clause:—

"Any agreement or contract to which a Corporation is a party, and which would not be legally binding upon the Corporation unless under their common seal, shall be chargeable only with the same Stamp Duty as a like agreement or contract would be chargeable with if made between private persons and under hand only, and legally binding upon such persons."

I make this proposal on behalf of the Municipal Corporations throughout the country for the purpose of meeting a disability under which they at present labour, and which occasions a somewhat serious expenditure. If a Municipal Corporation enters into an agreement it has to do so under a 10s. stamp, because it is necessary that the seal of the Corporation should be affixed to Corporation documents. It has been held under a decision of the High Court that all documents coming under corporate seals are liable to the 10s. Stamp Duty, although in the case of all ordinary agreements outside Corporations an agreement is only subject to a 6d. stamp. I know a case in which 600 agreements are being entered into by a single corporate body in relation to the water supply, the subject matter of each of which does not exceed the value of 2s. 6d., and yet a 10s. stamp will be required in each of these cases. This, of course, becomes an additional tax on the rate-payers, and in such cases is, of course, a matter of considerable moment. I would point out that the principle on which this clause is founded is practically admitted in the Schedule of the Bill, because in the case of agreements or contracts made in pursuance of the Highways Act, the Highway Boards are enabled to make agreements which are only subject to a 6d. stamp. As the Highway Board is a Corporate Body, it seems an anomalous state of things that Municipal Corporations alone should be charged the 10s. stamp. It is, I believe, said on the part of the Government that this proposal, if accepted, would involve an alteration of the Revenue; but I believe it is open to me to make a proposal of this character without any real infringement of this objection.

A Clause (Certain agreements under seal to be chargeable as if under hand,) —(Sir Albert Rollit,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(7.12.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. Clarke, Plymouth): My hon. Friend has exactly foreseen the answer I am about to make to his proposal. When the matter was brought before the Grand Committee it was then stated that the proposal was one which would interfere with the Revenue, and it was suggested and maintained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it would be intolerable to introduce into this Bill any alteration in the method of charge affecting the Stamp Duty. That is a matter which must be dealt with on a different occasion, and in a different way. As my hon. Friend says it is not a large matter, as far as the amount affected is concerned, but as a matter of principle, I hope he will be content with having raised the point, and will reserve it for consideration to another time.

Question put, and negatived.

(7.15.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The object of the Amendment I rise to move is, that the sum of £14 in the shape of Stamp Duty now paid by the Imperial Exchequer to the Irish Benchers shall in future be paid to the Solicitors of Ireland belonging to the Incorporated Law Society. In 1791, an arrangement was made by which this money should be paid to the Benchers who then had control over the Solicitors, as a fund in connection with the education of their apprentices, and I am not disposed to say that the arrangement was unreasonable at that time. But a quarter of a century ago the Solicitors of Ireland became an Incorporated Body, and ceased to have relations with the Benchers in regard to the education of their apprentices. Nevertheless this fund has ever since remained in the hands of the Benchers, who, as I have said, formerly discharged the duties now undertaken by the solicitors. It is obvious that this inequitable and grotesque arrangement ought to be brought to an end as speedily as possible. I am aware that the Benchers raised an ingenious plea when the Society of Solicitors was incorporated and this point was brought forward. The Benchers said this money was given to them in 1791 and in respect of the education of apprentices, but in view of the rent of the Four Courts in Dublin. There is no doubt that by Royal Charter the site of the Four Courts was conveyed to the Benchers, but the Charter given to the Benchers reserved all the rights of the Crown, and as the Four Courts were held on their present site from the time of Elizabeth, the Benchers can have no right whatever to any claim for rent in respect of the site on which they stand. I am informed by the Secretary of the Law Society of Ireland that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has promised to make an inquiry into the matter. It is, I think, open to comment that now this Bill is before the House, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not in his place.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. Jackson, Leeds, N.): The Chancellor of the Exchequer is away on other public duties.

MR. SEXTON: That would be an excellent reason for postponing this Bill, but it is hardly a good reason for the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Bill is before this House. At any rate, he promised to consider this matter before the Report stage of the Bill, and I trust the Government will, under those circumstances, accept my Amendment. I hope my hon. Friend will assist me in pressing on the Government for a fulfilment of their pledge that the inquiry promised shall be held before this Bill is passed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 11, line 16, to leave out from the word "treasurer," to end of Clause, and insert the words "Incorporated Law Society of Ireland, and shall be applied as the council of that society shall from time to time direct."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(7.22.) SIR A. ROLLIT: As I was one of the two or three Members who introduced this matter to the Grand Committee I will say a few words upon it. So far as the circumstances are brought to my knowledge, they point to the conclusion to which the hon. Member has referred, namely, that these funds are not at present devoted to their proper purpose, and that those who discharge the duties referred to ought to receive the recompense. Although it is said that some agreement exists which would displace that conclusion, I have not yet seen it. Therefore, in the general merits of the question, I agree with the hon. Member opposite; but I must differ with him as to what passed before the Committee. I think he is under a misapprehension. What I understood was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised an inquiry into the whole matter, but I hardly understood it was to be an inquiry before the Report stage of the Bill, indeed, such an inquiry could hardly have been undertaken so soon. I trust, however, that such an inquiry will be made, and will take place without undue delay. Moreover, I think it will establish the conclusion to which the hon. Member has arrived. If he insists on pressing the matter to a Division, I feel so strongly on the principle asserted by his Amendment that I may feel it my duty to vote with him; but I think that the best way of arriving at a definite conclusion is to assume that, not only will an inquiry be instituted, but that it will have the result he suggested.

*(7.27.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): Without going into the merits of the question between the Incorporated Law Society and the Benchers, I submit two reasons why the House should not, on the passing of this Bill, come to any conclusion on the subject of the Amendment. The first is that it is a Consolidation Bill, and a proposal to divert a considerable sum of money from one important body to another is not a proper subject to be dealt with in such a Bill. The second reason is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has promised an inquiry into the matter, and from the nature of the case the inquiry could not be completed in time for the Report stage of the Bill. Although I do not ask the House to go into the merits of the question, I must say a few words in reply to what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite. There would be much in the case he has put forward if these fees had been granted for services rendered by the Benchers in the matter of educating solicitors' apprentices. But I must point out that these stamp fees were really received by King's Inn in lieu of rent for the site of the Courts, and the arrangement was made as long ago as the last century during the construction of the buildings. This was stated in the Report of the Benchers in 1859, before the Act of 1866 referred to. It is urged that it was not challenged in any way at the time, nor for many years after. The payment commenced in 1791, years before the west wing of the building, now called the Four Courts, was completed, but the building took several years, and it was evidently pending its completion that the arrangement was entered into. There is no doubt that the site of the Four Courts was the property of the King's Inns. This is abundantly proved by charters, Acts of Parliament, and other evidence, going back for several centuries. I have no right to speak on behalf of the Benchers, but I have no doubt that they court the fullest inquiry into the origin of the arrangement under which they receive from the Crown the payments in question.

(7.35.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I think it is a pity that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, who must be fully informed on the point, did not tell the Attorney General for Ireland what was to be the nature of the inquiry promised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I do not pretend to form an opinion as to what may be the result of an inquiry, which is admitted to be much needed. It may be there is something to be said for the contention of the hon. and learned Gentleman that these fees are paid by solicitors' apprentices in Ireland as rent, but surely if it is necessary that rent should be paid, it might be raised in some other manner. It might be paid, for instance, in the same way as compensation was paid for the land acquired for the Royal Courts of Justice in London. These Courts were put up at the Imperial expense, towards which the Irish taxpayer contributed, and why should not the Royal Courts in Dublin be placed on a like footing? But looking at the documents which have been placed before us, I think there is very slight ground for the theory that this was a rent. Hence the necessity for an independent inquiry, as a plain answer has not been given to my hon. Friend's question. I hope he will press his Amendment to a Division. Surely the Government can tell us what sort of inquiry it is intended to institute, who will conduct it, if it will be public, and if all the persons concerned will have an opportunity of being heard.

(7.40.) MR. JACKSON: The Chancellor of the Exchequer promised to look personally into the matter, and also expressed a desire that an inquiry should be held, so that he might be assisted in arriving at a conclusion on the merits. Hon. Members probably know that there has been a correspondence going on on this matter for some time. The Treasury desire to take up a perfectly impartial position. I am not quite sure what kind of inquiry it is possible to institute. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has no power to compel either side to appear before him against their will.

MR. SEXTON: He can tell them that if they do not come he will stop this source of revenue.

MR. JACKSON: That would be a rather strong course to take, and I am not quite sure he has power to do it. He would like to see an inquiry held by some gentlemen agreed upon by the Benchers of King's Inn on the one hand, and the Incorporated Law Society on the other. After such inquiry he will be prepared to introduce legislation, if such is necessary, in order to settle the matter upon equitable terms.

MR. SEXTON: Will the inquiry be held promptly?

MR. JACKSON: Yes.

MR. SEXTON: And conducted by persons unconnected with either of the parties?

MR. JACKSON: As far as my right hon. Friend can secure them.

MR. SEXTON: On that understanding I withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

(7.44.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I rise to move an Amendment in the Schedule, the object being to omit words providing that the Stamp Duty shall be 1d. on a lease of any dwelling-house, for any dwelling-house or part of a dwelling-house at a rent not exceeding the rate of £10 per annum. I have no doubt I shall be met by the objection on the part of the Solicitor General that this being a Consolidation Bill no change in the law is intended, but I will point out that, as the law now stands, it is only in Scotland that leases for one year, where the rent is under £10, can be stamped with a penny stamp. But by this Bill an alteration of the law is proposed, because it is sought to extend that provision to England and Ireland. Of course, I do not take exception to that. By all means let the law be uniform, although I believe I could show good reasons why this provision should apply only to Scotland, as there the leases are usually verbal, while in other parts of the United Kingdom they are in writing. I contend that by making this alteration in the existing law you open the door for my Amendment. In the case of Scotland it is felt that the law by which the same Stamp Duty is charged for a lease for one year as for one of 35 years is a very great hardship. In Scotland the practice is to have one year verbal leases, whereas in England the leases usually run for 7, 14, or 21 years, and as the Stamp Duty is the same for one year as for 35 years, the result is that the people of Scotland have to pay it 7, 14, or 31 years as often as the people of England have to. In Scotland this is felt to be a very great grievance. As the practice of having verbal leases is often found to be inconvenient, it is proposed that the leases should be in writing, and that the Stamp Duty should be a penny, no matter whether the rent is under or above £5. It may be said that there should be a difference made between a £10 and a £100 rental, but there is a clear answer to that, inasmuch as a penny receipt can be given for any amount. I believe that as a matter of fact in Glasgow hardly a single lease for a year has the Stamp Duty paid upon it; but if the clause is insisted upon as it stands, tenants will be put to the inconvenience of having a mere verbal agreement instead of an agreement reduced to writing, and therefore the Exchequer will not reap any benefit at all by this Stamp Duty. It is unfair to raise revenue in a form which enables 99 people out of 100 to evade contributing to it; taxation should be on a fair and equitable basis, so that everyone should contribute a fair share. The Revenue would gain, and not lose, by the adoption of this Amendment. This matter was placed before the Chancellor of the Exchequer recently by a deputation from Scotland, and the right hon. Gentleman seemed impressed by their arguments. He promised to consider the possibility of making the change asked for, and I do urge that this is the only convenient opportunity likely to arise this Session. I may add that this matter affects the general public even more than landlords.

Amendment proposed, in page 63, line 31, to leave out from the word "at," to the word "annum," in line 32, both inclusive.—(Mr. Caldwell.)

(7.50.) SIR E. CLARKE: I can only make the answer which was given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the same reasons were advanced by the hon. Member in Committee. The hon. Member suggests that the proposed change would lead to an increase in the Revenue of the country, but that is not the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But whether there will be an increase or a diminution, this is a matter which belongs to a Budget Bill, and not to a Consolidation Bill. Surely the burden of taxation upon a particular class is not an admissible topic to enter upon when the House is considering the consolidation of the laws relating to Stamp Duties.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The Solicitor General has not replied to my hon. Friend's arguments as to the alteration which the Government is proposing to make in the law in the interests of England and Ireland. Of course we do not object to the extension of the privilege of a penny Stamp Duty.

MR. JACKSON: It is done for the sake of uniformity.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: But still it will affect the Revenue. I think good grounds have been made out for adopting this Amendment. There is a great consensus of Scotch opinion in its favour, and we believe that while it will increase the revenue, it will put contracts in Ireland on a more satisfactory footing.

(7.53.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I may state in fairness to my hon. Friend it is the tenants rather than the property owners who will gain by this change. In the case of verbal leases it is necessary to have a witness, and that witness is usually someone in the employ of the landlord or his factor, therefore any dispute usually results unfavourably to the tenant. I think my hon. Friend has done good service in bringing this matter forward. His proposal would ensure complete uniformity throughout the United Kingdom, and I do submit that this is an opportune moment for making the change. In the past the Chancellors of the Exchequer have been obstinately blind to their own interests in this matter. I trust that my hon. Friend in order to emphasise his protest will press the Motion to a Division.

(7.55.) MR. J. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): The Amendment expresses the general sense of inconvenience felt under the present system. It is obvious that a verbal instead of a written agreement must lead to enormous inconvenience. I would suggest that there should be a penny duty on leases under £25. If no concession is made, I hope my hon. Friend will go to a Division.

(7.56.) The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 40.—(Div. List, No. 327.)

STAMP DUTIES MANAGEMENT BILL. (No. 305.)

As amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

WESTERN HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS (SCOTLAND) WORKS BILL.—(No. 396.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(8.6.) DR. McDONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to move the insertion of the words "the county council of Ross and Cromarty and the district Council of Lews" after the word "Scotland," in line 10. The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave us a promise the other night that none of this money would be spent except with the consent of the County Council of Ross and Cromarty and the District Council of Lews. I think it would be quite as well if, instead of having a mere understanding to this effect, we inserted distinct words in the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, after "Scotland," to insert "the county council of Ross and Cromarty and the district council of Lews."—(Dr. McDonald.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I hope the hon. Gentleman will not press the Amendment. The Government entirely adhere to what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said, namely, that no roads in the island will be proceeded with under the present scheme, except with the approbation and concurrence of the County Council. It will be obvious to the hon. Gentleman that the Central Governing Authorities which have the duty of dispensing this money, and are responsible for it, stand in a different statutory position from the County Council. The hon. Member will be satisfied, I hope, with the assurance that the County Council will be taken along with the Government in what is being done, and I am happy to know that matters are even now harmoniously proceeding in the communications with the Local Authorities.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I hope my hon. Friend will not think it necessary to press this Amendment. At the same time, the Chancellor of the Exchequer got this special Vote on the express condition that the County Council or District Council was to determine as to the expenditure of the money. I held then, as I hold now, that to expend £15,000 on the Carloway road would be a misuse of the money; and probably the Secretary for Scotland is already aware of that from the representations of his engineers.

DR. McDONALD: In face of the assurance of the Lord Advocate I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2.

(8.10.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to move to add to Sub-section 3 of the clause the words

"The county council may also, before resolving to proceed as aforesaid, determine the boundaries of the special harbour or local works district, and such district shall be liable to special taxation under sub-section (25) hereof."

My Amendment is intended to facilitate the object of the Bill. The Government evidently intend that there shall be small harbours, piers, and boat slips made for the convenience of the crofters in the localities, and what I propose is that these various little communities shall be formed into special districts with the object of getting a local contribution towards the work. For that purpose it is necessary to form them into a special district, following the principle of the Public Health Act, which sets up special drainage and water districts. We cannot expect the people of Ross-shire in the mainland, far away from the sea, to be heavily taxed for the purpose of a harbour away on the west coast. The Amendment, therefore, is to form a special harbour or works district whereby the parties, both landlord and tenant, who are to get the benefit of the works shall contribute towards them in the only way in which we can get contributions from a locality.

(8.15.) MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to move an Amendment in the previous line? [Mr. CALDWELL: Certainly.] I am anxious that Nairn should be included amongst the counties that are to get the benefit of the Bill. I have a very considerable acquaintance with the County and Borough of Nairn. The people of Nairn are essentially of the same class as those to whom the Bill applies. They are engaged in the same fishing, and require the same harbour accommodation; and as they have already got a harbour, which, however, does not meet the necessities of the case, I trust the Lord Advocate will see his way to accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 13, after "Cromarty," to insert "Nairn."
—(Mr. W. M'Laren.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Nairn' be there inserted."

(8.18.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: One result of there being no notice of this Amendment is that the hon. Member for the county (Mr. Seymour Keay), who is chiefly interested, and whose assiduity is unquestionable, is not present, and I therefore rather conjecture that the County of Nairn does not substantially desire the benefit suggested by the hon. Gentleman, who, with great deference, is quite an outsider. The proposal, however, is subject to very great objection. If there is to be a competition of this kind raised, every Scottish Member will at once come forward with a claim on behalf of his own constituency. The matter must be regarded strictly within the four corners of the Vote, and the proper time for raising any question as to the scope and application of the grant was when the Vote was taken.

MR. M'LAREN: I may be permitted to say that I am not altogether an outsider, for on a former occasion I was a candidate for the burghs of which Nairn forms one. On that occasion I pledged myself, at the earnest request of the people of Nairn, to do anything I could to forward their interests.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 14, after "gift," insert "the county council may also, before resolving to proceed as aforesaid, determine the boundaries of the special harbour or local works district, and such district shall be liable to special taxation under sub-section (25) hereof."
—(Mr. Caldwell.)

(8.24.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The proposal of the hon. Member (Mr. Caldwell) is open to very serious objection. The proposal of the Government is that the body which is to have the responsibility is the County Council; and, accordingly, the natural area of rating is to square with the area for which the administrative body is elected, namely, the county. The effect of the hon. Gentleman's proposal will be that members of the County Council, drawn from other portions of the county, will have no compunction at all in the matter of administration if they can put the cost upon one district which they do not represent. Several hon. Members must be aware of the exceedingly heavy rates which exist in some parts of the Highlands. The County Council has this year been representing that the burden on the ratepayers in the Island of Lewis is excessive and intolerable. Therefore, I cannot say that I think we would be justified in proceeding to pile on heavy rates of this kind, and I trust the Committee will not agree to the Amendment, which is really unnecessary.

(8.27.) MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): With regard to this Amendment, I feel we have not had time to ascertain the feeling of the County Councils themselves. The Amendment is one which is particularly fitted to be remitted to the County Councils for consideration. At the same time, I quite agree with the Lord Advocate that there are difficulties in the way. It would be a grievous burden, indeed, for poor localities to have a special rate imposed upon them for harbours. I do not feel competent to express an opinion on the matter one way or another; but, at the same time, I certainly appreciate the difficulties suggested by the Lord Advocate, especially having in view the peculiar circumstances of some of the districts.

DR. McDONALD: There are very considerable difficulties in dealing with this subject. The Island of Lewis requires a great many harbours; but as most of the members of the County Council belong to the mainland, the difficulty is to get that body to proceed in the matter. From that point of view, I can see a difficulty in assenting to the proposal of my hon. Friend. The Island of Lewis may be sacrificed by the mainlanders, because they would have to bear the brunt of the taxation, getting nothing of the benefit. That is an important point, and I should like to know how that can be avoided.

(8.30.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I have a similar Amendment, to permit a special assessment in a parish as well as in the county, but my proposition is only a 1d. rate for the whole parish. The Amendment of the hon. Member goes beyond that; he would permit a 6d. rate in addition to the 1d. rate for the county. This certainly contemplates a large rate, but I do not see why it should not be inserted in a permissive form, for there is a great deal to be said in favour of special areas of taxation. The only question is, whether you should have a smaller area than the parish, and whether there would not be bookkeeping difficulties in the working of the scheme. It would tend very much to remove difficulties if the County Council could come to terms with a parish, or those who desire the outlay, by which those particularly interested should take upon themselves voluntarily an extra rate. Under such circumstances, I think you would have more works carried out by the County Council, and I think perhaps a 3d. rate would be sufficient. I do not think very much harm could be done, for it would only apply within a special radius, and to one or two parishes, for, of course, a harbour might benefit adjoining parishes. The decision should be arrived at by a decisive majority of the ratepayers—say three-fourths or two-thirds—and, of course, the machinery for this would have to be provided. It could not do much harm, and it might enable the County Council to carry out schemes for the benefit of a particular parish, which otherwise they would be unwilling to undertake. I am in favour of some proposal of this kind.

(8.33.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The proposal of the hon. Member is that a 6d. rate should fall upon one district after the whole of the county has been assessed at 1d., the 6d. rate not being exacted by the County Council. I think the logical mind of my hon. Friend has overlooked the objection there is to this. A heavy burden might be imposed upon the

Island of Lewis, from which the mainland would be exempt; and the island would have but a fractional share in the administration, to the extent only of its representation on the Council. There is, I think, the gravest possible objection to the scheme, on the ground that it would make one set of people administrators while other people were to find the money. I do not think that it is necessary, plus the rate which the Bill proposes, to hold out the prospect of a 6d. rate; not only is it unnecessary, but the idea would have an injurious effect by frightening people as to future taxation. The prospect of a 6d. rate would, I think, have a tendency to rather retard than advance an improvement.

(8.35.) MR. CALDWELL: There is nothing novel about the proposal to impose an exceptional rate on a particular district; it is precisely what we have in the Public Health Act. I am anxious that this amount of money should be availed of to the fullest extent, and that works should not be hindered, because they will confer a benefit only on a limited area, the county, as a whole, not being interested. Of course, the 6d. rate may seem a large addition to the already heavy local burdens; but the effect of making harbours will be enormously to add to the industry and well-being of the people, and the consequence will be that there will be less poor rate to pay. That is the meaning and intention of the proposal. But, of course, I do not wish to interpose any obstacle in the way of carrying out the scheme of the Government. I suggest this as a means whereby I think works would be undertaken and carried out through the increased interest in a locality. I have no wish to press the proposal. (8.38.)

(9.12.) DR. CLARK: I would ask the hon. Member to withdraw the Amendment in order that the matter may be considered before Report, and because the hon. Member for Nairn, and another hon. Member who is interested, are not here. The hon. Member for Sutherland has only one island; I have only one, and my hon. Friend sitting near me (Dr. McDonald) has only one. The islands will be seriously affected by this; and as there is no machinery for ascertaining the opinions of the people, who should be largely in favour of it before they are taxed, I think it would be better for the Amendment to be withdrawn at present so that the subject can be raised again on Report.

DR. McDONALD: I agree with my hon. Friend in thinking that the Amendment should be withdrawn for the present. It is true, as the hon. Member beside me has stated, that I represent only one island, but that island is a large one, containing 7,000 people, and it is important that they should not be sat on by the mainland. And yet that will happen in the case of all the islands unless something is done in the direction of this Amendment. I think, however, that we should take the matter up on Report in a much more drastic manner than we do now, and provide means to prevent the islands from suffering injustice.

(9.15.) MR. CALDWELL: There is a provision in the Bill whereby a rate may be levied on those using the harbour. That may be right, but what we want to insist on is that these harbours will be of immense service to the mainland within a certain area. The landed proprietors will derive benefit from the works being in their neighbourhood, and yet there is no power to compel them to subscribe. The object of the Amendment is to impose a certain taxation on those who certainly will reap enormous benefit from the works. Taxation should be imposed not only on the landlords, but on the tenants. I recognise that we should require a large amount of machinery for the creation of the necessary Local Authority to carry out the Act within the district to be benefited. That machinery can only be provided by a succession of clauses to be introduced on Report. With the object of giving an opportunity for those clauses to be prepared I withdraw the present Amendment. The Government will understand that I do not wish to place any obstacle in the way of the carrying out of the Bill, but that my desire is to make the measure more efficient.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(9.18.) DR. CLARK: I beg to propose an Amendment to permit the County Council, if they think proper, to use the special grant made under the Local Government Act, 1889. Under that Act £10,000 was given to the counties, a limit being attached to the use of it. This Amendment will enable them to make a special subscription towards harbours, piers, or boat slips from that money. There will also be a Supplementary Estimate giving to Scotland an equivalent to the assisted education grant in England. This will probably be only for one year, and the great bulk of the work will be carried on for only one year. This Amendment will permit the County Council to use the sum during the year for the development of the piers and harbours. It is only a permissive clause. I do not know what the supplementary grant will be, but I understand there is to be one given to Scotland, and I therefore wish to give them permissive power to spend it in this way.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 14, after "gift," to insert "The county council may also use their portion of the ten thousand pounds granted to them by the first sub-section of the twenty-second section of 'The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,' and any sum that may be granted to them by the Supplementary Estimate making a grant to county council in Scotland equivalent to the assisted education England grant as a subscription towards the construction of any small harbour, pier, or boat slip."—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(9.20.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: As regards the Supplementary Estimate, I do not think it would be wise to adopt any such proposal. The Government have indicated to the House the proposals they are prepared to make on the subject, and it would be departing from the very general and entirely uncontroversial proposal which has been made—as to the application of the sum to be given to Scotland—if we were to accept an application to any specific purpose, such as the hon. Member suggests. I therefore hope that the House will not encourage the suggestion. As to the sum of £10,000 granted to the Highland counties under the Act of 1889, I have something quite different to say. I cannot help thinking that that is a very good idea. I believe the hon. Member for St. Rollox has made a suggestion of a more general kind in a new clause he proposes to move. In the Amendment under consideration the hon. Member proposes to authorise any County Council, if so advised, to take its share of the £10,000 and give it as a subscription to a proposed new harbour. The Member for St. Rollox in the new clause proposes that in place of that the share of the county shall be available for the purposes of the Act. I do not suppose the hon. Member for Caithness attaches any special importance to a county taking the initiative, and paying down as a subscription its share, and probably the hon. Member is in general sympathy with the Member for St. Rollox. The best plan of harmonising these views, and giving effect to the hon. Member's own idea, would be to invest a power in the County Council at the end of Sub-section 26 to make available their share of this money for the making up of any deficit which might arise upon the construction of harbours, of which the County Council were the administrators. I would therefore propose to insert, at the end of Sub-section 26, the following:—

"Provided also that for the purpose of meeting any such deficiency the county council may apply any moneys falling to them under the provisions of section 22, sub-section 1, of 'The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,' as if such purpose were one of the purposes to which such money may be applied under the provisions aforesaid."

In general, therefore, I accept this Amendment, but I should propose that the words I have quoted should be inserted at the end of the sub-section.

(9.24.) DR. CLARK: I do not think that would serve the object I have in view. What I desire is that if the County Councils want to get the Government to spend money for harbour construction they shall back it up by themselves, giving a proportion of the special grant which is given only to those counties. I want the County Council to have this money, and to be able to give a subscription or a grant towards any scheme which they think ought to be carried out. They have now the power of using this £10,000 for any purpose they think proper in reducing taxation. They also have the power of using the residue of the grant either for the purpose of reducing taxation or for technical education. I desire that they should be able to use the sum given by this Bill either for promoting the establishments of piers and harbours or for reducing taxation. The 26th clause only affects works that have been constructed out of money granted by Parliament, which money has not been sufficient to defray the whole cost of construction. I want to go beyond cases of that kind.

(9.27.) MR. CALDWELL: The £10,000 was granted to the Highlands in connection with exceptional works, and if this Bill had been before Parliament at the time there is no doubt that the sum would have been specially appropriated to the objects mentioned in it. As it is, the £10,000 might be held not to apply to the purposes of the present Bill. It is true that if the money is applied to other purposes there will be less taxation, but there is this difficulty: that Sub-section 26 applies to any case of deficiency in construction. I intend to move to leave out the sub-section altogether; and, therefore, I can hardly consent to a proviso being added to a proviso which I think had better be left out altogether. The object of my Amendment is to give to the County Council the power to apply the £10,000 to the purposes of this Bill in the same way as money is applied by the Local Government Act to the purposes of that Act.

(9.30.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I should be inclined to accept the hon. Member's proposal with this modification, that in lieu of the words "purposes of this Act," the words shall read "purposes of Sub-sections 25 and 26 of this Act." I agree with him that what we aim at is to strengthen the resources of the counties referred to out of this fund for the purposes of harbours, and I ask how can we do that better than by placing at their disposal for the purposes of the Act the moneys in question? You will give them good heart to enter on these works by the additional resources placed at their disposal,

DR. CLARK: Are we to take it that the right hon. Gentleman means for the cost of harbours as well as for the construction of harbours for the purposes of the Act?

MR. CALDWELL: The hon. Member surely does not suppose that Sub-sections 25 and 26 will have that effect.

DR. CLARK: I will wait and see what else may be proposed, and, in the meantime, will ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(9.35.) DR. McDONALD: I now beg to move as an Amendment, in line 17, after "from," to insert "the district committee, or." This will require that the County Council shall concur with the District Committee, and I would point out, as showing the necessity of this, that in these islands there is no one to take the lead in such matters, and where they have to send to Glasgow for an engineer to prepare plans and estimates the expense is very considerable. If the District Committee are consulted about these matters they can act for the whole of the Islands, and can take the lead in these matters with the money at their disposal, inasmuch as they have the taxation of the district at their back. If, however, it rests with the persons locally interested to incur the preliminary expenses, the Act will frequently be inoperative, because those in the locality will not undertake the cost.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 17, after the word "from," to insert the words "the District Committee or."—
(Dr. McDonald.)

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Although this is only a small matter, I hope the Committee will stand by the Bill as it is. I ask, is it too much to say that the persons locally interested shall be at the initial cost of the plans? The proposal of the Amendment is that, as those locally interested are unable to bear the expense, it shall fall on us; but the first condition of applying for Parliamentary money is that, where there is a desire on the part of those living in a particular locality to have certain works done for their benefit, they should at least go to the expense of proving that those works are really essential.

(9.40.) MR. CALDWELL: But if in some of these localities the persons locally interested are to be at the preliminary cost, how are you to get them to act? If you form them into a district you will then have a body able to do what is necessary. If you formed the localities into districts the districts would be taxed for the preparation of the plans. How, under the proposal of the Bill, are you to get at the persons locally interested? Who are they? How is it possible for the County Council to levy a tax upon them? If you propose to tax the people locally interested you must form them into districts and create some kind of autonomy whereby you can assess them.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I concur in the objection of the Lord Advocate to entertain a proposal of this kind unless there are some means of getting the initial cost from the people locally interested. At the same time, I think the right hon. Gentleman will admit that as the Bill stands it is hardly fair, because if you make those locally interested the responsible parties and entrust them with the duty of preparing plans, and the County Council, which is to be consulted, are to recover the money from those locally interested, that does not seem to be a businesslike proposal. Therefore, I think the alternative is to leave the expense with the County Council, or to put it, as the hon. Member for St. Rollox proposes, on the District Committee.

(9.45.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The whole question is this: By this Bill we say that an application in respect of these works is to be forwarded to the County Council, but the people forwarding these applications are not to spend the county rates in obtaining plans and specifications for works that may prove to be abortive.

DR. CLARK: I am inclined to support the Government in this matter as the result of my experience of the Crofters' Act in regard to the provision of boats. I would point out that under Sub-section 3 the County Council have, first, to see what local support is to be given, and if the people of the locality are not prepared to subscribe the cost of the plans the works can hardly be worth having. The amount is very small, and there are always local engineers employed at the different harbours from whom plans and specifications may be had at a very slight charge. I think the districts immediately concerned ought to subscribe. They may get subscriptions from the landlords. In one of the islands there were two landlords who were willing to subscribe £50 each for preliminary expenses, because they knew they would benefit from the increased value of their land caused by the new harbour works as much as the crofters.

(9.50.) DR. McDONALD: I did not suggest that it was for want of public spirit that the people locally interested would not pay the preliminary expenses, but because they could not afford it. My hon. Friend on my right says, "If a locality will not pay it ought not to be helped." But there are many who are so poor that they cannot spend the money. Are they not to be helped? I say it is not right to compel a few persons to go to this expense, and refuse to back them up if the works they ask for are not made. In a great many of the islands this Act will prove useless for want of means to pay the preliminary expenses.

Amendment negatived.

Another Amendment made.

MR. CALDWELL: I now move to leave out Sub-section (26). As the Bill now stands there is no limit to the amount of taxation imposed. This is an important matter, because in the case of harbours it is almost impossible to tell what the cost will be. It is provided that the locality getting the benefit of the works shall be liable to special contributions respecting them; and I think it most unfair that the adjacent landed proprietors, whose property will be immensely improved by these works, are not to be called upon to contribute any more than landed proprietors living 25 or 50 miles away. The whole county assessment should be liable for any deficiency in the construction of the works.

Dr. Clark

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I do not think the hon. Member will seriously press this proposal. The case is simply this: The County Council approach the Government with a plan for a harbour and undertake to do the work. They therefore derive all the benefits arising from the administration of those works, but the hon. Member proposes that nevertheless they are not to be liable for any deficiency in the cost of construction. I say that that is a plan which has no bottom in it, and which merely gives a sham system of administering harbours to the body which has undertaken their construction. For Parliament to sanction a proposal of this kind would, in my opinion, be utterly absurd.

(9.55.) DR. CLARK: We have had one or two serious examples of what may happen in regard to the construction of these works. In the case of the Wick Harbour the Treasury came to the assistance of the Corporation because they had compelled them to adopt a plan by which a great many thousands of pounds were literally thrown into the sea, and in the case of any of these harbours there is always the possibility that the works may be destroyed by a sudden storm. I think, therefore, that if the Government give the County Council power to construct such works they ought to bear a portion of the expense, because the Government have considered the plans and estimates as well as the County Council, and their approval ought to be accompanied by the consequent responsibility.

MR. CRAWFORD: I think it would be very prejudicial to the interests of the public if the County Council were not to be responsible for the completion of the works within certain limits, but within those limits they ought not to shirk the responsibility of providing the necessary funds.

MR. CALDWELL: If the County Council are to be entirely responsible, the result will be that they will refuse to sanction any harbour works at all;

because it has been shown to be impossible to estimate the cost of construction before these works are commenced. I regard this sub-section as a practical estoppel to this transaction, and that is why I proposed my Amendment that the locality reaping the benefit of a harbour should bear the loss up to a certain point.

DR. CLARK: Might I suggest a compromise? In Sub-section 25 there is a limit of 1d. in the £1 for maintenance, but this sub-section contains no limitation at all. Would it not be possible to insert a limitation, say of 6d. or 1s. in the £1?

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: I beg to move, in line 15, to leave out "two" and insert "five." My object is to make the Bill applicable to a class of cases at present entirely excluded from it. Why it should be so I am entirely at a loss to understand. The House has already voted for harbour purposes £40,000, and the whole sum wanted for piers and harbours is only £43,000. It has already been pointed out that a great deal of money will be absorbed in preliminary expenses, and that there are many things which cannot be done without going through a very costly and dilatory process. As I understand it, there is no justification whatever for the introduction of this Bill, except in the matter of this grant for harbours, and it was upon that grant alone that I advocated the bringing in of the Bill. I wish to substitute £5,000 for £2,000 in order that the provision may cover cases in my own constituency. I should like to know what defence the Lord Advocate has to give for his proposal as it stands. No doubt there is a dispensing power on the part of the Chief Secretary for Scotland, and if I get a promise that it will be used and applied to cases in my own constituency I shall be satisfied. I beg to move the substitution of £5,000 for £2,000.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 15, to leave out the word "two," and insert the word "five."—(Mr. Angus Sutherland.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'two' stand part of the Clause."

(10.2.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I hope, in the first place, the Committee will understand this provision by no means limits the grant of money to the smaller harbours under £2,000. It merely applies a limitation to the smaller harbours by the short and somewhat arbitrary plan of fixing the details in which these harbours are to be carried out. As regards the larger harbours, it would be considered somewhat harsh of the Government to prescribe to the Local Authorities what are to be the precise conditions under which the harbours are to be administered. It is not merely a question of cheapening the cost, but it is also a question of stereotyping and making definite and somewhat rigid the conditions which are so to be applied. Some Harbour Authorities have already got Provisional Orders, and they merely require adjustment for the increased money.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: That must be only in the case of harbours begun years ago.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Precisely. I am speaking only of some harbours, of which Ness is one. The hon. Gentleman has shown a natural anxiety about the grants of money already made, but he may be quite certain that the Secretary for Scotland—to say nothing by way of prejudging anything that may be submitted to him—will consider the fact of the money having been voted as one of the considerations to be borne in mind. I cannot, however, give a promise as to the particular cases mentioned. It is obvious that it is the interest of the House and of the Government to give fair play to what is an experimental proceeding with regard to Provisional Orders, and the experiment must be cautiously administered, not the least in the interests of the localities themselves. Never before has Parliament agreed to a proposal for the wholesale granting of Provisional Orders.

(10.6.) DR. CLARK: Surely the Lord Advocate does not contend that the people should be at the cost of obtaining Provisional Orders in the larger cases. If so, then nothing can be done until next Session, and there is no necessity to vote the money. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider that the cases of the harbours in Sutherlandshire and Skye which have been mentioned are exceptional, and that they will be dealt with accordingly. With regard to the limit of £2,000 I agree that that is rather low, and I think it might well be extended to £3,000. £2,000 is a very small sum for constructing a harbour; it might suffice to make a boat-station or to throw out a little breakwater, but £3,000 is the least with which a decent fishing harbour can be secured. If the Government agree to substitute £3,000 for £2,000 they will improve the Bill, and it should be remembered that it will still be impossible to do anything without the sanction first of the County Council and then of the Secretary for Scotland. I hope that in this case the Lord Advocate will fight our battle against the Treasury.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: I have no desire to unduly press the right hon. Gentleman on this point, but I do regret the Lord Advocate is not in a position to give me a more definite answer in regard to the harbours I have mentioned. I therefore feel myself compelled to divide the Committee on the Amendment.

(10.10.) DR. CAMERON: Why will not the right hon. Gentleman meet us half way and, to use a sporting phrase, "split the difference"?

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I think the Government should respond to the appeal made by my hon. Friend. I am not acquainted practically with the work of harbour construction, but it seems hardly possible to construct even the smallest harbour for a sum of £2,000. If money is to be given for the construction of these harbours such a figure should be mentioned in the Bill as will make the provisions operative.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I quite agree it is impossible to make a harbour for £2,000. As Chairman of the Piers and Harbours (Ireland) Commission I am sure of that. Some years ago, when labour was cheaper, it might have been possible to do it for £2,500, but even that is not now possible. I think the Government ought to fix a sum of £3,000 or £4,000.

MR. D. CRAWFORD: The Lord Advocate said it was not desirable to issue these Provisional Orders on too lavish a scale, and that it was better the Bill should be limited to comparatively small undertakings. But may I remind him that the requisites of Provisional Orders will already have been fulfilled in these cases, because a Government inquiry has been held as to the utility and expediency of these undertakings, and full publicity given to the matter. Seeing how very little can be done for £2,000, I think it would be wise to raise the figure.

(10.24.) Original Question again proposed.

DR. CLARK: Cannot we have some kind of compromise? I move to insert the figure of £2,500.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. CLARK: I think, Sir, it would be in order for me to move the insertion of "five hundred," as the figure 2 still stands in the clause.

*Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 15, after "two thousand," to insert "five hundred."—(Dr. Clark.)

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The sum of £2,000 was arrived at after very careful consideration by the several Departments concerned, and we cannot alter it.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

New Clause—

(Amendment of 52 & 53 Vic. c. 50, s. 22.)

"Sub-section (1) of section 22 of 'The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,' is hereby amended to the effect of authorising county councils in receipt of the annual grant of ten thousand pounds to apply the proportion affording to them respectively or any portion thereof to the purposes of this Act, or in relief of local taxation for the purposes of this Act in such county,"—(Mr. Caldwell.)

—brought up, and read the first and second time.

Amendment proposed, in line 5, after the words "purposes of," to insert the words "section 2, sub-sections 25 and 26 of."—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

DR. CLARK: What is the meaning of this Amendment? If it is to limit the powers of the County Council, I should prefer the clause as it stands. As it now stands the money will be used for any purpose under the Act. I do not see why it should be limited as the right hon. Gentleman proposes.

(10.28.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: My object is to limit the clause. I have no doubt that if the clause in its present form is allowed to stand no Court will allow money to be spent except under under Sub-sections 25 and 26, which are the sub-sections which deal with the executive powers of the County Council in spending money. I therefore prefer the gloss which I have ventured to put on the generality of the clause.

DR. CLARK: I am not at all satisfied with this explanation, and shall press my objection to a Division. What I want is that when Parliament votes a special sum for a special district the County Council shall not have power to say how the money shall be spent. All I ask is that the £10,000 which is granted to the counties affected by this Bill to meet these exceptional circumstances shall not go into the pockets of the landlords and large tenants by being applied to a reduction of the rates, but shall be used for the benefit of the crofters. I fear that at least two-thirds of it will go into the pockets of the landlords and sportsmen and big farmers, who have done so much to produce the misery we are now trying to remedy. This money is really wanted for the purpose of developing the resources of the county, and not for the purpose of reducing the rates of landlords and big tenants. You are not giving us a penny for the crofters, and on that ground I intend to go to a Division.

DR. McDONALD: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend, and if he divides the Committee I shall go into the Lobby with him.

Ayes 109; Noes 53.—(Div. List, No. 329.)

Clauses, as amended, added.

Bill reported.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: We will put down the consideration for Thursday.

(10.40.) DR. CLARK: I hope the Report stage will be deferred to a later date. Several Scotch Members who are much interested in the Bill, and who have some important questions to put in reference to it, are absent, and may not be able to return to the House by Thursday.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: I join in the request of the hon. Member for Caithness. It is necessary that we should have an opportunity of corresponding with the County Councils on the matter.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: It is most desirable that the work should be set about at once. That is the reason for the introduction of the Bill, and the districts interested are very anxious that no time should be lost. I should have thought hon. Members opposite would have been aware of this, and would have met the proposal in the same spirit. The Government, therefore, will certainly retain the appointment for Thursday, and if circumstances then make it necessary to postpone the Bill, the responsibility must rest with hon. Members.

Bill, as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

METALLIFEROUS MINES (ISLE OF MAN) BILL.—(No. 400.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(10.42.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Does not this Bill deal with a matter which can be dealt with by the House of Keys?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The Bill does not belong to that category, being a Bill to amend an Act of the Imperial Parliament. It is introduced in this House at the expressed wish of the Authorities of the Isle of Man.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

POST OFFICE ACTS AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 366.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(10.43.) Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, to leave out "before the first day of January next."—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I rise for the purpose of asking the right hon. Gentleman to repeat publicly the assurance which he has given some of those interested in this clause privately as to the exact intention of the clause. I had put down an Amendment stipulating that certain marks on newspapers should not be held as rendering the newspapers liable to surcharge. The right hon. Gentleman gave excellent reasons for leaving the matter to be settled by regulation by the Post Office Authorities. But at some future date the officials may not know the exact meaning of the clause, and therefore it is well the right hon. Gentleman should make some public statement to which we may refer if any dispute arises.

*SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I wish to put a question to my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General, which is one of great importance to Friendly Societies. I want to know whether there is a clause in the Bill which deals with a grievance under which the Friendly Societies of this country have laboured for a number of years, and to which over and over again they have drawn the attention of the Postmaster General. I would ask whether there is a clause in the Bill which will allow circulars issued by lodges of Friendly Societies to go through the post at a halfpenny instead of a penny rate? The question is one that has been brought to the notice of my right hon. Friend several times by the "Friendly Societies Conference," representing 2,229,000 members and £16,000,000 capital.

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The hon. Baronet the Member for Norfolk has quite rightly represented the intention of the Government in dealing with the circulars of friendly societies. Constant complaints have been made that owing to the existing regulations with regard to circulars the members are continually surcharged in consequence of some entry in writing upon a document which is otherwise printed. I hope and believe that as soon as the Treasury Warrant under this Act is promulgated these societies will see that their wishes have been met and that the grievance has been remedied. What I understand the hon. Member for Glasgow to desire to do is not merely to allow a newspaper to pass which has got on the cover "See mark inside," but to extend that privilege to other indicative marks, such as "See page 5," or sometimes, as advertisers prefer, a hand pointing to page 3 or 4, as the case may be. It is to enable the Department to frame the regulations in a more comprehensive way that the clause is drawn in the particular shape in which it appears in the Bill, and our one desire in so doing is to afford much greater latitude than could be done by any specific exemption in dealing with these indicative marks on newspapers, which are largely used both by advertisers and also by companies when they send out to their shareholders copies of a newspaper containing a report of their general meetings.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2.

*(10.52.) MR. RAIKES: I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name, which is intended to meet the requirements of newspapers, and at the same time to give due protection to the Revenue.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 22, after "but," to leave out to end of sub-section, and insert "all sheets of a supplement shall be put together at some one part of the registered newspaper, whether gummed or stitched up with the newspaper or not."—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

DR. CAMERON: I have to move an Amendment, with the object of making it perfectly plain that the Bill carries out the intentions expressed by the Postmaster General on the Second Reading respecting supplements to illustrated papers.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 25, to leave out from "There," to "Supplement," in line 27, and insert "There shall further be repealed so much of the said section six as requires the supplement to a newspaper to have the date of publication of the newspaper printed on the top of every page, or of every sheet or side on which any engraving, print, or lithograph appears."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(10.55.) MR. RAIKES: I think this Amendment is better drafted than the sub-section as it stands in the Bill. I should say, however, that the intention of the Government has been to relieve from the necessity of affixing a date only those supplements which consist of engravings, lithographs, or illustrations, and not to relieve every supplement from the necessity of affixing a date. We have felt it desirable to insist on that point, because otherwise the door might be left open for stereotyped advertisements being published as a supplement to a newspaper without any date, and I think the requirement of the date should still be enforced as regards any supplement of that description. I will accept the Amendment, subject to the insertion, if necessary, of verbal Amendments on Report.

DR. CAMERON: I shall be very ready to accept that proposal, but I do not think any Amendment will be necessary.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will take power at later stages to modify the definition of a newspaper contained in Section 6? Objection is taken to the limitation of a newspaper to a document containing a particular kind of news. It has been shown that many very good publications are not allowed to pass as newspapers simply because they do not contain political or police news, whereas papers of a much more unhealthy tendency, which give all the police court cases, are allowed so to pass. I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not possible to meet the application which has been made as to the relaxation of the definition?

(11.0.) MR. RAIKES: The hon. Member has quite correctly stated that I have had the views of a representative deputation in regard to a great many magazines and other publications which in some degree partake of the character of a newspaper. I listened with great attention to what was said by members of that deputation, and have given careful consideration to suggestions made then and since. I quite admit that the question of the further definition of a newspaper is one that might very well occupy the attention of the Government, and is not unlikely to occupy the attention of Parliament in the future, but, having regard to the importance of passing this Bill, it is inexpedient to embark upon so large a question at the present time. I am therefore obliged to resist the introduction of any definition of what constitutes a newspaper. It is on that account that the hon. Member for Canterbury has withdrawn an Amendment which stood in his name going in this direction. Without promising to introduce a Bill on the subject, I will undertake that it shall not be lost sight of, and I shall be ready to consider any suggestions offered.

quite appreciate the difficulty of dealing with the subject, but to illustrate its urgency I would mention that the postage of Good Words, weighing 6 oz., is 1½d., whilst in America the postage of Harper's Magazine is a farthing, the weight being 14 oz., and the price 1s. So that a magazine in America is transmitted by post for an additional 2 per cent. on the cost, but in this country at an additional 25 per cent. I do not make any suggestion with a view of injuring the Postal Revenue, because I believe the greater facilities that are offered for circulation, the larger the revenue that will be brought in. It is a question that requires considerable care, and this it must receive. Subject to that I endorse what the right hon. Gentleman has said.

(11.5.) DR. CAMERON: While the definition requires amendment, I quite agree that it is a matter not to be dealt with hurriedly. I agree that at this period of the Session it would be hazardous to attempt a new definition of a newspaper, and that the work had better be postponed to another Session.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 omitted.

Clause 4.

*MR. RAIKES: Here I propose to leave out the reference to the maximum weight of newspapers, for I think it is part of the question to be considered in connection with the definition of a newspaper.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 14, to leave out sub-section "(a)."—(Mr. Raikes.)

Amendment agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

*MR. LENG (Dundee): I am under the impression that the phrase "postal packet" includes newspapers. Will the facilities for re-addressing be extended to newspapers?

*MR. RAIKES: That is a point requiring some further consideration. If the hon. Gentleman will repeat his question on the Report stage I shall be in a position to give him a more definite answer than now I can.

MR. PICTON: The Treasury are here given the power of making regulation as to the re-addressing of "postal packets," which, as I understand include newspapers. Has the right hon. Gentleman considered the point in relation to newspapers sent to our soldiers and sailors abroad? Is it not possible to let these have their newspapers at a cheaper rate? Letters they receive at a cheaper rate, but they have to pay more for receiving newspapers than letters. Of course, soldiers and sailors when they go abroad are anxious to know the news of the countryside and what is going on around their old home, but the cost of postage prevents them from having their newspapers as they otherwise would. It is a small point though important to the men in the Services. Will the right hon. Gentleman consider whether power should be taken to deal with this matter? He told me that the Post Office had no power to reduce the rate, but is it not desirable that our soldiers and sailors should have newspapers as well as letters at a cheaper rate?

*MR. RAIKES: This clause has reference only to the question of re-direction; it has no reference to the particular point raised by the hon. Member. I think it would be better that we should keep all these questions relating to newspapers together. I do not think it would be germane to the Bill as it now stands to introduce a particular reference to the postage of newspapers to soldiers and sailors, but I will keep it in mind.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): The right hon. Gentleman will perhaps also consider whether in the re-addressing of newspapers to sailors from port to port there should be a reduction of postage.

(11.10.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): In this Clause 4 it is provided that power should be given to the Treasury to alter the present rate imposed upon re-directed letters, but I rather gathered that postal packets were to be sent free when re-directed. Is that so, or is a lower rate to be imposed?

*MR. RAIKES: The intention is to abrogate the charge on re-directed postal packets.

MR. MORTON: Altogether?

*MR. RAIKES: Yes.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clauses 5, 6, and 7, agreed to.

Clause 8.

*MR. RAIKES: I have a small Amendment to propose, which does not appear on the Paper, in line 14, to add after "or" the words "with the consent of the Local Government Board," that is to say, that when any land is appropriated by a Municipal Authority for the purposes of a post office, the assent of the Local Government Board to the appropriation shall first be required. It has been thought desirable, in the interest of the ratepayers, to introduce these words as a sort of check upon too effusive liberality on the part of an Urban Sanitary Authority. Therefore, I move to insert the words. I may say that, as the law stands, such bodies are not able to make grants of money without the sanction of the Local Government Board, and we think that a grant of land should be on the same footing as a grant of money.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 14, after "or," to insert, "with the consent of the Local Government Board."
—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

DR. CAMERON: These words would not apply to Scotland, I presume? It is not proposed that the Local Government Board should give its consent there. It would be an extension of jurisdiction that is not desirable. We have in Scotland no Local Government Board in the sense in which that Board exercises control in England. We have in some sort an equivalent in the Board of Supervision, but I think it would be desirable to exempt Scotland from such a provision as this, leaving the Municipal Authorities to deal with these matters with the assent of the Secretary of State for Scotland.

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. RAIKES: It is a point to consider, and perhaps the hon. Member will raise the question again on the Report stage.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I greatly object to continually bringing in the authority of the Local Government Board. I have great respect for the Board and for its President, but I do not think the Board knows more about local affairs than the Local Authority. These references to the Central Authority cause many difficulties. I remember that in the neighbourhood of Liverpool there was some trifling little notice issued in reference to cattle disease, and this it appeared had been issued without consultation with the proper authority, and the correspondence and trouble that ensued cost more than the printing of the notice itself. There is too much meddling by the Central Authority in everything that is done. Surely the representatives of the ratepayers are likely to look after the local interests. We have been told that the sanction is required in matters of money, and I am sorry that is so. There is no reason why it should be extended to land also. The Local Authority can, I think, very well be trusted.

*(11.15.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): This is only in conformity with the existing law. So far as concerns the disposal of money raised by the rates no consent of the Local Government Board is required. But it has rightly been considered by Parliament that the Local Government Board is to some extent the guardian of property for posterity, and so no money can be borrowed or land alienated without the assent of the Board. The land belongs not to the present ratepayers, but to the Municipality for all time. Money borrowed for this purpose, or land contributed, stands in the same position.

MR. MORTON: I find nothing in the clause about borrowed money, and I therefore do not understand the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. But in reference to land, I object to this introduction of the authority of the Local Government Board,

X

So far as my experience goes, these Local Government Board inquiries serve no purpose but to help to keep up a big staff in London, and to find employment for idle people who cannot be provided for in any other way. I object to the principle of centralisation thus introduced. This interposition of the Central Board has a harmful effect, because you will not get the best men to serve on these Local Bodies if they are to be under the supervision of somebody in London.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: How does this agree with the Municipal Corporations Act, which provides that a Corporation shall not alienate any land without the assent of the Treasury?

*MR. RITCHIE: That has since been transferred to the Local Government Board.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(11.19.) MR. PICKERSGILL: This seems to me to be rather a beggarly clause for a large and lucrative Department to introduce into the Bill. It is an attempt to shift off to other shoulders a burden which ought to fall on the Department. The clause is—

"Where the council of any borough or the urban sanitary authority of any district consider that it would be beneficial to the inhabitants of such borough or district that any new post office should be on a more expensive site, or of a larger size, or of a more ornate building or otherwise of a more expensive character than the Postmaster General would otherwise provide, such council or authority may contribute towards such new post office, either by a grant of money or the appropriation of land belonging to the council or authority, or by the purchase of land for the purpose."

Now, the Committee will see that this clause provides for the case in a manner quite different to that proposed in the Amendment on the Paper in the name of an hon. Member on this side of the House, which is a proposal that where a district is not entitled to have a post office at all, it may arrange with the Postmaster General to have a post office on guaranteeing the Department against loss. That seems to me a reasonable and convenient proposal. But Clause 8 deals with a totally different state of things. Clause 8 assumes that a new post office is about to be built, and enables the locality to have a better post office than that contemplated by the Department on payment of the difference in expense. Now, my point is this, the Postmaster General is already bound to provide for a locality such a post office building as is suitable to local requirements. How can the Local Authority determine what is wanted in regard to size? Only the experience of the Department can determine that. If the Department is bound to provide a suitable building, I do not see what the district is to receive for the subsidy it is invited to grant. It may be said the clause does not compel, but only permits, the Local Authority to grant a subsidy, and therefore it can do no harm. But there I take issue, and say I think it will do harm. I contend that the result of introducing such a clause as this will be to lower the normal standard for post office buildings. The Department will also put pressure on the locality to grant a subsidy in order that the buildings may be of a better character. This great Department of State will be reduced, I might almost say, to the level of those American Railway Companies who issue a general invitation to towns on the route to provide subsidies in cash or land. On these grounds I demur to the policy of this clause, and should Members of the Committee be disposed to take my view, I am willing to divide against it.

*(11.22.) MR. RAIKES: I think I shall be able to reassure the hon. Gentleman as to the purpose of the clause, which in its object is wholly permissive. There is not the slightest idea of putting pressure upon any Municipal or other Urban Authority. As the law now stands, however, Local Authorities are restrained from doing that which they would wish to do if they were able. A case occurred the other day which first suggested to me the desirableness of introducing this clause. There was an important manufacturing town in the north with a piece of land in the immediate neighbourhood of its public buildings, which would serve as a suitable site for a post office. The existing post office is in a part of the town not altogether inconvenient, but not by any means so suitable; the requirements of the service having outgrown the accommodation provided many years ago. Under such circumstances it is usual for the Post Office, with the assent of the Treasury, to add to the existing building. The Corporation offered, in consideration of a transfer of the post office to a more convenient site in the town, to make a present of a small portion of the land on which to build a post office. The grant was accepted, but afterwards grave doubts arose as to whether the Corporation were legally empowered to do this. It appears to me that many similar cases might arise, and thus it is desirable to obtain power to legalise such transactions and to enable Local Authorities to offer sites in order to secure the most convenient buildings. It is quite possible, also, that questions may arise as to style and decoration, and harmony with existing buildings. The Post Office, with the Treasury at its elbow, might not find itself in a position to build a new post office building in a style acceptable to the inhabitants, who require something more handsome, something more suitable to the other public buildings in the town. So I think it is desirable that a locality should have the power to carry out its wishes by offering the site, and thus enabling the Post Office to spend more on the building; there is no idea of using pressure of any kind.

(11.27.) MR. PICKERSGILL: The observations of the right hon. Gentleman are entitled to consideration no doubt; but they do not cover the whole case. The right hon. Gentleman has only dealt with the question of land, but in my opinion the grant of money is the more objectionable part of the proposal. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would be willing, between now and Report, to consider whether the part of the clause dealing with appropriations of money might be eliminated, and then I will raise no further objection.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): The clause seems to me to be a reasonable one. If the Local Authority is desirous of adding to the beauty of the town or conferring greater convenience on the inhabitants by the position of the post office, I see no reason to object to their carrying out the wishes of the ratepayers at the local expense. I shall support the clause.

MR. MORTON: I object to the clause altogether, because I think that the Post Office, with the revenue at its disposal, ought to be able to build the necessary buildings on the sites where they are required. I do not say that I object so much to the question of site; but the clause goes further and gives a Local Authority power of interposing and spending the local funds on a building of the size of which as required for post office purposes they will be unable to judge, or upon style and decoration the fad of a few councillors for the time being. There is no occasion for this at all. If the right hon. Gentleman will make the clause apply to only the site I should take no particular objection to it. Otherwise I shall have pleasure in voting against the section altogether.

*(11.31.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I am surprised at the distrust of Local Authorities which some of my hon. Friends have expressed. Surely the elected representatives of the ratepayers of large towns can be trusted without being checked and controlled at every turn by the House of Commons or some Department of the State. I cordially concur with this clause, and if the right hon. Gentleman will give a Return showing the enormous amount of money spent during the last 20 years on post offices it will be valuable information to hon. Members. The right hon. Member has proved his case to demonstration, and everyone who knows anything about this matter knows that it is desirable to have a clause of this kind in all large towns. When a new post office is required in an important street of a large town the Post Office Authorities say, "In justice to the taxpayers of other towns we can only put up a building of a certain character." The Municipality then may say, "We wish to have a handsome street, and in order that the post office may be a credit to it we are willing to contribute part of the cost of the difference between the two styles of buildings." Very often the Municipal Authorities may desire to have their post office in a situation which the Postmaster General will not feel justified in taking because of its expensiveness. Why, in such cases, should not the Municipality present the site? The Bill is only permissive, and not compulsory. If it were compulsory I should oppose it, but as it is I think it is perfectly harmless. There are many towns applying for new post offices, and if we can facilitate the erection of such post offices we shall be conferring a benefit upon the public.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 omitted.

Clause 11.

(11.35.) MR. PICKERSGILL: In line 35 I propose to leave out the word "annoy" in order to substitute the word "defraud." The effect of the clause would be to make much more stringent the Criminal Law with regard to post letters. It constitutes a new offence, and that new offence consists of two elements—an act and an intent. The act is opening a post letter which ought to have been delivered to some other person, or doing any act or thing whereby its due delivery is prevented, delayed, or impeded. The other element of the offence is the intent to injure or annoy the addressee. Now, I submit that to make a misdemeanour punishable with six months' imprisonment, the act of opening a post letter with intent to annoy another person, is making a great advance in our criminal legislation, and, I think, dealing with the matter with excessive stringency. I do not like this clause at all, but I am afraid there would be little chance of resisting it altogether, and I, therefore, propose to substitute the word "defraud" for "annoy." I think the Committee will see that the word "annoy" is a word of vague significance, whereas the word "defraud" is much more precise, and makes the offence a much more serious matter. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be willing to accept the Amendment.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

*(11.37.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General to leave this clause out altogether. To make any act or thing whereby the delivery of a post letter is delayed or impeded a misdemeanour punishable with six months' imprisonment would lead to extraordinary results; you might have a father who is aware that his daughter is receiving love letters, and wishes to prevent them reaching her, but if he delays or impedes them he will be liable to prosecution and imprisonment. There are some letters that ought to be delayed or impeded by a father—certain correspondence, for instance, intended for his son. Then, if a letter is delivered to the wrong house, and is opened in mistake, the person so opening it may be held guilty of a misdemeanour. At present this law is confined to servants of the Post Office. If the clause is allowed to stand I shall have a great many Amendments to move to it in Committee. I trust, however, the right hon. Gentleman will decide to abandon it altogether.

*(11.40.) MR. RAIKES: I think I should point out that it is already a misdemeanour to open or delay a letter if this is done by a servant of the Post Office. It is reasonable to suppose that to open a letter to injure or annoy the addressee may be an equally grave offence. The injury which may be done to a person by opening his letter is not always to be measured by the fact as to whether or not something has been stolen. I had an instance before me the other day in which a letter addressed to a Member of this House, who was addressing a meeting in another constituency, was delivered at the wrong club. It was opened by the porter, and then forwarded by that person to another Member of this House, who was engaged in litigation with the hon. Member to whom it was first addressed. It did not refer to politics, but to the litigation then proceeding between those two Members. The porter not only opened the letter, but forwarded it to the other party in the litigation, with the intention of injuring, or at least annoying. I need not say that the hon. Member to whom it was given at once handed it to the proper person. I maintain that what was done in that case ought to be punishable by law, and I believe that it would be a great advantage to the public if this clause formed part of the Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton will confer with me between now and the Report stage of the Bill, with the view of seeing whether any suggestions may be made towards amending it, I shall be happy to meet him; but I sincerely trust that the Committee will think proper to let the clause remain in the Bill. It seems to me that at present it is an absurd and anomalous thing that a person can be punished for stealing 6d. out of a letter, and that we cannot punish a person who may in another way do incalculable injury to the person to whom the letter is addressed. I am afraid that I cannot accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bethnal Green.

(11.44.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I was speaking at Stoke-on-Trent some months ago, when a letter was sent to me giving particulars in regard to a libel suit coming on at the Cork Assizes between myself and one of the Members sitting below the Gangway on this side of the House. That letter, addressed to me by my solicitor, was deliberately opened by a clerk of the Gladstonian Liberal Association, who, instead of forwarding it to me, sent it to Mr. Harrington, who, if he had read the letter, would have come into possession of his opponent's case. Mr. Harrington, however, came to me and apologised for the mistake. An act like that of the club official, done deliberately, ought to be punishable.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Another very common case that would lead to injustice under this clause is that of the delivery of letters at the wrong address. It occurs to me frequently. Letters are put into my letterbox, and I naturally open them without taking the trouble to read all the addresses. Sometimes there is one intended for somebody else in the same block of buildings, and under this Bill, if that person were litigious and took exception to my action, I might be subjected to very serious trouble in having to prove that I had not intended to annoy him. I think that unless this clause is amended it will lead to serious inconvenience.

MR. RAIKES: I will agree to the withdrawal of the clause at this stage, reserving to myself the right to move a clause containing something to the same effect on Report.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 12.

(11.47.) MR. PICKERSGILL: I do not know how a clause of this kind ever got introduced into a Post Office Bill. Its object appears to be to alter the procedure in prosecutions for sale of adulterated food. The new section provides that it shall no longer be necessary to send samples of food intended to be analysed by registered letter. The precaution of registering a letter is a very wise one, not only in the interest of the accused person, but also in the interest of the prosecution, because it is obvious that if the defence can raise a plausible suggestion that the purchased article has been tampered with, the accused person would escape altogether. At all events, whatever argument might be advanced in favour of the Amendment of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act of 1875, I think such an Amendment is entirely out of place in a Bill of this kind. I cannot understand what has induced the Postmaster General to insert this clause, and I should be glad if he will explain his motives.

MR. RAIKES: The advisers of the Post Office have been led to believe that there is some doubt whether any article sent under the Food and Drugs Act through the Post Office must be registered. It is intended to set at rest any controversy on the subject, and to make it clear that such an article need not be sent in a registered letter.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Do I understand that this is to be so when the article is forwarded as a condition precedent to a criminal prosecution?

*MR. RAIKES: That will be so.

MR. PICKERSGILL: This House in 1875 thought it advisable to secure that this precaution should be taken, and, therefore, I think it is rather too much for the Postmaster General in a Departmental Bill to propose what is in effect an alteration of the Criminal Law.

(11.50.) Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 113; Noes 48.—(Div. List, No. 330.)

(11.59.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether he will accept the clause suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Fuller) with reference to the rural authorities?

*MR. RAIKES: I think we can accept something in that direction if the hon. Gentleman will put it down on Report.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill I do not propose to call your attention to many of the details, which are of a very intricate and technical character, and which are chiefly for Departmental convenience. I propose to ask your attention very shortly to two or three of the most important provisions in this Bill. The most important part of it is the first clause, which is virtually a proposal to reduce sentences of five years' penal servitude to three, going back to what it was in former days. Your Lordships will doubtless remember that about the time there was a great increase of crime, chiefly garotting, it was raised from three years to five. It is now proposed to go back to three. It is generally admitted, I think, that every year passed in prison is unfair to the prisoner, in so much that part of his sentence may be unnecessary where a smaller sentence would have sufficed. It is perhaps hard also upon those who have to sentence that prisoner to feel themselves obliged by law to inflict a more severe sentence when a more lenient one would answer the case. It is naturally also a great pecuniary loss, because it stands to reason that if a three years' sentence is sufficient, one of five years is a loss of being a Bill to amend an Act of the Imperial Parliament. It is introduced in this House at the expressed wish of the Authorities of the Isle of Man.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

POST OFFICE ACTS AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 366.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(10.43.) Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, to leave out "before the first day of January next."—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I rise for the purpose of asking the right hon. Gentleman to repeat publicly the assurance which he has given some of those interested in this clause privately as to the exact intention of the clause. I had put down an Amendment stipulating that certain marks on newspapers should not be held as rendering the newspapers liable to surcharge. The right hon. Gentleman gave excellent reasons for leaving the matter to be settled by regulation by the Post Office Authorities. But at some future date the officials may not know the exact meaning of the clause, and therefore it is well the right hon. Gentleman should make some public statement to which we may refer if any dispute arises.

*SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I wish to put a question to my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General, which is one of great importance to Friendly Societies. I want to know whether there is a clause in the Bill which deals with a grievance under which the Friendly Societies of this country have laboured for a number of years, and to which over and over again they have drawn the attention of the Postmaster General. I would ask whether there is a clause in the Bill which will allow circulars issued by lodges of Friendly Societies to go through the post at a halfpenny instead of a penny rate? The question is one that has been brought to the notice of my right hon. Friend several times by the "Friendly Societies Conference," representing 2,229,000 members and £16,000,000 capital.

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The hon. Baronet the Member for Norfolk has quite rightly represented the intention of the Government in dealing with the circulars of friendly societies. Constant complaints have been made that owing to the existing regulations with regard to circulars the members are continually surcharged in consequence of some entry in writing upon a document which is otherwise printed. I hope and believe that as soon as the Treasury Warrant under this Act is promulgated these societies will see that their wishes have been met and that the grievance has been remedied. What I understand the hon. Member for Glasgow to desire to do is not merely to allow a newspaper to pass which has got on the cover "See mark inside," but to extend that privilege to other indicative marks, such as "See page 5," or sometimes, as advertisers prefer, a hand pointing to page 3 or 4, as the case may be. It is to enable the Department to frame the regulations in a more comprehensive way that the clause is drawn in the particular shape in which it appears in the Bill, and our one desire in so doing is to afford much greater latitude than could be done by any specific exemption in dealing with these indicative marks on newspapers, which are largely used both by advertisers and also by companies when they send out to their shareholders copies of a newspaper containing a report of their general meetings.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2.

*(10.52.) MR. RAIKES: I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name, which is intended to meet the requirements of newspapers, and at the same time to give due protection to the Revenue.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 22, after "but," to leave out to end of sub-section, and insert "all sheets of a supplement shall be put together at some one part of the registered newspaper, whether gummed or stitched up with the newspaper or not."—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

DR. CAMERON: I have to move an Amendment, with the object of making it perfectly plain that the Bill carries out the intentions expressed by the Postmaster General on the Second Reading respecting supplements to illustrated papers.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 25, to leave out from "There," to "Supplement," in line 27, and insert "There shall further be repealed so much of the said section six as requires the supplement to a newspaper to have the date of publication of the newspaper printed on the top of every page, or of every sheet or side on which any engraving, print, or lithograph appears."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(10.55.)* MR. RAIKES: I think this Amendment is better drafted than the sub-section as it stands in the Bill. I should say, however, that the intention of the Government has been to relieve from the necessity of affixing a date only those supplements which consist of engravings, lithographs, or illustrations, and not to relieve every supplement from the necessity of affixing a date. We have felt it desirable to insist on that point, because otherwise the door might be left open for stereotyped advertisements being published as a supplement to a newspaper without any date, and I think the requirement of the date should still be enforced as regards any supplement of that description. I will accept the Amendment, subject to the insertion, if necessary, of verbal Amendments on Report.

DR. CAMERON: I shall be very ready to accept that proposal, but I do not think any Amendment will be necessary.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will take power at later stages to modify the definition of a newspaper contained in Section 6? Objection is taken to the limitation of a newspaper to a document containing a particular kind of news. It has been shown that many very good publications are not allowed to pass as newspapers simply because they do not contain political or police news, whereas papers of a much more unhealthy tendency, which give all the police court cases, are allowed so to pass. I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not possible to meet the application which has been made as to the relaxation of the definition?

(11.0.)* MR. RAIKES: The hon. Member has quite correctly stated that I have had the views of a representative deputation in regard to a great many magazines and other publications which in some degree partake of the character of a newspaper. I listened with great attention to what was said by members of that deputation, and have given careful consideration to suggestions made then and since. I quite admit that the question of the further definition of a newspaper is one that might very well occupy the attention of the Government, and is not unlikely to occupy the attention of Parliament in the future, but, having regard to the importance of passing this Bill, it is inexpedient to embark upon so large a question at the present time. I am therefore obliged to resist the introduction of any definition of what constitutes a newspaper. It is on that account that the hon. Member for Canterbury has withdrawn an Amendment which stood in his name going in this direction. Without promising to introduce a Bill on the subject, I will undertake that it shall not be lost sight of, and I shall be ready to consider any suggestions offered.

quite appreciate the difficulty of dealing with the subject, but to illustrate its urgency I would mention that the postage of Good Words, weighing 6 oz., is 1½d., whilst in America the postage of Harper's Magazine is a farthing, the weight being 14 oz., and the price 1s. So that a magazine in America is transmitted by post for an additional 2 per cent. on the cost, but in this country at an additional 25 per cent. I do not make any suggestion with a view of injuring the Postal Revenue, because I believe the greater facilities that are offered for circulation, the larger the revenue that will be brought in. It is a question that requires considerable care, and this it must receive. Subject to that I endorse what the right hon. Gentleman has said.

(11.5.) DR. CAMERON: While the definition requires amendment, I quite agree that it is a matter not to be dealt with hurriedly. I agree that at this period of the Session it would be hazardous to attempt a new definition of a newspaper, and that the work had better be postponed to another Session.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 omitted.

Clause 4.

MR. RAIKES: Here I propose to leave out the reference to the maximum weight of newspapers, for I think it is part of the question to be considered in connection with the definition of a newspaper.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 14, to leave out sub-section "(a)."—
(Mr. Raikes.)

Amendment agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. LENG (Dundee): I am under the impression that the phrase "postal packet" includes newspapers. Will the facilities for re-addressing be extended to newspapers?

MR. RAIKES: That is a point requiring some further consideration. The hon. Gentleman will repeat his question on the Report stage I shall be in a position to give him a more definite answer than now I can.

MR. PICTON: The Treasury are here given the power of making regulation as to the re-addressing of "postal packets," which, as I understand, include newspapers. Has the right hon. Gentleman considered the point in relation to newspapers sent to soldiers and sailors abroad? Is it possible to let these have their papers at a cheaper rate? Letters receive at a cheaper rate, but they have to pay more for receiving newspapers than letters. Of course, soldiers and sailors when they go abroad are to know the news of the country and what is going on around home, but the cost of postage prevents them from having their newspapers at the rate they otherwise would. It is as much though important to the military Services. Will the right hon. Gentleman consider whether power should be given to deal with this matter? I think that the Post Office had better not reduce the rate, but is it possible that our soldiers and sailors should have newspapers as well as letter rate?

MR. RAIKES: The reference is only to the direction; it has no particular point raised by the Member. I think it is better that we should keep all relating to newspapers in the Bill as it now stands, and not make particular reference to the facilities for newspapers to soldiers and sailors. I will keep it in mind.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Lichfield): The right hon. Gentleman will perhaps also consider the re-addressing of newspapers from port to port and the reduction of postage.

(11.10.) MR. BURGESS (Borough): In this connection that power should be given to the Treasury to alter

So far as my experience goes, these Local Government Board inquiries serve no purpose but to help to keep up a big staff in London, and to find employment for idle people who cannot be provided for in any other way. I object to the principle of centralisation thus introduced. This interposition of the Central Board has a harmful effect, because you will not get the best men to serve on these Local Bodies if they are to be under the supervision of somebody in London.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: How does this agree with the Municipal Corporations Act, which provides that a Corporation shall not alienate any land without the assent of the Treasury?

*MR. RITCHIE: That has since been transferred to the Local Government Board.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(11.19.) MR. PICKERSGILL: This seems to me to be rather a beggarly clause for a large and lucrative Department to introduce into the Bill. It is an attempt to shift off to other shoulders a burden which ought to fall on the Department. The clause is—

"Where the council of any borough or the urban sanitary authority of any district consider that it would be beneficial to the inhabitants of such borough or district that any new post office should be on a more expensive site, or of a larger size, or of a more ornate building or otherwise of a more expensive character than the Postmaster General would otherwise provide, such council or authority may contribute towards such new post office, either by a grant of money or the appropriation of land belonging to the council or authority, or by the purchase of land for the purpose."

Now, the Committee will see that this clause provides for the case in a manner quite different to that proposed in the Amendment on the Paper in the name of an hon. Member on this side of the House, which is a proposal that where a district is not entitled to have a post office at all, it may arrange with the Postmaster General to have a post office on guaranteeing the Department against loss. That seems to me a reasonable and convenient proposal. But Clause 8 deals with a totally different state of things. Clause 8 assumes that a new post office is about to be built, and enables the locality to have a better post office than that contemplated by the Department on payment of the difference in expense. Now, my point is this, the Postmaster General is already bound to provide for a locality such a post office building as is suitable to local requirements. How can the Local Authority determine what is wanted in regard to size? Only the experience of the Department can determine that. If the Department is bound to provide a suitable building, I do not see what the district is to receive for the subsidy it is invited to grant. It may be said the clause does not compel, but only permits, the Local Authority to grant a subsidy, and therefore it can do no harm. But there I take issue, and say I think it will do harm. I contend that the result of introducing such a clause as this will be to lower the normal standard for post office buildings. The Department will also put pressure on the locality to grant a subsidy in order that the buildings may be of a better character. This great Department of State will be reduced, I might almost say, to the level of those American Railway Companies who issue a general invitation to towns on the route to provide subsidies in cash or land. On these grounds I demur to the policy of this clause, and should Members of the Committee be disposed to take my view, I am willing to divide against it.

*(11.22.) MR. RAIKES: I think I shall be able to reassure the hon. Gentleman as to the purpose of the clause, which in its object is wholly permissive. There is not the slightest idea of putting pressure upon any Municipal or other Urban Authority. As the law now stands, however, Local Authorities are restrained from doing that which they would wish to do if they were able. A case occurred the other day which first suggested to me the desirableness of introducing this clause. There was an important manufacturing town in the north with a piece of land in the immediate neighbourhood of its public buildings, which would serve as a suitable site for a post office. The existing post office is in a part of the town not altogether inconvenient, but not by any means so suitable; the requirements of the service having outgrown the accommodation provided many years ago. Under such circumstances it is usual for the Post Office, with the assent of the Treasury, to add to the existing building. The Corporation offered, in consideration of a transfer of the post office to a more convenient site in the town, to make a present of a small portion of the land on which to build a post office. The grant was accepted, but afterwards grave doubts arose as to whether the Corporation were legally empowered to do this. It appears to me that many similar cases might arise, and thus it is desirable to obtain power to legalise such transactions and to enable Local Authorities to offer sites in order to secure the most convenient buildings. It is quite possible, also, that questions may arise as to style and decoration, and harmony with existing buildings. The Post Office, with the Treasury at its elbow, might not find itself in a position to build a new post office building in a style acceptable to the inhabitants, who require something more handsome, something more suitable to the other public buildings in the town. So I think it is desirable that a locality should have the power to carry out its wishes by offering the site, and thus enabling the Post Office to spend more on the building; there is no idea of using pressure of any kind.

(11.27.) MR. PICKERSGILL: The observations of the right hon. Gentleman are entitled to consideration no doubt; but they do not cover the whole case. The right hon. Gentleman has only dealt with the question of land, but in my opinion the grant of money is the more objectionable part of the proposal. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would be willing, between now and Report, to consider whether the part of the clause dealing with appropriations of money might be eliminated, and then I will raise no further objection.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): The clause seems to me to be a reasonable one. If the Local Authority is desirous of adding to the beauty of the town or conferring greater convenience on the inhabitants by the position of the post office, I see no reason to object to their carrying out the wishes of the ratepayers at the local expense. I shall support the clause.

MR. MORTON: I object to the clause altogether, because I think that the Post Office, with the revenue at its disposal, ought to be able to build the necessary buildings on the sites where they are required. I do not say that I object so much to the question of site; but the clause goes further and gives a Local Authority power of interposing and spending the local funds on a building of the size of which as required for post office purposes they will be unable to judge, or upon style and decoration the fad of a few councillors for the time being. There is no occasion for this at all. If the right hon. Gentleman will make the clause apply to only the site I should take no particular objection to it. Otherwise I shall have pleasure in voting against the section altogether.

*(11.31.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I am surprised at the distrust of Local Authorities which some of my hon. Friends have expressed. Surely the elected representatives of the ratepayers of large towns can be trusted without being checked and controlled at every turn by the House of Commons or some Department of the State. I cordially concur with this clause, and if the right hon. Gentleman will give a Return showing the enormous amount of money spent during the last 20 years on post offices it will be valuable information to hon. Members. The right hon. Member has proved his case to demonstration, and everyone who knows anything about this matter knows that it is desirable to have a clause of this kind in all large towns. When a new post office is required in an important street of a large town the Post Office Authorities say, "In justice to the taxpayers of other towns we can only put up a building of a certain character." The Municipality then may say, "We wish to have a handsome street, and in order that the post office may be a credit to it we are willing to contribute part of the cost of the difference between the two styles of buildings." Very often the Municipal Authorities may desire to have their post office in a situation which the Postmaster General will not feel justified in taking because of its expensiveness. Why, in such cases, should not the Municipality present the site? The Bill is only permissive, and not compulsory. If it were compulsory I should oppose it, but as it is I think it is perfectly harmless. There are many towns applying for new post offices, and if we can facilitate the erection of such post offices we shall be conferring a benefit upon the public.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 omitted.

Clause 11.

(11.35.) MR. PICKERSGILL: In line 35 I propose to leave out the word "annoy" in order to substitute the word "defraud." The effect of the clause would be to make much more stringent the Criminal Law with regard to post letters. It constitutes a new offence, and that new offence consists of two elements—an act and an intent. The act is opening a post letter which ought to have been delivered to some other person, or doing any act or thing whereby its due delivery is prevented, delayed, or impeded. The other element of the offence is the intent to injure or annoy the addressee. Now, I submit that to make a misdemeanour punishable with six months' imprisonment, the act of opening a post letter with intent to annoy another person, is making a great advance in our criminal legislation, and, I think, dealing with the matter with excessive stringency. I do not like this clause at all, but I am afraid there would be little chance of resisting it altogether, and I, therefore, propose to substitute the word "defraud" for "annoy." I think the Committee will see that the word "annoy" is a word of vague significance, whereas the word "defraud" is much more precise, and makes the offence a much more serious matter. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be willing to accept the Amendment.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

*(11.37.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General to leave this clause out altogether. To make any act or thing whereby the delivery of a post letter is delayed or impeded a misdemeanour punishable with six months' imprisonment would lead to extraordinary results; you might have a father who is aware that his daughter is receiving love letters, and wishes to prevent them reaching her, but if he delays or impedes them he will be liable to prosecution and imprisonment. There are some letters that ought to be delayed or impeded by a father—certain correspondence, for instance, intended for his son. Then, if a letter is delivered to the wrong house, and is opened in mistake, the person so opening it may be held guilty of a misdemeanour. At present this law is confined to servants of the Post Office. If the clause is allowed to stand I shall have a great many Amendments to move to it in Committee. I trust, however, the right hon. Gentleman will decide to abandon it altogether.

*(11.40.) MR. RAIKES: I think I should point out that it is already a misdemeanour to open or delay a letter if this is done by a servant of the Post Office. It is reasonable to suppose that to open a letter to injure or annoy the addressee may be an equally grave offence. The injury which may be done to a person by opening his letter is not always to be measured by the fact as to whether or not something has been stolen. I had an instance before me the other day in which a letter addressed to a Member of this House, who was addressing a meeting in another constituency, was delivered at the wrong club. It was opened by the porter, and then forwarded by that person to another Member of this House, who was engaged in litigation with the hon. Member to whom it was first addressed. It did not refer to politics, but to the litigation then proceeding between those two Members. The porter not only opened the letter, but forwarded it to the other party in the litigation, with the intention of injuring, or at least annoying. I need not say that the hon. Member to whom it was given at once handed it to the proper person. I maintain that what was done in that case ought to be punishable by law, and I believe that it would be a great advantage to the public if this clause formed part of the Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton will confer with me between now and the Report stage of the Bill, with the view of seeing whether any suggestions may be made towards amending it, I shall be happy to meet him; but I sincerely trust that the Committee will think proper to let the clause remain in the Bill. It seems to me that at present it is an absurd and anomalous thing that a person can be punished for stealing 6d. out of a letter, and that we cannot punish a person who may in another way do incalculable injury to the person to whom the letter is addressed. I am afraid that I cannot accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bethnal Green.

(11.44.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I was speaking at Stoke-on-Trent some months ago, when a letter was sent to me giving particulars in regard to a libel suit coming on at the Cork Assizes between myself and one of the Members sitting below the Gangway on this side of the House. That letter, addressed to me by my solicitor, was deliberately opened by a clerk of the Gladstonian Liberal Association, who, instead of forwarding it to me, sent it to Mr. Harrington, who, if he had read the letter, would have come into possession of his opponent's case. Mr. Harrington, however, came to me and apologised for the mistake. An act like that of the club official, done deliberately, ought to be punishable.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Another very common case that would lead to injustice under this clause is that of the delivery of letters at the wrong address. It occurs to me frequently. Letters are put into my letterbox, and I naturally open them without taking the trouble to read all the addresses. Sometimes there is one intended for somebody else in the same block of buildings, and under this Bill, if that person were litigious and took exception to my action, I might be subjected to very serious trouble in having to prove that I had not intended to annoy him. I think that unless this clause is amended it will lead to serious inconvenience.

MR. RAIKES: I will agree to the withdrawal of the clause at this stage, reserving to myself the right to move a clause containing something to the same effect on Report.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 12.

(11.47.) MR. PICKERSGILL: I do not know how a clause of this kind ever got introduced into a Post Office Bill. Its object appears to be to alter the procedure in prosecutions for sale of adulterated food. The new section provides that it shall no longer be necessary to send samples of food intended to be analysed by registered letter. The precaution of registering a letter is a very wise one, not only in the interest of the accused person, but also in the interest of the prosecution, because it is obvious that if the defence can raise a plausible suggestion that the purchased article has been tampered with, the accused person would escape altogether. At all events, whatever argument might be advanced in favour of the Amendment of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act of 1875, I think such an Amendment is entirely out of place in a Bill of this kind. I cannot understand what has induced the Postmaster General to insert this clause, and I should be glad if he will explain his motives.

MR. RAIKES: The advisers of the Post Office have been led to believe that there is some doubt whether any article sent under the Food and Drugs Act through the Post Office must be registered. It is intended to set at rest any controversy on the subject, and to make it clear that such an article need not be sent in a registered letter.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Do I understand that this is to be so when the article is forwarded as a condition precedent to a criminal prosecution?

*MR. RAIKES: That will be so.

MR. PICKERSGILL: This House in 1875 thought it advisable to secure that this precaution should be taken, and, therefore, I think it is rather too much for the Postmaster General in a Departmental Bill to propose what is in effect an alteration of the Criminal Law.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 113; Noes 48.—(Div. List, No. 330.)

(11.59.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether he will accept the clause suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Fuller) with reference to the rural authorities?

*MR. RAIKES: I think we can accept something in that direction if the hon. Gentleman will put it down on Report.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill I do not propose to call your attention to many of the details, which are of a very intricate and technical character, and which are chiefly for Departmental convenience. I propose to ask your attention very shortly to two or three of the most important provisions in this Bill. The most important part of it is the first clause, which is virtually a proposal to reduce sentences of five years' penal servitude to three, going back to what it was in former days. Your Lordships will doubtless remember that about the time there was a great increase of crime, chiefly garotting, it was raised from three years to five. It is now proposed to go back to three. It is generally admitted, I think, that every year passed in prison is unfair to the prisoner, in so much that part of his sentence may be unnecessary where a smaller sentence would have sufficed. It is perhaps hard also upon those who have to sentence that prisoner to feel themselves obliged by law to inflict a more severe sentence when a more lenient one would answer the case. It is naturally also a great pecuniary loss, because it stands to reason that if a three years' sentence is sufficient, one of five years is a loss of

A Clause (Certain agreements under seal to be chargeable as if under hand,) —(Sir Albert Rollit,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(7.12.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. Clarke, Plymouth): My hon. Friend has exactly foreseen the answer I am about to make to his proposal. When the matter was brought before the Grand Committee it was then stated that the proposal was one which would interfere with the Revenue, and it was suggested and maintained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it would be intolerable to introduce into this Bill any alteration in the method of charge affecting the Stamp Duty. That is a matter which must be dealt with on a different occasion, and in a different way. As my hon. Friend says it is not a large matter, as far as the amount affected is concerned, but as a matter of principle, I hope he will be content with having raised the point, and will reserve it for consideration to another time.

Question put, and negatived.

(7.15.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The object of the Amendment I rise to move is, that the sum of £14 in the shape of Stamp Duty now paid by the Imperial Exchequer to the Irish Benchers shall in future be paid to the Solicitors of Ireland belonging to the Incorporated Law Society. In 1791, an arrangement was made by which this money should be paid to the Benchers who then had control over the Solicitors, as a fund in connection with the education of their apprentices, and I am not disposed to say that the arrangement was unreasonable at that time. But a quarter of a century ago the Solicitors of Ireland became an Incorporated Body, and ceased to have relations with the Benchers in regard to the education of their apprentices. Nevertheless this fund has ever since remained in the hands of the Benchers, who, as I have said, formerly discharged the duties now undertaken by the solicitors. It is obvious that this inequitable and grotesque arrangement ought to be brought to an end as speedily as possible. I am aware that the Benchers raised an ingenious plea when the Society of Solicitors was incorporated and this point was brought forward. The Benchers said this money was given to them in 1791 and in respect of the education of apprentices, but in view of the rent of the Four Courts in Dublin. There is no doubt that by Royal Charter the site of the Four Courts was conveyed to the Benchers, but the Charter given to the Benchers reserved all the rights of the Crown, and as the Four Courts were held on their present site from the time of Elizabeth, the Benchers can have no right whatever to any claim for rent in respect of the site on which they stand. I am informed by the Secretary of the Law Society of Ireland that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has promised to make an inquiry into the matter. It is, I think, open to comment that now this Bill is before the House, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not in his place.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. Jackson, Leeds, N.): The Chancellor of the Exchequer is away on other public duties.

MR. SEXTON: That would be an excellent reason for postponing this Bill, but it is hardly a good reason for the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Bill is before this House. At any rate, he promised to consider this matter before the Report stage of the Bill, and I trust the Government will, under those circumstances, accept my Amendment. I hope my hon. Friend will assist me in pressing on the Government for a fulfilment of their pledge that the inquiry promised shall be held before this Bill is passed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 11, line 16, to leave out from the word "treasurer," to end of Clause, and insert the words "Incorporated Law Society of Ireland, and shall be applied as the council of that society shall from to time direct."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(7.22.) SIR A. ROLLIT: As I was one of the two or three Members who introduced this matter to the Grand Committee I will say a few words upon it. So far as the circumstances are brought to my knowledge, they point to the conclusion to which the hon. Member has referred, namely, that these funds are not at present devoted to their proper purpose, and that those who discharge the duties referred to ought to receive the recompense. Although it is said that some agreement exists which would displace that conclusion, I have not yet seen it. Therefore, in the general merits of the question, I agree with the hon. Member opposite; but I must differ with him as to what passed before the Committee. I think he is under a misapprehension. What I understood was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised an inquiry into the whole matter, but I hardly understood it was to be an inquiry before the Report stage of the Bill, indeed, such an inquiry could hardly have been undertaken so soon. I trust, however, that such an inquiry will be made, and will take place without undue delay. Moreover, I think it will establish the conclusion to which the hon. Member has arrived. If he insists on pressing the matter to a Division, I feel so strongly on the principle asserted by his Amendment that I may feel it my duty to vote with him; but I think that the best way of arriving at a definite conclusion is to assume that, not only will an inquiry be instituted, but that it will have the result he suggested.

*(7.27.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): Without going into the merits of the question between the Incorporated Law Society and the Benchers, I submit two reasons why the House should not, on the passing of this Bill, come to any conclusion on the subject of the Amendment. The first is that it is a Consolidation Bill, and a proposal to divert a considerable sum of money from one important body to another is not a proper subject to be dealt with in such a Bill. The second reason is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has promised an inquiry into the matter, and from the nature of the case the inquiry could not be completed in time for the Report stage of the Bill. Although I do not ask the House to go into the merits of the question, I must say a few words in reply to what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite. There would be much in the case he has put forward if these fees had been granted for services rendered by the

Benchers in the matter of educating solicitors' apprentices. But I must point out that these stamp fees were really received by King's Inn in lieu of rent for the site of the Courts, and the arrangement was made as long ago as the last century during the construction of the buildings. This was stated in the Report of the Benchers in 1859, before the Act of 1866 referred to. It is urged that it was not challenged in any way at the time, nor for many years after. The payment commenced in 1791, years before the west wing of the building, now called the Four Courts, was completed, but the building took several years, and it was evidently pending its completion that the arrangement was entered into. There is no doubt that the site of the Four Courts was the property of the King's Inns. This is abundantly proved by charters, Acts of Parliament, and other evidence, going back for several centuries. I have no right to speak on behalf of the Benchers, but I have no doubt that they court the fullest inquiry into the origin of the arrangement under which they receive from the Crown the payments in question.

(7.35.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I think it is a pity that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, who must be fully informed on the point, did not tell the Attorney General for Ireland what was to be the nature of the inquiry promised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I do not pretend to form an opinion as to what may be the result of an inquiry, which is admitted to be much needed. It may be there is something to be said for the contention of the hon. and learned Gentleman that these fees are paid by solicitors' apprentices in Ireland as rent, but surely if it is necessary that rent should be paid, it might be raised in some other manner. It might be paid, for instance, in the same way as compensation was paid for the land acquired for the Royal Courts of Justice in London. These Courts were put up at the Imperial expense, towards which the Irish taxpayer contributed, and why should not the Royal Courts in Dublin be placed on a like footing? But looking at the documents which have been placed before us, I think

So far as my experience goes, these Local Government Board inquiries serve no purpose but to help to keep up a big staff in London, and to find employment for idle people who cannot be provided for in any other way. I object to the principle of centralisation thus introduced. This interposition of the Central Board has a harmful effect, because you will not get the best men to serve on these Local Bodies if they are to be under the supervision of somebody in London.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: How does this agree with the Municipal Corporations Act, which provides that a Corporation shall not alienate any land without the assent of the Treasury?

*MR. RITCHIE: That has since been transferred to the Local Government Board.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(11.19.) MR. PICKERSGILL: This seems to me to be rather a beggarly clause for a large and lucrative Department to introduce into the Bill. It is an attempt to shift off to other shoulders a burden which ought to fall on the Department. The clause is—

"Where the council of any borough or the urban sanitary authority of any district consider that it would be beneficial to the inhabitants of such borough or district that any new post office should be on a more expensive site, or of a larger size, or of a more ornate building or otherwise of a more expensive character than the Postmaster General would otherwise provide, such council or authority may contribute towards such new post office, either by a grant of money or the appropriation of land belonging to the council or authority, or by the purchase of land for the purpose."

Now, the Committee will see that this clause provides for the case in a manner quite different to that proposed in the Amendment on the Paper in the name of an hon. Member on this side of the House, which is a proposal that where a district is not entitled to have a post office at all, it may arrange with the Postmaster General to have a post office on guaranteeing the Department against loss. That seems to me a reasonable and convenient proposal. But Clause 8 deals with a totally different state of things. Clause 8 assumes that a new post office is about to be built, and enables the locality to have a better post office than that contemplated by the Department on payment of the difference in expense. Now, my point is this, the Postmaster General is already bound to provide for a locality such a post office building as is suitable to local requirements. How can the Local Authority determine what is wanted in regard to size? Only the experience of the Department can determine that. If the Department is bound to provide a suitable building, I do not see what the district is to receive for the subsidy it is invited to grant. It may be said the clause does not compel, but only permits, the Local Authority to grant a subsidy, and therefore it can do no harm. But there I take issue, and say I think it will do harm. I contend that the result of introducing such a clause as this will be to lower the normal standard for post office buildings. The Department will also put pressure on the locality to grant a subsidy in order that the buildings may be of a better character. This great Department of State will be reduced, I might almost say, to the level of those American Railway Companies who issue a general invitation to towns on the route to provide subsidies in cash or land. On these grounds I demur to the policy of this clause, and should Members of the Committee be disposed to take my view, I am willing to divide against it.

*(11.22.) MR. RAIKES: I think I shall be able to reassure the hon. Gentleman as to the purpose of the clause, which in its object is wholly permissive. There is not the slightest idea of putting pressure upon any Municipal or other Urban Authority. As the law now stands, however, Local Authorities are restrained from doing that which they would wish to do if they were able. A case occurred the other day which first suggested to me the desirableness of introducing this clause. There was an important manufacturing town in the north with a piece of land in the immediate neighbourhood of its public buildings, which would serve as a suitable site for a post office. The existing post office is in a part of the town not alto-is unfair to raise revenue in a form which enables 99 people out of 100 to evade contributing to it; taxation should be on a fair and equitable basis, so that everyone should contribute a fair share. The Revenue would gain, and not lose, by the adoption of this Amendment. This matter was placed before the Chancellor of the Exchequer recently by a deputation from Scotland, and the right hon. Gentleman seemed impressed by their arguments. He promised to consider the possibility of making the change asked for, and I do urge that this is the only convenient opportunity likely to arise this Session. I may add that this matter affects the general public even more than landlords.

(7.50.) SIR E. CLARKE: I can only make the answer which was given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the same reasons were advanced by the hon. Member in Committee. The hon. Member suggests that the proposed change would lead to an increase in the Revenue of the country, but that is not the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But whether there will be an increase or a diminution, this is a matter which belongs to a Budget Bill, and not to a Consolidation Bill. Surely the burden of taxation upon a particular class is not an admissible topic to enter upon when the House is considering the consolidation of the laws relating to Stamp Duties.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The Solicitor General has not replied to my hon. Friend's arguments as to the alteration which the Government is proposing to make in the law in the interests of England and Ireland. Of course we do not object to the extension of the privilege of a penny Stamp Duty.

MR. JACKSON: It is done for the sake of uniformity.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: But still it will affect the Revenue. I think good grounds have been made out for adopting this Amendment. There is a great consensus of Scotch opinion in its favour, and we believe that while it will increase the revenue, it will put contracts in Ireland on a more satisfactory footing.

(7.53.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I may state in fairness to my hon. Friend it is the tenants rather than the property owners who will gain by this change. In the case of verbal leases it is necessary to have a witness, and that witness is usually someone in the employ of the landlord or his factor, therefore any dispute usually results unfavourably to the tenant. I think my hon. Friend has done good service in bringing this matter forward. His proposal would ensure complete uniformity throughout the United Kingdom, and I do submit that this is an opportune moment for making the change. In the past the Chancellors of the Exchequer have been obstinately blind to their own interests in this matter. I trust that my hon. Friend in order to emphasise his protest will press the Motion to a Division.

(7.55.) MR. J. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): The Amendment expresses the general sense of inconvenience felt under the present system. It is obvious that a verbal instead of a written agreement must lead to enormous inconvenience. I would suggest that there should be a penny duty on leases under £25. If no concession is made, I hope my hon. Friend will go to a Division.

(7.56.) The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 40.—(Div. List, No. 327.)

Bill read the third time, and passed.

STAMP DUTIES MANAGEMENT BILL. (No. 305.)

As amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

WESTERN HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS (SCOTLAND) WORKS BILL.—(No. 396.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(8.6.) DR. McDONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to move the insertion of the words "the county council of Ross and Cromarty and the district Council of Lews" after the word "Scotland," in line 10. The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave us a promise the other night that none of this money would be spent except with the consent of the County Council of Ross and Cromarty and the District Council of Lews. I think it would be quite as well if, instead of having a mere understanding to this effect, we inserted distinct words in the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, after "Scotland," to insert "the county council of Ross and Cromarty and the district council of Lews."—(Dr. McDonald.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I hope the hon. Gentleman will not press the Amendment. The Government entirely adhere to what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said, namely, that no roads in the island will be proceeded with under the present scheme, except with the approbation and concurrence of the County Council. It will be obvious to the hon. Gentleman that the Central Governing Authorities which have the duty of dispensing this money, and are responsible for it, stand in a different statutory position from the County Council. The hon. Member will be satisfied, I hope, with the assurance that the County Council will be taken along with the Government in what is being done, and I am happy to know that matters are even now harmoniously proceeding in the communications with the Local Authorities.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I hope my hon. Friend will not think it necessary to press this Amendment. At the same time, the Chancellor of the Exchequer got this special Vote on the express condition that the County Council or District Council was to determine as to the expenditure of the money. I held then, as I hold now, that to expend £15,000 on the Carloway road would be a misuse of the money; and probably the Secretary for Scotland is already aware of that from the representations of his engineers.

DR. McDONALD: In face of the assurance of the Lord Advocate I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2.

(8.10.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to move to add to Sub-section 3 of the clause the words

"The county council may also, before resolving to proceed as aforesaid, determine the boundaries of the special harbour or local works district, and such district shall be liable to special taxation under sub-section (25) hereof."

My Amendment is intended to facilitate the object of the Bill. The Government evidently intend that there shall be small harbours, piers, and boat slips made for the convenience of the crofters in the localities, and what I propose is that these various little communities shall be formed into special districts with the object of getting a local contribution towards the work. For that purpose it is necessary to form them into a special district, following the principle of the Public Health Act, which sets up special drainage and water districts. We cannot expect the people of Ross-shire in the mainland, far away from the sea, to be heavily taxed for the purpose of a harbour away on the west coast. The Amendment, therefore, is to form a special harbour or works district whereby the parties, both landlord and tenant, who are to get the benefit of the works shall contribute towards them in the only way in which we can get contributions from a locality.

(8.15.) MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to move an Amendment in the previous line? [Mr. CALDWELL: Certainly.] I am anxious that Nairn should be included amongst the counties that are to get the benefit of the Bill. I have a very considerable acquaintance with the County and Borough of Nairn. The people of Nairn are essentially of the same class as those to whom the Bill applies. They are engaged in the same fishing and require the same harbour accommodation; and as they have already got a harbour, which, however, does not meet the necessities of the case, I trust the Lord Advocate will see his way to accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 13, after "Cromarty," to insert "Nairn."
—(Mr. W. M'Laren.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Nairn' be there inserted."

(8.18.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: One result of there being no notice of this Amendment is that the hon. Member for the county (Mr. Seymour Keay), who is chiefly interested, and whose assiduity is unquestionable, is not present, and I therefore rather conjecture that the County of Nairn does not substantially desire the benefit suggested by the hon. Gentleman, who, with great deference, is quite an outsider. The proposal, however, is subject to very great objection. If there is to be a competition of this kind raised, every Scottish Member will at once come forward with a claim on behalf of his own constituency. The matter must be regarded strictly within the four corners of the Vote, and the proper time for raising any question as to the scope and application of the grant was when the Vote was taken.

MR. M'LAREN: I may be permitted to say that I am not altogether an outsider, for on a former occasion I was a candidate for the burghs of which Nairn forms one. On that occasion I pledged myself, at the earnest request of the people of Nairn, to do anything I could to forward their interests.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 14, after "gift," insert "the county council may also, before resolving to proceed as aforesaid, determine the boundaries of the special harbour or local works district, and such district shall be liable to special taxation under sub-section (25) hereof."
—(Mr. Caldwell.)

(8.24.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The proposal of the hon. Member (Mr. Caldwell) is open to very serious objection. The proposal of the Government is that the body which is to have the responsibility is the County Council; and, accordingly, the natural area of rating is to square with the area for which the administrative body is elected, namely, the county. The effect of the hon. Gentleman's proposal will be that members of the County Council, drawn from other portions of the county, will have no compunction at all in the matter of administration if they can put the cost upon one district which they do not represent. Several hon. Members must be aware of the exceedingly heavy rates which exist in some parts of the Highlands. The County Council has this year been representing that the burden on the ratepayers in the Island of Lewis is excessive and intolerable. Therefore, I cannot say that I think we would be justified in proceeding to pile on heavy rates of this kind, and I trust the Committee will not agree to the Amendment, which is really unnecessary.

(8.27.) MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): With regard to this Amendment, I feel we have not had time to ascertain the feeling of the County Councils themselves. The Amendment is one which is particularly fitted to be remitted to the County Councils for consideration. At the same time, I quite agree with the Lord Advocate that there are difficulties in the way. It would be a grievous burden, indeed, for poor localities to have a special rate imposed upon them for harbours. I do not feel competent to express an opinion on the matter one way or another; but, at the same time, I certainly appreciate the difficulties suggested by the Lord Advocate, especially having in view the peculiar circumstances of some of the districts.

DR. McDONALD: There are very considerable difficulties in dealing with this subject. The Island of Lewis requires a great many harbours; but as most of the members of the County Council belong to the mainland, the difficulty is to get that body to proceed in the matter. From that point of view, I can see a difficulty in assenting to the proposal of my hon. Friend. The Island of Lewis may be sacrificed by the mainlanders, because they would have to bear the brunt of the taxation, getting nothing of the benefit. That is an important point, and I should like to know how that can be avoided.

(8.30.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I have a similar Amendment, to permit a special assessment in a parish as well as in the county, but my proposition is only a 1d. rate for the whole parish. The Amendment of the hon. Member goes beyond that; he would permit a 6d. rate in addition to the 1d. rate for the county. This certainly contemplates a large rate, but I do not see why it should not be inserted in a permissive form, for there is a great deal to be said in favour of special areas of taxation. The only question is, whether you should have a smaller area than the parish, and whether there would not be bookkeeping difficulties in the working of the scheme. It would tend very much to remove difficulties if the County Council could come to terms with a parish, or those who desire the outlay, by which those particularly interested should take upon themselves voluntarily an extra rate. Under such circumstances, I think you would have more works carried out by the County Council, and I think perhaps a 3d. rate would be sufficient. I do not think very much harm could be done, for it would only apply within a special radius, and to one or two parishes, for, of course, a harbour might benefit adjoining parishes. The decision should be arrived at by a decisive majority of the ratepayers—say three-fourths or two-thirds—and, of course, the machinery for this would have to be provided. It could not do much harm, and it might enable the County Council to carry out schemes for the benefit of a particular parish, which otherwise they would be unwilling to undertake. I am in favour of some proposal of this kind.

(8.33.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The proposal of the hon. Member is that a 6d. rate should fall upon one district after the whole of the county has been assessed at 1d., the 6d. rate not being exacted by the County Council. I think the logical mind of my hon. Friend has overlooked the objection there is to this. A heavy burden might be imposed upon the

Island of Lewis, from which the mainland would be exempt; and the island would have but a fractional share in the administration, to the extent only of its representation on the Council. There is, I think, the gravest possible objection to the scheme, on the ground that it would make one set of people administrators while other people were to find the money. I do not think that it is necessary, plus the rate which the Bill proposes, to hold out the prospect of a 6d. rate; not only is it unnecessary, but the idea would have an injurious effect by frightening people as to future taxation. The prospect of a 6d. rate would, I think, have a tendency to rather retard than advance an improvement.

(8.35.) MR. CALDWELL: There is nothing novel about the proposal to impose an exceptional rate on a particular district; it is precisely what we have in the Public Health Act. I am anxious that this amount of money should be availed of to the fullest extent, and that works should not be hindered, because they will confer a benefit only on a limited area, the county, as a whole, not being interested. Of course, the 6d. rate may seem a large addition to the already heavy local burdens; but the effect of making harbours will be enormously to add to the industry and well-being of the people, and the consequence will be that there will be less poor rate to pay. That is the meaning and intention of the proposal. But, of course, I do not wish to interpose any obstacle in the way of carrying out the scheme of the Government. I suggest this as a means whereby I think works would be undertaken and carried out through the increased interest in a locality. I have no wish to press the proposal. (8.38.)

(9.12.) DR. CLARK: I would ask the hon. Member to withdraw the Amendment in order that the matter may be considered before Report, and because the hon. Member for Nairn, and another hon. Member who is interested, are not here. The hon. Member for Sutherland has only one island; I have only one, and my hon. Friend sitting near me (Dr. McDonald) has only one. The islands will be seriously affected by this; and as there is no machinery for ascertaining the opinions of the people, who should be largely in favour of it before they are taxed, I think it would be better for the Amendment to be withdrawn at present so that the subject can be raised again on Report.

DR. McDONALD: I agree with my hon. Friend in thinking that the Amendment should be withdrawn for the present. It is true, as the hon. Member beside me has stated, that I represent only one island, but that island is a large one, containing 7,000 people, and it is important that they should not be sat on by the mainland. And yet that will happen in the case of all the islands unless something is done in the direction of this Amendment. I think, however, that we should take the matter up on Report in a much more drastic manner than we do now, and provide means to prevent the islands from suffering injustice.

(9.15.) MR. CALDWELL: There is a provision in the Bill whereby a rate may be levied on those using the harbour. That may be right, but what we want to insist on is that these harbours will be of immense service to the mainland within a certain area. The landed proprietors will derive benefit from the works being in their neighbourhood, and yet there is no power to compel them to subscribe. The object of the Amendment is to impose a certain taxation on those who certainly will reap enormous benefit from the works. Taxation should be imposed not only on the landlords, but on the tenants. I recognise that we should require a large amount of machinery for the creation of the necessary Local Authority to carry out the Act within the district to be benefited. That machinery can only be provided by a succession of clauses to be introduced on Report. With the object of giving an opportunity for those clauses to be prepared I withdraw the present Amendment. The Government will understand that I do not wish to place any obstacle in the way of the carrying out of the Bill, but that my desire is to make the measure more efficient.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(9.18.) DR. CLARK: I beg to propose an Amendment to permit the County Council, if they think proper, to use the special grant made under the Local Government Act, 1889. Under that Act £10,000 was given to the counties, a limit being attached to the use of it. This Amendment will enable them to make a special subscription towards harbours, piers, or boat slips from that money. There will also be a Supplementary Estimate giving to Scotland an equivalent to the assisted education grant in England. This will probably be only for one year, and the great bulk of the work will be carried on for only one year. This Amendment will permit the County Council to use the sum during the year for the development of the piers and harbours. It is only a permissive clause. I do not know what the supplementary grant will be, but I understand there is to be one given to Scotland, and I therefore wish to give them permissive power to spend it in this way.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 14, after "gift," to insert "The county council may also use their portion of the ten thousand pounds granted to them by the first sub-section of the twenty-second section of 'The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,' and any sum that may be granted to them by the Supplementary Estimate making a grant to county council in Scotland equivalent to the assisted education England grant as a subscription towards the construction of any small harbour, pier, or boat slip."—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(9.20.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: As regards the Supplementary Estimate, I do not think it would be wise to adopt any such proposal. The Government have indicated to the House the proposals they are prepared to make on the subject, and it would be departing from the very general and entirely uncontroversial proposal which has been made—as to the application of the sum to be given to Scotland—if we were to accept an application to any specific purpose, such as the hon. Member suggests. I therefore hope that the House will not encourage the suggestion. As to the sum of £10,000 granted to the Highland counties under the Act of 1889, I have

Clause 1.

(8.6.) DR. McDONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to move the insertion of the words "the county council of Ross and Cromarty and the district Council of Lews" after the word "Scotland," in line 10. The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave us a promise the other night that none of this money would be spent except with the consent of the County Council of Ross and Cromarty and the District Council of Lews. I think it would be quite as well if, instead of having a mere understanding to this effect, we inserted distinct words in the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, after "Scotland," to insert "the county council of Ross and Cromarty and the district council of Lews."—(Dr. McDonald.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I hope the hon. Gentleman will not press the Amendment. The Government entirely adhere to what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said, namely, that no roads in the island will be proceeded with under the present scheme, except with the approbation and concurrence of the County Council. It will be obvious to the hon. Gentleman that the Central Governing Authorities which have the duty of dispensing this money, and are responsible for it, stand in a different statutory position from the County Council. The hon. Member will be satisfied, I hope, with the assurance that the County Council will be taken along with the Government in what is being done, and I am happy to know that matters are even now harmoniously proceeding in the communications with the Local Authorities.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I hope my hon. Friend will not think it necessary to press this Amendment. At the same time, the Chancellor of the Exchequer got this special Vote on the express condition that the County Council or District Council was to determine as to the expenditure of the money. I held then, as I hold now, that to expend £15,000 on the Carlaway road would be a misuse of the money; and probably the Secretary for Scotland is already aware of that from the representations of his engineers.

DR. McDONALD: In face of the assurance of the Lord Advocate I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2.

(8.10.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to move to add to Sub-section 3 of the clause the words

"The county council may also, before resolving to proceed as aforesaid, determine the boundaries of the special harbour or local works district, and such district shall be liable to special taxation under sub-section (25) hereof."

My Amendment is intended to facilitate the object of the Bill. The Government evidently intend that there shall be small harbours, piers, and boat slips made for the convenience of the crofters in the localities, and what I propose is that these various little communities shall be formed into special districts with the object of getting a local contribution towards the work. For that purpose it is necessary to form them into a special district, following the principle of the Public Health Act, which sets up special drainage and water districts. We cannot expect the people of Ross-shire in the mainland, far away from the sea, to be heavily taxed for the purpose of a harbour away on the west coast. The Amendment, therefore, is to form a special harbour or works district whereby the parties, both landlord and tenant, who are to get the benefit of the works shall contribute towards them in the only way in which we can get contributions from a locality.

(8.15.) MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire Crewe): Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to move an Amendment in the previous line? [MR. CALDWELL: Certainly.] I am anxious that Nairn should be included amongst the counties that are to get the benefit of the Bill. I have a very considerable acquaintance with the County and Borough of Nairn. The people of Nairn are essentially of the same class as those to whom the Bill applies. They are engaged in the same fishing, and require the same harbour accommodation; and as they have already got a harbour, which, however, does not meet the necessities of the case, I trust the Lord Advocate will see his way to accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 13, after "Cromarty," to insert "Nairn."
—(Mr. W. M'Laren.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Nairn' be there inserted."

(8.18.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: One result of there being no notice of this Amendment is that the hon. Member for the county (Mr. Seymour Keay), who is chiefly interested, and whose assiduity is unquestionable, is not present, and I therefore rather conjecture that the County of Nairn does not substantially desire the benefit suggested by the hon. Gentleman, who, with great deference, is quite an outsider. The proposal, however, is subject to very great objection. If there is to be a competition of this kind raised, every Scottish Member will at once come forward with a claim on behalf of his own constituency. The matter must be regarded strictly within the four corners of the Vote, and the proper time for raising any question as to the scope and application of the grant was when the Vote was taken.

MR. M'LAREN: I may be permitted to say that I am not altogether an outsider, for on a former occasion I was a candidate for the burghs of which Nairn forms one. On that occasion I pledged myself, at the earnest request of the people of Nairn, to do anything I could to forward their interests.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 14, after "gift," insert "the county council may also, before resolving to proceed as aforesaid, determine the boundaries of the special harbour or local works district, and such district shall be liable to special taxation under sub-section (25) hereof."
—(Mr. Caldwell.)

(8.24.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The proposal of the hon. Member (Mr. Caldwell) is open to very serious objection. The proposal of the Government is that the body which is to have the responsibility is the County Council; and, accordingly, the natural area of rating is to square with the area for which the administrative body is elected, namely, the county. The effect of the hon. Gentleman's proposal will be that members of the County Council, drawn from other portions of the county, will have no compunction at all in the matter of administration if they can put the cost upon one district which they do not represent. Several hon. Members must be aware of the exceedingly heavy rates which exist in some parts of the Highlands. The County Council has this year been representing that the burden on the ratepayers in the Island of Lewis is excessive and intolerable. Therefore, I cannot say that I think we would be justified in proceeding to pile on heavy rates of this kind, and I trust the Committee will not agree to the Amendment, which is really unnecessary.

(8.27.) MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): With regard to this Amendment, I feel we have not had time to ascertain the feeling of the County Councils themselves. The Amendment is one which is particularly fitted to be remitted to the County Councils for consideration. At the same time, I quite agree with the Lord Advocate that there are difficulties in the way. It would be a grievous burden, indeed, for poor localities to have a special rate imposed upon them for harbours. I do not feel competent to express an opinion on the matter one way or another; but, at the same time, I certainly appreciate the difficulties suggested by the Lord Advocate, especially having in view the peculiar circumstances of some of the districts.

(8.30.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I have a similar Amendment, to permit a special assessment in a parish as well as in the county, but my proposition is only a 1d. rate for the whole parish. (9.12.) DR. CLARK: I would ask the hon. Member to withdraw the Amendment in order that the matter may be considered before Report, and because the hon. Member for Nairn, and another hon. The Government will understand that I do not wish to place any obstacle in the way of the carrying out of the Bill, but that my desire is to make the measure more efficient.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(9.18.) DR. CLARK: I beg to propose an Amendment to permit the County Council, if they think proper, to use the special grant made under the Local Government Act, 1889. Under that Act £10,000 was given to the counties, a limit being attached to the use of it. This Amendment will enable them to make a special subscription towards harbours, piers, or boat slips from that money. There will also be a Supplementary Estimate giving to Scotland an equivalent to the assisted education grant in England. This will probably be only for one year, and the great bulk of the work will be carried on for only one year. I do not know what the supplementary grant will be, but I understand there is to be one given to Scotland, and I therefore wish to give them permissive power to spend it in this way.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 14, after "gift," to insert "The county council may also use their portion of the ten thousand pounds granted to them by the first sub-section of the twenty-second section of 'The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,' and any sum that may be granted to them by the Supplementary Estimate making a grant to county council in Scotland equivalent to the assisted education England grant as a subscription towards the construction of any small harbour, pier, or boat slip."—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(9.20.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: As regards the Supplementary Estimate, I do not think it would be wise to adopt any such proposal. The Government have indicated to the House the proposals they are prepared to make on the subject, and it would be departing from the very general and entirely uncontroversial proposal which has been made—as to the application of the sum to be given to Scotland—if we were to accept an application to any specific purpose, such as the hon. Member suggests. I therefore hope that the House will not encourage the suggestion. As to the sum of £10,000 granted to the Highland counties under the Act of 1889, I have something quite different to say. I cannot help thinking that that is a very good idea. I believe the hon. Member for St. Rollox has made a suggestion of a more general kind in a new clause he proposes to move. In the Amendment under consideration the hon. Member proposes to authorise any County Council, if so advised, to take its share of the £10,000 and give it as a subscription to a proposed new harbour. The Member for St. Rollox in the new clause proposes that in place of that the share of the county shall be available for the purposes of the Act. I do not suppose the hon. Member for Caithness attaches any special importance to a county taking the initiative, and paying down as a subscription its share, and probably the hon. Member is in general sympathy with the Member for St. Rollox. The best plan of harmonising these views, and giving effect to the hon. Member's own idea, would be to invest a power in the County Council at the end of Sub-section 26 to make available their share of this money for the making up of any deficit which might arise upon the construction of harbours, of which the County Council were the administrators. I would therefore propose to insert, at the end of Sub-section 26, the following:—

“ Provided also that for the purpose of meeting any such deficiency the county council may apply any moneys falling to them under the provisions of section 22, sub-section 1, of ‘The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,’ as if such purpose were one of the purposes to which such money may be applied under the provisions aforesaid.”

In general, therefore, I accept this Amendment, but I should propose that the words I have quoted should be inserted at the end of the sub-section.

(9.24.) DR. CLARK: I do not think that would serve the object I have in view. What I desire is that if the County Councils want to get the Government to spend money for harbour construction they shall back it up by themselves, giving a proportion of the special grant which is given only to those counties. I want the County Council to have this money, and to be able to give a subscription or a grant towards any scheme which they think ought to be carried out. They have now the power of using this £10,000 for any purpose they think proper in reducing taxation. They also have the power of using the residue of the grant either for the purpose of reducing taxation or for technical education. I desire that they should be able to use the sum given by this Bill either for promoting the establishments of piers and harbours or for reducing taxation. The 26th clause only affects works that have been constructed out of money granted by Parliament, which money has not been sufficient to defray the whole cost of construction. I want to go beyond cases of that kind.

(9.27.) MR. CALDWELL: The £10,000 was granted to the Highlands in connection with exceptional works, and if this Bill had been before Parliament at the time there is no doubt that the sum would have been specially appropriated to the objects mentioned in it. As it is, the £10,000 might be held not to apply to the purposes of the present Bill. It is true that if the money is applied to other purposes there will be less taxation, but there is this difficulty: that Sub-section 26 applies to any case of deficiency in construction. I intend to move to leave out the sub-section altogether; and, therefore, I can hardly consent to a proviso being added to a proviso which I think had better be left out altogether. The object of my Amendment is to give to the County Council the power to apply the £10,000 to the purposes of this Bill in the same way as money is applied by the Local Government Act to the purposes of that Act.

(9.30.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I should be inclined to accept the hon. Member's proposal with this modification, that in lieu of the words “purposes of this Act,” the words shall read “purposes of Sub-sections 25 and 26 of this Act.” I agree with him that what we aim at is to strengthen the resources of the counties referred to out of this fund for the purposes of harbours, and I ask how can we do that better than by placing at their disposal for the purposes of the Act the moneys in question? You will give them good heart to enter on these works by the additional resources placed at their disposal.

DR. CLARK: Are we to take it that the right hon. Gentleman means for the cost of harbours as well as for the construction of harbours for the purposes of the Act?

MR. CALDWELL: The hon. Member surely does not suppose that Sub-sections 25 and 26 will have that effect.

DR. CLARK: I will wait and see what else may be proposed, and, in the meantime, will ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(9.35.) DR. McDONALD: I now beg to move as an Amendment, in line 17, after "from," to insert "the district committee, or." This will require that the County Council shall concur with the District Committee, and I would point out, as showing the necessity of this, that in these islands there is no one to take the lead in such matters, and where they have to send to Glasgow for an engineer to prepare plans and estimates the expense is very considerable. If the District Committee are consulted about these matters they can act for the whole of the Islands, and can take the lead in these matters with the money at their disposal, inasmuch as they have the taxation of the district at their back. If, however, it rests with the persons locally interested to incur the preliminary expenses, the Act will frequently be inoperative, because those in the locality will not undertake the cost.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 17, after the word "from," to insert the words "the District Committee or."—(Dr. McDonald.)

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Although this is only a small matter, I hope the Committee will stand by the Bill as it is. I ask, is it too much to say that the persons locally interested shall be at the initial cost of the plans? The proposal of the Amendment is that, as those locally interested are unable to bear the expense, it shall fall on us; but the first condition of applying for Parliamentary money is that, where there is a desire on the part of those living in a particular locality to have certain works done for their benefit, they should at least go to the expense of proving that those works are really essential.

(9.40.) MR. CALDWELL: But if in some of these localities the persons locally interested are to be at the preliminary cost, how are you to get them to act? If you form them into a district you will then have a body able to do what is necessary. If you formed the localities into districts the districts would be taxed for the preparation of the plans. How, under the proposal of the Bill, are you to get at the persons locally interested? Who are they? How is it possible for the County Council to levy a tax upon them? If you propose to tax the people locally interested you must form them into districts and create some kind of autonomy whereby you can assess them.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I concur in the objection of the Lord Advocate to entertain a proposal of this kind unless there are some means of getting the initial cost from the people locally interested. At the same time, I think the right hon. Gentleman will admit that as the Bill stands it is hardly fair, because if you make those locally interested the responsible parties and entrust them with the duty of preparing plans, and the County Council, which is to be consulted, are to recover the money from those locally interested, that does not seem to be a businesslike proposal. Therefore, I think the alternative is to leave the expense with the County Council, or to put it, as the hon. Member for St. Rollox proposes, on the District Committee.

(9.45.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The whole question is this: By this Bill we say that an application in respect of these works is to be forwarded to the County Council, but the people forwarding these applications are not to spend the county rates in obtaining plans and specifications for works that may prove to be abortive.

DR. CLARK: I am inclined to support the Government in this matter as the result of my experience of the Crofters' Act in regard to the provision of boats. I would point out that under Sub-section 3 the County Council have, first, to see what local support is to be given, and if the people of the locality are not prepared to subscribe the cost of the plans the works can hardly be worth having. The amount is very small, and there are always local engineers employed at the different harbours from whom plans and specifications may be had at a very slight charge. I think the districts immediately concerned ought to subscribe. They may get subscriptions from the landlords. In one of the islands there were two landlords who were willing to subscribe £50 each for preliminary expenses, because they knew they would benefit from the increased value of their land caused by the new harbour works as much as the crofters.

(9.50.) DR. McDONALD: I did not suggest that it was for want of public spirit that the people locally interested would not pay the preliminary expenses, but because they could not afford it. My hon. Friend on my right says, "If a locality will not pay it ought not to be helped." But there are many who are so poor that they cannot spend the money. Are they not to be helped? I say it is not right to compel a few persons to go to this expense, and refuse to back them up if the works they ask for are not made. In a great many of the islands this Act will prove useless for want of means to pay the preliminary expenses.

Amendment negatived.

Another Amendment made.

MR. CALDWELL: I now move to leave out Sub-section (26). As the Bill now stands there is no limit to the amount of taxation imposed. This is an important matter, because in the case of harbours it is almost impossible to tell what the cost will be. It is provided that the locality getting the benefit of the works shall be liable to special contributions respecting them; and I think it most unfair that the adjacent landed proprietors, whose property will be immensely improved by these works, are not to be called upon to contribute any more than landed proprietors living 25 or 50 miles away. The whole county assessment should be liable for any deficiency in the construction of the works.

Dr. Clark

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I do not think the hon. Member will seriously press this proposal. The case is simply this: The County Council approach the Government with a plan for a harbour and undertake to do the work. They therefore derive all the benefits arising from the administration of those works, but the hon. Member proposes that nevertheless they are not to be liable for any deficiency in the cost of construction. I say that that is a plan which has no bottom in it, and which merely gives a sham system of administering harbours to the body which has undertaken their construction. For Parliament to sanction a proposal of this kind would, in my opinion, be utterly absurd.

(9.55.) DR. CLARK: We have had one or two serious examples of what may happen in regard to the construction of these works. In the case of the Wick Harbour the Treasury came to the assistance of the Corporation because they had compelled them to adopt a plan by which a great many thousands of pounds were literally thrown into the sea, and in the case of any of these harbours there is always the possibility that the works may be destroyed by a sudden storm. I think, therefore, that if the Government give the County Council power to construct such works they ought to bear a portion of the expense, because the Government have considered the plans and estimates as well as the County Council, and their approval ought to be accompanied by the consequent responsibility.

MR. CRAWFORD: I think it would be very prejudicial to the interests of the public if the County Council were not to be responsible for the completion of the works within certain limits, but within those limits they ought not to shirk the responsibility of providing the necessary funds.

MR. CALDWELL: If the County Council are to be entirely responsible, the result will be that they will refuse to sanction any harbour works at all;

because it has been shown to be impossible to estimate the cost of construction before these works are commenced. I regard this sub-section as a practical estoppel to this transaction, and that is why I proposed my Amendment that the locality reaping the benefit of a harbour should bear the loss up to a certain point.

DR. CLARK: Might I suggest a compromise? In Sub-section 25 there is a limit of 1d. in the £1 for maintenance, but this sub-section contains no limitation at all. Would it not be possible to insert a limitation, say of 6d. or 1s. in the £1?

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: I beg to move, in line 15, to leave out "two" and insert "five." My object is to make the Bill applicable to a class of cases at present entirely excluded from it. Why it should be so I am entirely at a loss to understand. The House has already voted for harbour purposes £40,000, and the whole sum wanted for piers and harbours is only £43,000. It has already been pointed out that a great deal of money will be absorbed in preliminary expenses, and that there are many things which cannot be done without going through a very costly and dilatory process. As I understand it, there is no justification whatever for the introduction of this Bill, except in the matter of this grant for harbours, and it was upon that grant alone that I advocated the bringing in of the Bill. I wish to substitute £5,000 for £2,000 in order that the provision may cover cases in my own constituency. I should like to know what defence the Lord Advocate has to give for his proposal as it stands. No doubt there is a dispensing power on the part of the Chief Secretary for Scotland, and if I get a promise that it will be used and applied to cases in my own constituency I shall be satisfied. I beg to move the substitution of £5,000 for £2,000.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 15, to leave out the word "two," and insert the word "five."—(Mr. Angus Sutherland.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'two' stand part of the Clause."

(10.2.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I hope, in the first place, the Committee will understand this provision by no means limits the grant of money to the smaller harbours under £2,000. It merely applies a limitation to the smaller harbours by the short and somewhat arbitrary plan of fixing the details in which these harbours are to be carried out. As regards the larger harbours, it would be considered somewhat harsh of the Government to prescribe to the Local Authorities what are to be the precise conditions under which the harbours are to be administered. It is not merely a question of cheapening the cost, but it is also a question of stereotyping and making definite and somewhat rigid the conditions which are so to be applied. Some Harbour Authorities have already got Provisional Orders, and they merely require adjustment for the increased money.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: That must be only in the case of harbours begun years ago.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Precisely. I am speaking only of some harbours, of which Ness is one. The hon. Gentleman has shown a natural anxiety about the grants of money already made, but he may be quite certain that the Secretary for Scotland—to say nothing by way of prejudging anything that may be submitted to him—will consider the fact of the money having been voted as one of the considerations to be borne in mind. I cannot, however, give a promise as to the particular cases mentioned. It is obvious that it is the interest of the House and of the Government to give fair play to what is an experimental proceeding with regard to Provisional Orders, and the experiment must be cautiously administered, not the least in the interests of the localities themselves. Never before has Parliament agreed to a proposal for the wholesale granting of Provisional Orders.

(10.6.) DR. CLARK: Surely the Lord Advocate does not contend that the people should be at the cost of obtaining Provisional Orders in the larger cases. If so, then nothing can be done until next Session, and there is no necessity to vote the money. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider that the cases of the harbours in Sutherlandshire and Skye which have been mentioned are exceptional, and that they will be dealt with accordingly. With regard to the limit of £2,000 I agree that that is rather low, and I think it might well be extended to £3,000. £2,000 is a very small sum for constructing a harbour; it might suffice to make a boat-station or to throw out a little breakwater, but £3,000 is the least with which a decent fishing harbour can be secured. If the Government agree to substitute £3,000 for £2,000 they will improve the Bill, and it should be remembered that it will still be impossible to do anything without the sanction first of the County Council and then of the Secretary for Scotland. I hope that in this case the Lord Advocate will fight our battle against the Treasury.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: I have no desire to unduly press the right hon. Gentleman on this point, but I do regret the Lord Advocate is not in a position to give me a more definite answer in regard to the harbours I have mentioned. I therefore feel myself compelled to divide the Committee on the Amendment.

(10.10.) DR. CAMERON: Why will not the right hon. Gentleman meet us half way and, to use a sporting phrase, "split the difference"?

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I think the Government should respond to the appeal made by my hon. Friend. I am not acquainted practically with the work of harbour construction, but it seems hardly possible to construct even the smallest harbour for a sum of £2,000. If money is to be given for the construction of these harbours such a figure should be mentioned in the Bill as will make the provisions operative.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I quite agree it is impossible to make a harbour for £2,000. As Chairman of the Piers and Harbours (Ireland) Commission I am sure of that. Some years ago, when labour was cheaper, it might have been possible to do it for £2,500, but even that is not now possible. I think the Government ought to fix a sum of £3,000 or £4,000.

MR. D. CRAWFORD: The Lord Advocate said it was not desirable to issue these Provisional Orders on too lavish a scale, and that it was better the Bill should be limited to comparatively small undertakings. But may I remind him that the requisites of Provisional Orders will already have been fulfilled in these cases, because a Government inquiry has been held as to the utility and expediency of these undertakings, and full publicity given to the matter. Seeing how very little can be done for £2,000, I think it would be wise to raise the figure.

(10.15.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 94; Noes 52.—(Div. List, No. 328.)

(10.24.) Original Question again proposed.

DR. CLARK: Cannot we have some kind of compromise? I move to insert the figure of £2,500.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. CLARK: I think, Sir, it would be in order for me to move the insertion of "five hundred," as the figure 2 still stands in the clause.

*Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 15, after "two thousand," to insert "five hundred."—(Dr. Clark.)

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The sum of £2,000 was arrived at after very careful consideration by the several Departments concerned, and we cannot alter it.

Amendment negatived.

New Clause—

(Amendment of 52 & 53 Vic. c. 50, s. 22.)

"Sub-section (1) of section 22 of 'The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,' is hereby amended to the effect of authorising county councils in receipt of the annual grant of ten thousand pounds to apply the proportion affording to them respectively or any portion thereof to the purposes of this Act, or in relief of local taxation for the purposes of this Act in such county,"—(Mr. Caldwell.)

—brought up, and read the first and second time.

Amendment proposed, in line 5, after the words "purposes of," to insert the words "section 2, sub-sections 25 and 26 of."—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

DR. CLARK: What is the meaning of this Amendment? If it is to limit the powers of the County Council, I should prefer the clause as it stands. As it now stands the money will be used for any purpose under the Act. I do not see why it should be limited as the right hon. Gentleman proposes.

(10.28.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: My object is to limit the clause. I have no doubt that if the clause in its present form is allowed to stand no Court will allow money to be spent except under under Sub-sections 25 and 26, which are the sub-sections which deal with the executive powers of the County Council in spending money. I therefore prefer the gloss which I have ventured to put on the generality of the clause.

DR. CLARK: I am not at all satisfied with this explanation, and shall press my objection to a Division. What I want is that when Parliament votes a special sum for a special district the County Council shall not have power to say how the money shall be spent. All I ask is that the £10,000 which is granted to the counties affected by this Bill to meet these exceptional circumstances shall not go into the pockets of the landlords and large tenants by being applied to a reduction of the rates, but shall be used for the benefit of the crofters. I fear that at least two-thirds of it will go into the pockets of the landlords and sportsmen and big farmers, who have done so much to produce the misery we are now trying to remedy. This money is really wanted for the purpose of developing the resources of the county, and not for the purpose of reducing the rates of landlords and big tenants. You are not giving us a penny for the crofters, and on that ground I intend to go to a Division.

DR. McDONALD: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend, and if he divides the Committee I shall go into the Lobby with him.

(10.33.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 109; Noes 53.—(Div. List, No. 329.)

Clauses, as amended, added.

Bill reported.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: We will put down the consideration for Thursday.

(10.40.) DR. CLARK: I hope the Report stage will be deferred to a later date. Several Scotch Members who are much interested in the Bill, and who have some important questions to put in reference to it, are absent, and may not be able to return to the House by Thursday.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: I join in the request of the hon. Member for Caithness. It is necessary that we should have an opportunity of corresponding with the County Councils on the matter.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: It is most desirable that the work should be set about at once. That is the reason for the introduction of the Bill, and the districts interested are very anxious that no time should be lost. I should have thought hon. Members opposite would have been aware of this, and would have met the proposal in the same spirit. The Government, therefore, will certainly retain the appointment for Thursday, and if circumstances then make it necessary to postpone the Bill, the responsibility must rest with hon. Members.

Bill, as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

METALLIFEROUS MINES (ISLE OF MAN) BILL.—(No. 400.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(10.42.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Does not this Bill deal with a matter which can be dealt with by the House of Keys?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The Bill does not belong to that category, being a Bill to amend an Act of the Imperial Parliament. It is introduced in this House at the expressed wish of the Authorities of the Isle of Man.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

POST OFFICE ACTS AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 366.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(10.43.) Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, to leave out "before the first day of January next."—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I rise for the purpose of asking the right hon. Gentleman to repeat publicly the assurance which he has given some of those interested in this clause privately as to the exact intention of the clause. I had put down an Amendment stipulating that certain marks on newspapers should not be held as rendering the newspapers liable to surcharge. The right hon. Gentleman gave excellent reasons for leaving the matter to be settled by regulation by the Post Office Authorities. But at some future date the officials may not know the exact meaning of the clause, and therefore it is well the right hon. Gentleman should make some public statement to which we may refer if any dispute arises.

*SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I wish to put a question to my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General, which is one of great importance to Friendly Societies. I want to know whether there is a clause in the Bill which deals with a grievance under which the Friendly Societies of this country have laboured for a number of years, and to which over and over again they have drawn the attention of the Postmaster General. I would ask whether there is a clause in the Bill which will allow circulars issued by lodges of Friendly Societies to go through the post at a halfpenny instead of a penny rate? The question is one that has been brought to the notice of my right hon. Friend several times by the "Friendly Societies Conference," representing 2,229,000 members and £16,000,000 capital.

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The hon. Baronet the Member for Norfolk has quite rightly represented the intention of the Government in dealing with the circulars of friendly societies. Constant complaints have been made that owing to the existing regulations with regard to circulars the members are continually surcharged in consequence of some entry in writing upon a document which is otherwise printed. I hope and believe that as soon as the Treasury Warrant under this Act is promulgated these societies will see that their wishes have been met and that the grievance has been remedied. What I understand the hon. Member for Glasgow to desire to do is not merely to allow a newspaper to pass which has got on the cover "See mark inside," but to extend that privilege to other indicative marks, such as "See page 5," or sometimes, as advertisers prefer, a hand pointing to page 3 or 4, as the case may be. It is to enable the Department to frame the regulations in a more comprehensive way that the clause is drawn in the particular shape in which it appears in the Bill, and our one desire in so doing is to afford much greater latitude than could be done by any specific exemption in dealing with these indicative marks on newspapers, which are largely used both by advertisers and also by companies when they send out to their shareholders copies of a newspaper containing a report of their general meetings.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2.

*(10.52.) MR. RAIKES: I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name, which is intended to meet the requirements of newspapers, and at the same time to give due protection to the Revenue.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 22, after "but," to leave out to end of sub-section, and insert "all sheets of a supplement shall be put together at some one part of the registered newspaper, whether gummed or stitched up with the newspaper or not."—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

DR. CAMERON: I have to move an Amendment, with the object of making it perfectly plain that the Bill carries out the intentions expressed by the Postmaster General on the Second Reading respecting supplements to illustrated papers.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 25, to leave out from "There," to "Supplement," in line 27, and insert "There shall further be repealed so much of the said section six as requires the supplement to a newspaper to have the date of publication of the newspaper printed on the top of every page, or of every sheet or side on which any engraving, print, or lithograph appears."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*(10.55.) MR. RAIKES: I think this Amendment is better drafted than the sub-section as it stands in the Bill. I should say, however, that the intention of the Government has been to relieve from the necessity of affixing a date only those supplements which consist of engravings, lithographs, or illustrations, and not to relieve every supplement from the necessity of affixing a date. We have felt it desirable to insist on that point, because otherwise the door might be left open for stereotyped advertisements being published as a supplement to a newspaper without any date, and I think the requirement of the date should still be enforced as regards any supplement of that description. I will accept the Amendment, subject to the insertion, if necessary, of verbal Amendments on Report.

DR. CAMERON: I shall be very ready to accept that proposal, but I do not think any Amendment will be necessary.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will take power at later stages to modify the definition of a newspaper contained in Section 6? Objection is taken to the limitation of a newspaper to a document containing a particular kind of news. It has been shown that many very good publications are not allowed to pass as newspapers simply because they do not contain political or police news, whereas papers of a much more unhealthy tendency, which give all the police court cases, are allowed so to pass. I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not possible to meet the application which has been made as to the relaxation of the definition?

*(11.0.) MR. RAIKES: The hon. Member has quite correctly stated that I have had the views of a representative deputation in regard to a great many magazines and other publications which in some degree partake of the character of a newspaper. I listened with great attention to what was said by members of that deputation, and have given careful consideration to suggestions made then and since. I quite admit that the question of the further definition of a newspaper is one that might very well occupy the attention of the Government, and is not unlikely to occupy the attention of Parliament in the future, but, having regard to the importance of passing this Bill, it is inexpedient to embark upon so large a question at the present time. I am therefore obliged to resist the introduction of any definition of what constitutes a newspaper. It is on that account that the hon. Member for Canterbury has withdrawn an Amendment which stood in his name going in this direction. Without promising to introduce a Bill on the subject, I will undertake that it shall not be lost sight of, and I shall be ready to consider any suggestions offered.

quite appreciate the difficulty of dealing with the subject, but to illustrate its urgency I would mention that the postage of Good Words, weighing 6 oz., is 1½d., whilst in America the postage of Harper's Magazine is a farthing, the weight being 14 oz., and the price 1s. So that a magazine in America is transmitted by post for an additional 2 per cent. on the cost, but in this country at an additional 25 per cent. I do not make any suggestion with a view of injuring the Postal Revenue, because I believe the greater facilities that are offered for circulation, the larger the revenue that will be brought in. It is a question that requires considerable care, and this it must receive. Subject to that I endorse what the right hon. Gentleman has said.

(11.5.) DR. CAMERON: While the definition requires amendment, I quite agree that it is a matter not to be dealt with hurriedly. I agree that at this period of the Session it would be hazardous to attempt a new definition of a newspaper, and that the work had better be postponed to another Session.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 omitted.

Clause 4.

*MR. RAIKES: Here I propose to leave out the reference to the maximum weight of newspapers, for I think it is part of the question to be considered in connection with the definition of a newspaper.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 14, to leave out sub-section "(a)."—
(Mr. Raikes.)

Amendment agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

*MR. LENG (Dundee): I am under the impression that the phrase "postal packet" includes newspapers. Will the facilities for re-addressing be extended to newspapers?

*MR. RAIKES: That is a point requiring some further consideration. If the hon. Gentleman will repeat his question on the Report stage I shall be in a position to give him a more definite answer than now I can.

MR. PICTON: The Treasury are here given the power of making regulations as to the re-addressing of "postal packets," which, as I understand, include newspapers. Has the right hon. Gentleman considered the point in relation to newspapers sent to our soldiers and sailors abroad? Is it not possible to let these have their newspapers at a cheaper rate? Letters they receive at a cheaper rate, but they have to pay more for receiving newspapers than letters. Of course, soldiers and sailors when they go abroad are anxious to know the news of the countryside, and what is going on around their old home, but the cost of postage prevents them from having their newspapers as they otherwise would. It is a small point, though important to the men in the Services. Will the right hon. Gentleman consider whether power should be taken to deal with this matter? He told me that the Post Office had no power to reduce the rate, but is it not desirable that our soldiers and sailors should have newspapers as well as letters at a cheaper rate?

*MR. RAIKES: This clause has reference only to the question of re-direction; it has no reference to the particular point raised by the hon. Member. I think it would be better that we should keep all these questions relating to newspapers together. I do not think it would be germane to the Bill as it now stands to introduce a particular reference to the postage of newspapers to soldiers and sailors, but I will keep it in mind.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): The right hon. Gentleman will perhaps also consider whether in the re-addressing of newspapers to sailors from port to port there should be a reduction of postage.

(11.10.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): In this Clause 4 it is provided that power should be given to the Treasury to alter the present rate imposed upon re-directed letters, but I rather gathered that postal packets were to be sent free when re-directed. Is that so, or is a lower rate to be imposed?

*MR. RAIKES: The intention is to abrogate the charge on re-directed postal packets.

MR. MORTON: Altogether?

*MR. RAIKES: Yes.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clauses 5, 6, and 7, agreed to.

Clause 8.

*MR. RAIKES: I have a small Amendment to propose, which does not appear on the Paper, in line 14, to add after "or" the words "with the consent of the Local Government Board," that is to say, that when any land is appropriated by a Municipal Authority for the purposes of a post office, the assent of the Local Government Board to the appropriation shall first be required. It has been thought desirable, in the interest of the ratepayers, to introduce these words as a sort of check upon too effusive liberality on the part of an Urban Sanitary Authority. Therefore, I move to insert the words. I may say that, as the law stands, such bodies are not able to make grants of money without the sanction of the Local Government Board, and we think that a grant of land should be on the same footing as a grant of money.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 14, after "or," to insert, "with the consent of the Local Government Board."
—(Mr. Raikes.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

DR. CAMERON: These words would not apply to Scotland, I presume? It is not proposed that the Local Government Board should give its consent there. It would be an extension of jurisdiction that is not desirable. We have in Scotland no Local Government Board in the sense in which that Board exercises control in England. We have in some sort an equivalent in the Board of Supervision, but I think it would be desirable to exempt Scotland from such a provision as this, leaving the Municipal Authorities to deal with these matters with the assent of the Secretary of State for Scotland.

MR. RAIKES: It is a point to consider, and perhaps the hon. Member will raise the question again on the Report stage.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I greatly object to continually bringing in the authority of the Local Government Board. I have great respect for the Board and for its President, but I do not think the Board knows more about local affairs than the Local Authority. These references to the Central Authority cause many difficulties. I remember that in the neighbourhood of Liverpool there was some trifling little notice issued in reference to cattle disease, and this it appeared had been issued without consultation with the proper authority, and the correspondence and trouble that ensued cost more than the printing of the notice itself. There is too much meddling by the Central Authority in everything that is done. Surely the representatives of the ratepayers are likely to look after the local interests. We have been told that the sanction is required in matters of money, and I am sorry that is so. There is no reason why it should be extended to land also. The Local Authority can, I think, very well be trusted.

*(11.15.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): This is only in conformity with the existing law. So far as concerns the disposal of money raised by the rates no consent of the Local Government Board is required. But it has rightly been considered by Parliament that the Local Government Board is to some extent the guardian of property for posterity, and so no money can be borrowed or land alienated without the assent of the Board. The land belongs not to the present ratepayers, but to the Municipality for all time. Money borrowed for this purpose, or land contributed, stands in the same position.

MR. MORTON: I find nothing in the clause about borrowed money, and I therefore do not understand the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. But in reference to land, I object to this introduction of the authority of the Local Government Board,

So far as my experience goes, these Local Government Board inquiries serve no purpose but to help to keep up a big staff in London, and to find employment for idle people who cannot be provided for in any other way. I object to the principle of centralisation thus introduced. This interposition of the Central Board has a harmful effect, because you will not get the best men to serve on these Local Bodies if they are to be under the supervision of somebody in London.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: How does this agree with the Municipal Corporations Act, which provides that a Corporation shall not alienate any land without the assent of the Treasury?

*MR. RITCHIE: That has since been transferred to the Local Government Board.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(11.19.) MR. PICKERSGILL: This seems to me to be rather a beggarly clause for a large and lucrative Department to introduce into the Bill. It is an attempt to shift off to other shoulders a burden which ought to fall on the Department. The clause is—

"Where the council of any borough or the urban sanitary authority of any district consider that it would be beneficial to the inhabitants of such borough or district that any new post office should be on a more expensive site, or of a larger size, or of a more ornate building or otherwise of a more expensive character than the Postmaster General would otherwise provide, such council or authority may contribute towards such new post office, either by a grant of money or the appropriation of land belonging to the council or authority, or by the purchase of land for the purpose."

Now, the Committee will see that this clause provides for the case in a manner quite different to that proposed in the Amendment on the Paper in the name of an hon. Member on this side of the House, which is a proposal that where a district is not entitled to have a post office at all, it may arrange with the Postmaster General to have a post office on guaranteeing the Department against loss. That seems to me a reasonable and convenient proposal. But Clause 8 deals with a totally different state of things. Clause 8 assumes that a new post office is about to be built, and enables the locality to have a better post office than that contemplated by the Department on payment of the difference in expense. Now, my point is this, the Postmaster General is already bound to provide for a locality such a post office building as is suitable to local requirements. How can the Local Authority determine what is wanted in regard to size? Only the experience of the Department can determine that. If the Department is bound to provide a suitable building, I do not see what the district is to receive for the subsidy it is invited to grant. It may be said the clause does not compel, but only permits, the Local Authority to grant a subsidy, and therefore it can do no harm. But there I take issue, and say I think it will do harm. I contend that the result of introducing such a clause as this will be to lower the normal standard for post office buildings. The Department will also put pressure on the locality to grant a subsidy in order that the buildings may be of a better character. This great Department of State will be reduced, I might almost say, to the level of those American Railway Companies who issue a general invitation to towns on the route to provide subsidies in cash or land. On these grounds I demur to the policy of this clause, and should Members of the Committee be disposed to take my view. I am willing to divide against it.

*(11.22.) MR. RAIKES: I think I shall be able to reassure the hon. Gentleman as to the purpose of the clause, which in its object is wholly permissive. There is not the slightest idea of putting pressure upon any Municipal or other Urban Authority. As the law now stands, however, Local Authorities are restrained from doing that which they would wish to do if they were able. A case occurred the other day which first suggested to me the desirableness of introducing this clause. There was an important manufacturing town in the north with a piece of land in the immediate neighbourhood of its public buildings, which would serve as a suitable site for a post office. The existing post office is in a part of the town not altogether inconvenient, but not by any means so suitable; the requirements of the service having outgrown the accommodation provided many years ago. Under such circumstances it is usual for the Post Office, with the assent of the Treasury, to add to the existing building. The Corporation offered, in consideration of a transfer of the post office to a more convenient site in the town, to make a present of a small portion of the land on which to build a post office. The grant was accepted, but afterwards grave doubts arose as to whether the Corporation were legally empowered to do this. It appears to me that many similar cases might arise, and thus it is desirable to obtain power to legalise such transactions and to enable Local Authorities to offer sites in order to secure the most convenient buildings. It is quite possible, also, that questions may arise as to style and decoration, and harmony with existing buildings. The Post Office, with the Treasury at its elbow, might not find itself in a position to build a new post office building in a style acceptable to the inhabitants, who require something more handsome, something more suitable to the other public buildings in the town. So I think it is desirable that a locality should have the power to carry out its wishes by offering the site, and thus enabling the Post Office to spend more on the building; there is no idea of using pressure of any kind.

(11.27.) MR. PICKERSGILL: The observations of the right hon. Gentleman are entitled to consideration no doubt; but they do not cover the whole case. The right hon. Gentleman has only dealt with the question of land, but in my opinion the grant of money is the more objectionable part of the proposal. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would be willing, between now and Report, to consider whether the part of the clause dealing with appropriations of money might be eliminated, and then I will raise no further objection.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): The clause seems to me to be a reasonable one. If the Local Authority is desirous of adding to the beauty of the town or conferring greater convenience on the inhabitants by the position of the post office, I see no reason to object to their carrying out the wishes of the ratepayers at the local expense. I shall support the clause.

MR. MORTON: I object to the clause altogether, because I think that the Post Office, with the revenue at its disposal, ought to be able to build the necessary buildings on the sites where they are required. I do not say that I object so much to the question of site; but the clause goes further and gives a Local Authority power of interposing and spending the local funds on a building of the size of which as required for post office purposes they will be unable to judge, or upon style and decoration the fad of a few councillors for the time being. There is no occasion for this at all. If the right hon. Gentleman will make the clause apply to only the site I should take no particular objection to it. Otherwise I shall have pleasure in voting against the section altogether.

*(11.31.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I am surprised at the distrust of Local Authorities which some of my hon. Friends have expressed. Surely the elected representatives of the ratepayers of large towns can be trusted without being checked and controlled at every turn by the House of Commons or some Department of the State. I cordially concur with this clause, and if the right hon. Gentleman will give a Return showing the enormous amount of money spent during the last 20 years on post offices it will be valuable information to hon. Members. The right hon. Member has proved his case to demonstration, and everyone who knows anything about this matter knows that it is desirable to have a clause of this kind in all large towns. When a new post office is required in an important street of a large town the Post Office Authorities say, "In justice to the taxpayers of other towns we can only put up a building of a certain character." The Municipality then may say, "We wish to have a handsome street, and in order that the post office may be a credit to it we are willing to contribute part of the cost of the difference between the two styles of buildings." Very often the Municipal Authorities may desire to have their post office in a situation which the Postmaster General will not feel justified in taking because of its expensiveness. Why, in such cases, should not the Municipality present the site? The Bill is only permissive, and not compulsory. If it were compulsory I should oppose it, but as it is I think it is perfectly harmless. There are many towns applying for new post offices, and if we can facilitate the erection of such post offices we shall be conferring a benefit upon the public.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 omitted.

Clause 11.

(11.35.) MR. PICKERSGILL: In line 35 I propose to leave out the word "annoy" in order to substitute the word "defraud." The effect of the clause would be to make much more stringent the Criminal Law with regard to post letters. It constitutes a new offence, and that new offence consists of two elements—an act and an intent. The act is opening a post letter which ought to have been delivered to some other person, or doing any act or thing whereby its due delivery is prevented, delayed, or impeded. The other element of the offence is the intent to injure or annoy the addressee. Now, I submit that to make a misdemeanour punishable with six months' imprisonment, the act of opening a post letter with intent to annoy another person, is making a great advance in our criminal legislation, and, I think, dealing with the matter with excessive stringency. I do not like this clause at all, but I am afraid there would be little chance of resisting it altogether, and I, therefore, propose to substitute the word "defraud" for "annoy." I think the Committee will see that the word "annoy" is a word of vague significance, whereas the word "defraud" is much more precise, and makes the offence a much more serious matter. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be willing to accept the Amendment.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

*(11.37.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General to leave this clause out altogether. To make any act or thing whereby the delivery of a post letter is delayed or impeded a misdemeanour punishable with six months' imprisonment would lead to extraordinary results; you might have a father who is aware that his daughter is receiving love letters, and wishes to prevent them reaching her, but if he delays or impedes them he will be liable to prosecution and imprisonment. There are some letters that ought to be delayed or impeded by a father—certain correspondence, for instance, intended for his son. Then, if a letter is delivered to the wrong house, and is opened in mistake, the person so opening it may be held guilty of a misdemeanour. At present this law is confined to servants of the Post Office. If the clause is allowed to stand I shall have a great many Amendments to move to it in Committee. I trust, however, the right hon. Gentleman will decide to abandon it altogether.

*(11.40.) MR. RAIKES: I think I should point out that it is already a misdemeanour to open or delay a letter if this is done by a servant of the Post Office. It is reasonable to suppose that to open a letter to injure or annoy the addressee may be an equally grave offence. The injury which may be done to a person by opening his letter is not always to be measured by the fact as to whether or not something has been stolen. I had an instance before me the other day in which a letter addressed to a Member of this House, who was addressing a meeting in another constituency, was delivered at the wrong club. It was opened by the porter, and then forwarded by that person to another Member of this House, who was engaged in litigation with the hon. Member to whom it was first addressed. It did not refer to politics, but to the litigation then proceeding between those two Members. The porter not only opened the letter, but forwarded it to the other party in the litigation, with the intention of injuring, or at least annoying. I need not say that the hon. Member to whom it was given at once handed it to the proper person. I maintain that what was done in that case ought to be punishable by law, and I believe that it would be a great advantage to the public if this clause formed part of the Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton will confer with me between now and the Report stage of the Bill, with the view of seeing whether any suggestions may be made towards amending it, I shall be happy to meet him; but I sincerely trust that the Committee will think proper to let the clause remain in the Bill. It seems to me that at present it is an absurd and anomalous thing that a person can be punished for stealing 6d. out of a letter, and that we cannot punish a person who may in another way do incalculable injury to the person to whom the letter is addressed. I am afraid that I cannot accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bethnal Green.

*(11.44.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I was speaking at Stoke-on-Trent some months ago, when a letter was sent to me giving particulars in regard to a libel suit coming on at the Cork Assizes between myself and one of the Members sitting below the Gangway on this side of the House. That letter, addressed to me by my solicitor, was deliberately opened by a clerk of the Gladstonian Liberal Association, who, instead of forwarding it to me, sent it to Mr. Harrington, who, if he had read the letter, would have come into possession of his opponent's case. Mr. Harrington, however, came to me and apologised for the mistake. An act like that of the club official, done deliberately, ought to be punishable.

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Another very common case that would lead to injustice under this clause is that of the delivery of letters at the wrong address. It occurs to me frequently. Letters are put into my letterbox, and I naturally open them without taking the trouble to read all the addresses. Sometimes there is one intended for somebody else in the same block of buildings, and under this Bill, if that person were litigious and took exception to my action, I might be subjected to very serious trouble in having to prove that I had not intended to annoy him. I think that unless this clause is amended it will lead to serious inconvenience.

*MR. RAIKES: I will agree to the withdrawal of the clause at this stage, reserving to myself the right to move a clause containing something to the same effect on Report.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 12.

(11.47.) MR. PICKERSGILL: I do not know how a clause of this kind ever got introduced into a Post Office Bill. Its object appears to be to alter the procedure in prosecutions for sale of adulterated food. The new section provides that it shall no longer be necessary to send samples of food intended to be analysed by registered letter. The precaution of registering a letter is a very wise one, not only in the interest of the accused person, but also in the interest of the prosecution, because it is obvious that if the defence can raise a plausible suggestion that the purchased article has been tampered with, the accused person would escape altogether. At all events, whatever argument might be advanced in favour of the Amendment of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act of 1875, I think such an Amendment is entirely out of place in a Bill of this kind. I cannot understand what has induced the Postmaster General to insert this clause, and I should be glad if he will explain his motives.

*MR. RAIKES: The advisers of the Post Office have been led to believe that there is some doubt whether any article sent under the Food and Drugs Act through the Post Office must be registered. It is intended to set at rest any controversy on the subject, and to make it clear that such an article need not be sent in a registered letter.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Do I understand that this is to be so when the article is forwarded as a condition precedent to a criminal prosecution?

*MR. RAIKES: That will be so.

MR. PICKERSGILL: This House in 1875 thought it advisable to secure that this precaution should be taken, and, therefore, I think it is rather too much for the Postmaster General in a Departmental Bill to propose what is in effect an alteration of the Criminal Law.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 113; Noes 48.—(Div. List, No. 330.)

(11.59.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether he will accept the clause suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Fuller) with reference to the rural authorities?

*MR. RAIKES: I think we can accept something in that direction if the hon. Gentleman will put it down on Report.

PENAL SERVITUDE BILL.—(No. 205.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill I do not propose to call your attention to many of the details, which are of a very intricate and technical character, and which are chiefly for Departmental convenience. I propose to ask your attention very shortly to two or three of the most important provisions in this Bill. The most important part of it is the first clause, which is virtually a proposal to reduce sentences of five years' penal servitude to three, going back to what it was in former days. Your Lordships will doubtless remember that about the time there was a great increase of crime, chiefly garotting, it was raised from three years to five. It is now proposed to go back to three. It is generally admitted, I think, that every year passed in prison is unfair to the prisoner, in so much that part of his sentence may be unnecessary where a smaller sentence would have sufficed. It is perhaps hard also upon those who have to sentence that prisoner to feel themselves obliged by law to inflict a more severe sentence when a more lenient one would answer the case. It is naturally also a great pecuniary loss, because it stands to reason that if a three years' sentence is sufficient, one of five years is a loss of money to the country. Take it in this way: say 300 prisoners have been sentenced to five years' penal servitude, and the same number in equal proportions to three and four years a piece; first of all the prison population would be reduced by 450 prisoners, and taking them at £25 a head, the saving would be at least £11,000 per annum. That is the most important part of the Bill. The date in Section 4 of the first clause is inserted with the object of not clashing with the Assizes. I must call your attention now to the second clause. The memorandum prefixed to the Bill is not correct as regards this second clause. That memorandum as it stands is in the form in which it was submitted to the other House, and this is the only clause that has been altered. With regard to Clause 8 great pressure has been used in certain quarters to adopt the system which is called anthropometric, and which is chiefly, I think, used by the French. It does not appear altogether clear that the new system has been approved of by our own Police Authorities or by our Prison Authorities; but it is proposed to try the system. It is really the measurement of those parts of the body which are not subject to change with years, particularly the length and breadth of the head, the length of the foot, the length of the forearm, and the length of the fingers. I think that is all I need call your Lordships' attention to in this matter. The Bill, as I have said before, is in the larger portion of it chiefly for Departmental convenience. I have alluded to the two most important points of it, and I ask your Lordships to give it a Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord de Ramsey.)

*LORD NORTON: It does not appear that there is going to be much debate upon this Bill, and I cannot conceive anybody opposing the greater part of it; but I hear there is to be a debate raised on going into Committee by some noble Lords who are unable to attend to-day. I only wish to say one word upon it. I took some part in the substitution of penal servitude for transportation when colonisation had rendered that old form of punishment rather a good speculation than a punishment at all. I have always thought, as I said at the time, that a great mistake was made in measuring the terms of penal servitude by the terms of the old punishment of transportation which had nothing in common with it, and the number of Acts which have been passed since based upon the Reports of a series of Royal Commissions upon the subject prove that that was a mistake. This Bill itself, as the noble Lord has said, is chiefly to remedy a defect in one of those Acts, namely, that of 1864, which was based upon the report of the Commission of the previous year 1863, and passed in a panic about the increase of a certain class of crime at the time, which it was thought better to meet by increasing the severity of the punishment of penal servitude, and the minimum term was then altered from three to five years, but the great mischief of that alteration was not in dealing with the length of the sentence, but the making a gap in the series of punishments. That was the main fault which this Bill is proposing to remedy. A hiatus was made in the gradation of punishment with the most seriously mischievous results. There was a great gap in our Criminal Code, between the highest sentence of imprisonment and the minimum sentence of transportation, which rendered it constantly necessary for Judges either to give a smaller sentence than they thought the case deserved, or as happened in many cases, a larger sentence. Every Judge has complained of that gap in our series of punishments as a very great mischief; and the only fault I would find with the Government in the matter, is that they have not introduced this Bill before, for I believe it has been drafted for several sessions—indeed, I know it has; and during that time we know that very considerable mischief has occurred from this gap in the series of secondary punishments. For myself, I believe that the gradation of terms of years would be much better left free, so that a Judge should be able to impose any number of years' imprisonment between a minimum and maximum, and that there should not be an interval fixed between one term and another. Considering the great variety of circumstances in which crime comes before the Judges, it is almost impossible for them to adapt a rigid scale of punishments to the offences. I believe, also, that I am quoting Sir C. Du Cane's opinion in saying that we should get rid of the phrase of penal servitude altogether, for penal servitude is nothing more than a long term of imprisonment with hard labour. There is really no difference except that there is a further stage of labour on public works, which is a necessary arrangement for prolongation of the sentence. But the distinction is bad, and the public do not understand the difference between a sentence of penal servitude and imprisonment, the two being, in fact, the same except as regards the length of the sentence. At all events, I think everybody will agree that the two should be assimilated in the period of separate confinement. In the case of penal servitude, nine months are separate confinement, and in the case of imprisonment two years. That is a difference which is without any reason, and anything which makes the law unintelligible renders the system of punishment not only faulty, but hardly justifiable. A punishment should be at least intelligible to the public and to the Judges who have to inflict the sentences. I will only say one word on the length of sentences, because this Bill does not deal with that subject, but is a measure simply dealing with the gradation of sentences. A long sentence of penal servitude is not more deterrent on account of great length, but is far less deterrent on that account, because everybody knows that these long sentences are always to a greater or less extent remitted. That gives an element of uncertainty to them, and if there is anything which weakens a punishment and renders it ineffective it is uncertainty. Then there is not only uncertainty in length of punishment, but it is so indefinite and indistinct that no one realises when a sentence of penal servitude is passed what it means; it is not realised either to the mind of the Judge himself, or by the convict upon whom the sentence is passed. Exemplarity becomes entirely lost. Keeping a man long detained in the artificial life of a prison by way of forming or reforming his character and fitting him for life in the world afterwards is simply a total delusion. I only want now to add one remark upon the last clauses in the Bill, which were referred to by the noble Lord. I think the provisions relating to the system of licenses and supervision by the police of discharged prisoners are a total mistake. The system has proved to be very useless, and this Bill proposes to strengthen and amend that system. What would be far more effectual for the purpose would be the more complete establishment, and inter-communication of Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies. That is the best way to deal with discharged prisoners; but the plan which we have lately adopted of discharging prisoners upon licence, and under the supervision of police, positively destroys the good effect of the punishment, and places the man in a position in which he can hardly succeed. Keeping up in a discharged prisoner's mind the connection with his past crime is in itself a fault, and making him report himself from time to time, and constantly to give notice of his whereabouts to the police, must have bad effect. Obtaining employment is the principal object we should have in dealing with discharged prisoners. The whole system of licensing and supervision by the police over prisoners on their discharge is calculated to stereotype a criminal class in this country. The last clause, on the subject of photography, was particularly alluded to by the noble Lord in moving the Second Reading. I think your Lordships should be furnished, in the first place, with some little information whether any good has ever been got out of that large and beautiful collection of portraits in Scotland Yard. There are upwards of 100,000 photographs of discharged prisoners. As if any clever prisoner need allow himself to be accurately photographed! Not only may these photographs be useless, but positively dangerous, for I remember a case where a man was hooted all the way from John-o'-Groat's house to London, because he happened to be like the photograph of a convict, and it was not until his arrival in London that the real man was found. This clause proposes to increase the number of photographs by adding to them those of unconvicted prisoners. The noble Lord has told us also that the prisoners are to be measured, their height, the length of their feet and arms, and other portions of the body. Is that because the photographing has been found to be useless? I do think it is high time some stop should be put to proceedings so utterly absurd as these. I know that the points I have last alluded to are points to be dealt with in Committee; a discussion will, I believe, be raised on the subject upon the Bill going into Committee, and I have great hope that this last clause will then receive very considerable amendment.

*LORD DE RAMSEY: I should like to say one word in reference to the last remark of the noble Lord. The object of introducing this anthropometric system is to endeavour to correct the system of photography where it has been found to fail. I cannot agree with the noble Lord's remark that the photographing of criminals is an absurdity. The Secretary of State, in the other House, in answer to a question relating to this matter said this—perhaps it will be better that I should read the question put to him first—

“Mr. Salt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any decision had been arrived at as to the use and advantage of the anthropometric system in this country?”

The answer is—

“Careful inquiry has been made into this subject, and reports have been obtained from the French Government showing the working of the system in France. I have consulted the prison and police authorities in this country, and they are of opinion that under the present system the proportion of prisoners who are not recognised is so small that the necessity for any change is not by any means established. The proportion is estimated at 2½ per cent.”

If there are only 2½ per cent. that are not recognised, I think the system of photographing prisoners cannot be said to have been found either a failure or an absurdity.

On Question agreed to.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

House adjourned during pleasure; and resumed by the Earl of MORLEY.

Lord Norton

PUBLIC HEALTH (LONDON) BILL. (No. 201.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount CROSS): My Lords, I have to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to the Public Health (London) Bill. It is a Consolidation Bill, and also an Amending Bill of the present law. Your Lordships will, I think, be of opinion it is high time that the various Acts were consolidated, because the law, so far as the public health of London is concerned, is contained in no less than 29 different Acts of Parliament, and there are very few people, except those whose duty absolutely it is to administer the law, who are really able easily to find out what the law is on the subject. I think your Lordships will also be of opinion that an Amending Bill is necessary. It so happens that in the provinces they have the advantage of the Public Health Act of 1875. That Act did not apply to London, and, up to the present moment, a very great number of useful provisions of the Act of 1875 are wanting in the protection of the public health in London. Therefore, I hope I have satisfied your Lordships that a Consolidation Bill is necessary, and also that an Amending Bill is necessary. When my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board introduced this measure to the other House of Parliament, he very wisely divided the Bill into two. The Amending Bill contained Amendments pure and simple, and the Consolidation Bill was for consolidation purposes pure and simple. But when the Bills went before the Standing Committee of the other House of Parliament they were then, according to the Instruction given them, consolidated, and that is the shape in which the Bill now appears before your Lordships' House. I trust your Lordships will not expect me at the present moment to go through all the details of this somewhat formidable measure; but I have given instructions that the Bill shall be printed in such a way that your Lordships will be able to see how much of the old law has been repealed, and by all the new matter being printed in italics your Lordships will be able to see at a glance what are the new and amending provisions which it is proposed to introduce into the present law. This Bill touches a great many points. There are Amendments as to the removal of nuisances, by which the law is very much strengthened; as to the offensive trades which are carried on in London; as to the Smoke Acts which are now made to extend all over London, instead of exempting part of London as they do at present; as to the workshops and bakehouses; as to the removal of all refuse—perhaps it may interest your Lordships to know that the House of Commons determined that the burden of keeping clear the footpaths before your houses is now shifted from the owner, they insisted upon putting that upon the Local Authorities, so that the removal of snow will no longer be an obligation upon the householder; as to unsound food; as to the water supply—so that we shall no longer allow occupied houses to be without an adequate supply of water, for the future that becomes an absolute public nuisance, so that persons may be brought before a Magistrate for it. Then, very good provisions are made with regard to infectious diseases, so as to ensure that persons suffering from infectious diseases shall not be able to spread those diseases from which they suffer to others; as to hospitals, in regard to which there is one rather important provision, namely, that there can be no recovery made by an hospital of the cost of the maintenance of persons in the hospital; as to the supply of mortuaries, and making bye-laws for specially dealing with places which are very much required in order to do away with that which is undoubtedly a disgrace to a great city like London, namely, the existence of underground rooms such as are to be found at the present moment, and which would not be tolerated in any other civilised country; as to Sanitary Inspectors—and in that direction large powers are given for the enforcement of the law. In this Bill, I am glad to say, it is proposed to do one thing which certainly did not exist before, namely, to make a Sanitary Authority themselves liable, if they commit a nuisance, to be brought before a Magistrate and punished, just like any individual person who commits a nuisance. It is all very well for a Sanitary Authority to act as it thinks right; but if the Sanitary Authority, in carrying out its methods, really itself becomes or creates a nuisance, it is quite proper that that Sanitary Authority should suffer accordingly. The details of this clause are no doubt very important, but they are certainly not such as to induce me to trouble your Lordships with any narrative or description of them on Second Reading. It may, no doubt, be said this is, after all, a very simple matter, that it is simply a Consolidation Bill with some Amendments, but I am bound to say that it is a measure which has taken a vast amount of trouble to draw, and I think it reflects the greatest credit on my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board and upon the staff of the office over which he presides. The clauses are simple. You may say the effect of each particular clause is not much; but I am quite certain, from the attention I have given to it, and from the attention I have paid generally to this subject of health in large towns, that if your Lordships pass this Bill as it is presented to you to-day, the effect of it will be great, and the health of this great Metropolis will, I am sure, be very much improved by its passing into the Statute Book. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Viscount Cross.)

*EARL FORTESCUE: As a sanitary reformer of now nearer 50 than 40 years' standing, I must congratulate Her Majesty's Government and this vast Metropolis upon this Bill, the Second Reading of which has been moved with his usual lucidity by the noble Viscount. It exceeds in its comprehensiveness and effectiveness anything I had ventured to hope for, and I speak not only as, during part of the year, a resident in London, but as having a particular interest in the sanitary concerns of the Metropolis: for not only had I the honour for some years of representing one of the very largest Metropolitan constituencies, but for years I was a member of, and acted upon successive Metropolitan Commissions of Sewers, and, latterly, by the kindness of my distinguished colleagues, comprising such men as Sir John Burgoyne,

Sir Henry de la Beche, Mr. Robert Stephenson, Mr. Rendel, and others, I had the honour of being Chairman of that body. Before I quit the main subject of the Bill I must bear my strong personal testimony to the immense service which will be rendered by the consolidation of the Public Health Law in London. I will not say that when I had the honour of acting on the Metropolitan Commission of Sewers there were as many as 29 sanitary Statutes dealing with the health of the Metropolis; but this I know, that the labours of the Commission and the labours of their officers were immensely augmented by the necessity of consulting such a multiplicity of Statutes so various, and some of them, as we occasionally found, somewhat conflicting with one another in some of their provisions—happily not many. It reminded me of the preface to the Prayer Book, which speaks of the book called the “Pye,” if I remember right, and of the much greater difficulty of ascertaining from it what ought to be read at Divine Service, than of reading what was ultimately ascertained to be the proper service of the day. But with regard to the detailed provisions of the Bill, I would only detain your Lordships for a moment with observations on two of them which seem to me to involve important principles. Last Thursday I presented to your Lordships a Petition emanating from a very useful and constantly increasing body—the Association of Sanitary Inspectors of Great Britain. In that they earnestly pray, I think most justly and reasonably, that the protection extended by this Bill to the Medical Officers of Health may be extended also to them in the discharge of their subordinate, indeed, but very important, and necessarily often, invidious public duties. The Sanitary Authorities under this Bill are, with one exception only, that of Woolwich, the different Vestries of the Metropolis. I have spoken of my experience on the Commission of Sewers. We there found that on such local administrative bodies it was the practice of owners of insanitary but highly-rented dwellings to get themselves, if possible, placed, and then, by their constant attendance and diligent attention—not wholly disinterested—to the business of the Board they frequently obtained a good deal of influence, and it was no light matter for any person employed under them to offend those influential persons who were interested in the maintenance of things as they were, instead of desiring to incur expenses in effecting improvements which were absolutely required for the health of their unhappy tenants, but involved a certain amount of expenditure. I venture to think that these Sanitary Inspectors to be appointed under this Consolidating and Amending Act ought, not only for their own advantage, but quite as much for the sake of the public interest, to be protected in the discharge of their duties. Their president who is a very eminent sanitary reformer, says—

“Their case is a hard one, for they who are the acting men and who have to carry out the orders which are so objectionable”— objectionable very often to the degraded tenants and occupiers, as well as to the owners of insanitary dwellings—

“They feel first and foremost the penalties of the dislike which they obtain for themselves by the fearless and zealous discharge of their duties.”

He goes on to say—

“They are the police of good health, and in doing their duty should fear no evil for good work faithfully executed.”

In Committee I shall venture to introduce words extending to them as I have said, for the public interest quite as much as for their own, the same protection which is wisely given to the Medical Officers of Health, and I may add that this protection is one which, under the original Poor Law of 1834, was extended for analogous reasons to relieving officers, and has been maintained with great advantage to the public ever since. The other point which I would mention is this; one of the clauses requires that “competent and properly qualified persons”—I think those are the words—shall be appointed to posts as Sanitary Inspectors, and I should venture to propose that they shall be compelled either to show that they have served, and satisfactorily served, for a certain time as Sanitary Inspectors in the Metropolis, or as Inspectors of Nuisances in the Metropolis, or in other large towns of above 20,000 inhabitants; or that they should produce certificates of being duly qualified. I do not propose that these should be exacted at once, but after an interval of two or three years, and that the certificates produced by them should be those given by the Sanitary Institute, which has been very efficiently carried on, as may be judged when I mention the names of Sir Douglas Galton and Professor Corfield as among the examiners on sanitary subjects, for some years. I may mention that already more than 70 Sanitary Inspectors hold those certificates and that more are constantly obtaining them in consequence partly of their own zeal, but partly owing to the requirements and encouragement of different Local Sanitary Authorities who, in various instances, have promised, and have given as much as 5s. a week additional salary to their Inspectors, on the production by them of the certificates which they have obtained at examination. Instead of the vague words, "competent and properly qualified," I would suggest a provision that they should obtain certificates either from the Sanitary Institute or from any other body selected ad hoc by the Local Government Board. I need not trouble your Lordships with any more words, but it is a great satisfaction to me to see, after a number of years, that the benefit of that consolidation of public health legislation which, thanks to my noble Friend Lord Norton—I think it was he who introduced the Bill in 1875—was extended then to the provinces, is now to be extended likewise with Amendments to this great Metropolis.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: My Lords, I beg to give notice that in Committee I propose to move an addition to Clause 16, giving certain powers to the London County Council with regard to securing the proper ventilation and free circulation of air in buildings.

*LORD BASING: I am very glad to find that the time has at last come when the Public Health Law as regards London, is to be subjected to a similar process of consolidation to that which was very successfully carried out for the rest of England in Parliament 15 years ago. At that time London was, in some respects, in advance of the rest of the country as regards powers for the removal of nuisances and other kindred powers for ensuring the public health, but after the passing of the Act to which I allude, London was manifestly behind hand in many important matters. I endeavoured two or three years later to get the House of Commons to agree to the consolidation of the Public Health Law in London, but the adverse influences were at that time too many for me, and the measure did not pass into law, although it contained little but provisions for consolidation and amendment. I am glad to find that matters have now improved, and that influences which were then adverse have become favourable to such a measure, which I am sure can be productive of nothing but good. In reference to the subject to which my noble Friend last alluded, I also have been impressed with the view that the time has now arrived when persons discharging the very responsible duties of Inspector of Nuisances and so forth, should be subjected to some examination which would certify to their competency for the work they have to discharge. I am very glad to hear that the same view prevails in the noble Lord's mind, and I hope we may have an opportunity when this Bill is in Committee of proposing some simple Amendment which will carry that proposal into effect, and attach it to the present consolidation of the law. I have given notice of my intention to propose such a clause, and I hope that I, or some other Peer, may be permitted to carry such an Amendment.

*VISCOUNT CROSS: My Lords, I desire to consult the convenience of the House as to when this Bill should go down to Committee. It would have to go through Standing Committee either on Tuesday or on Tuesday week. I do not know whether the noble Lords who have shadowed out Amendments would like best to introduce them in Standing Committee, because, of course, if not, and if the Amendments are to be touched in Committee of this House to any extent, I shall have to ask for a free night; but if they are to be moved in Standing Committee, I will put the Bill down pro forma for Monday, so that it might go before the Standing Committee on Tuesday next. If that is the wish of the House I will do it; if not I must take Tuesday week for the Standing Committee.

*EARL FORTESCUE: I should be inclined myself to think that the Standing Committee would deal more satisfactorily with detailed Amendments than could the Committee of the whole House.

I am not a member of the Standing Committee, but I would bring up my Amendments and have them printed. I should be quite satisfied with that.

LORD HERSCHELL: Of course, the noble Earl would be put on the Committee for this purpose.

*VISCOUNT CROSS: Then I will put the Bill down on Friday for the purpose of going before the Standing Committee on Tuesday next.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

MUNICIPAL REGISTRATION (DUBLIN AND BELFAST) BILL.—(No. 200.)

House in Committee (according to order): Bill reported without amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

House adjourned at twenty minutes past Six o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 7th July, 1891.

QUESTIONS.

DISTRESS IN MADRAS.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Government has been drawn to the distress among the Pariahs, or low-class agricultural population, of Chingleput; whether he can give any information regarding the amount of that distress, and whether their lamentable condition is chronic in its nature; whether any measures have been adopted by the Government of Madras to ameliorate their condition, in addition to what is being done to deal with the distress caused by the famine; whether the Government have appointed any Commission to inquire into the distress; and whether the low caste population can acquire waste land for cultivation, like the caste Mirasidars or leaseholders?

Br. Portocue

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): In reply to the first paragraph of the question of the hon. Member, I have to say that the present distress has attracted the attention of the Madras Government to the condition of the poorer classes in Chingleput. A careful statistical survey is being made of each district in Madras. The Chingleput district will be taken up soon, and inquiry will be made into the condition of all classes of the people. At the Inquiry of 1887-88—the results of which are given in the “Condition of the People” Return, presented in June, 1889—it was stated that Chingleput, owing to its infertile soil and to certain accidents of tenure, was among the most backward parts of the Madras Presidency. In reply to the second paragraph of the question, I may say that the Report on the Inquiry of 1887-88, referred to above, says—

“The mass of the (Chingleput) people, who are mostly agriculturists, live from hand to mouth, and in adverse seasons are seriously hampered. . . . The wages of an agricultural labourer's family are put at about 10 rupees a month all told. . . . The demand for all kinds of industrial labour other than weavers is increasing, while unskilled labour is, owing to the vicinity of Madras, everywhere better than it used to be.”

The answer to the third paragraph of the hon. Member's question is that no special measures for the general improvement of the Chingleput people have been undertaken, beyond the repair of tanks and channels for irrigation. Extensive measures have been taken, and are being carried out, for the relief of distress caused by the recent failure of rain. No Commission has been appointed to inquire into the distress. The answer to the last paragraph of the question is that there is no bar, either of law or of practice, to low caste people obtaining and cultivating available waste lands on the same terms as high caste people.

INDIA COUNCIL BILLS.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the India Council have sold bills on India to the extent of nearly £6,000,000 up to the end of June, namely, the first quarter of their financial year, whereas the proportionate amount of their year's drawing, estimated by them at £16,000,000, should have been only £4,000,000; and in view of the fact that the rate obtained has been on an average about 2 per cent. below that estimated in their Budget, that the price of silver during most of the time has been far above the parity of the Indian exchange realised for these bills, and that the present rate of exchange is about 5 per cent. above the rates accepted by the Council for a large portion of their drafts on India during the last three months, whether he can give any reason for selling at such low rates half as much again than the amount required in the past quarter?

*SIR J. GORST: The answer to the first question of the hon. Member is in the affirmative. £5,976,112 were sold in the first quarter of the financial year. In reply to the second paragraph of the question, I have to say that owing to the requirements of Indian trade it is necessary to sell much the larger proportion of the bills in the first and the last quarters of the financial year. Within the last few weeks the amount offered for public tender has been reduced from 45 to 30 lakhs a week.

ROBBERY OF JEWELS AT HYDERABAD.

MR. MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether certain natives from Hyderabad, in the Deccan, have lately been arrested in Bombay and brought before the Chief Magistrate on a charge of being concerned in a great robbery of jewels at Hyderabad in the year 1884; whether the British Resident at Hyderabad has applied to the Bombay High Court to have the case transferred for settlement to Hyderabad, where the owners of the jewels have been trying in vain for several years to obtain justice; and whether it is within the province of the British Resident at a Native Court to interfere in such a matter?

SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State has no information upon this subject. The question will be transmitted to the Government of India in the ordinary course.

THE LOSS OF THE FREDA.

SIR E. GREY (Northumberland, Berwick): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Receiver for Wrecks refused to allow the purchaser of the brig Freda, wrecked near Craster, in Northumberland, in April, to touch the vessel till the captain's deposition fee had been paid; and whether it is the usual practice for such fee to be paid by the vendor and not the purchaser of a wreck; if so, whether it would have been contrary to his general rule for the Receiver for Wrecks to have allowed the purchaser of the Freda to dispose even of a part of the vessel?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Freda broke up and sank in deep water. Some property, including anchors and chains, came into the Receiver's hands, and this property was sold by the owner, subject to all charges against it, and the Receiver refused to deliver it to the purchaser till these charges, which included a deposition fee, were settled. This is the usual practice of the Receivers, whether the wreck has been sold by the original owner or not, and is necessary, because the legal remedy is against the property only, but it is the practice to detain only sufficient property to reasonably cover the claims, and that practice was adhered to in this instance.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH CHINA.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there has been any and, if so, what change in our commercial relations with China, consequent upon the expiration in April last of the term of ten years specified in the Commercial Treaty with that country?

THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): No notice has been given on either side for the revision of the existing Commercial Treaty between this country and China, and it will therefore remain in force as it stands for another period of ten years from the 24th of April last.

MARRIAGES IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

MR. WOODALL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any decision has been arrived at in regard to the issuing of Orders in Council determining the conditions under which, and the mode in which, marriages are solemnized in accordance with the Law of a foreign country may be registered by British Consuls; and in the event of any amendment of the Act of 1890 being necessary, when is it proposed that a Bill for that purpose will be introduced?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am afraid that I cannot answer this question to-day. Perhaps the hon. Member will be good enough to put it off until Thursday.

MARRIAGE OF BRITISH SUBJECTS IN THE GERMAN EMPIRE.

MR. WOODALL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any, and if so what, difficulties exist under the lex loci of the German Empire, which prevent the marriage of British subjects under the provisions of "The Marriage Act, 1890?"

SIR J. FERGUSSON: On the 22nd February, 1890, Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin was officially informed that it was not permissible, in accordance with legal regulations, for a British Consul to perform a marriage within the limits of the German Empire; and that these regulations could not be altered.

DEEDS OF APPRENTICESHIP.

MR. MONTAGU: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the amount of Revenue during the past financial year derived from Stamps on Deeds of Apprenticeship?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The amount of Revenue derived from Stamps on Deeds of Apprenticeship cannot be ascertained, since there is not a special stamp appropriated to such instruments. The amount is included in the yield of "General Deed Duty."

SPICER'S CHARITY AT COLLUMPTON.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther), as representing the Charity Commissioners, whether he is aware that 48 acres of land, called Spicer's Charity, situate at Collumpton, Devon, the annual income of which is devoted to apprenticing poor boys, have been let on lease without having been previously offered to the public or to the labourers of the district, under "The Allotments Extension Act, 1882"; that the lease was granted at a rental reduced from £80 to 70, to the diminution of the usefulness of the Charity, and in spite of the protests of the senior Trustee; and whether such lease can be cancelled, and the land offered to labourers and cottagers, under "The Allotments Extension Act, 1882"?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The land referred to in the hon. Member's question was let in 1874 for a term of 14 years at a rent of £80. It was re-let to the same tenant in 1888 at a rent of £70, the Trustees considering the reduction to be reasonable in view of the general agricultural depression. The Commissioners have received no protest from the senior Trustee on the subject of the new lease. The land not being subject to the provisions of the Allotments Extension Act, 1882, it was not incumbent on the Trustees to take proceedings for letting it to labourers in allotments; and the Commissioners are not aware of the existence of any power to disturb the present tenancy.

DEATH OF MR. COLLINS, COASTGUARD OFFICER.

SIR E. GREY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether an inquiry has been made into the circumstances attending the death of Mr. Collins, late Coastguard officer at Newton by the Sea, Northumberland, in March; whether the medical evidence is to the effect that Mr. Collins's death was caused by exposure while discharging his duty in the months of November and March; and what relief in the form of a pension, or otherwise, can be given to his widow?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The Admiralty have satisfied themselves that the death of the late Mr. Collins was caused by extraordinary exposure while on duty. His widow has accordingly been awarded a special pension of £30 a year for life.

SOLDIERS IN UNIFORM.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has seen the statement in the Army and Navy Gazette, of 27th June, that

"A clergyman lately visited Shorncliffe to see a young gentleman of his acquaintance who had enlisted in the hope of obtaining a commission. He walked with his young friend to Folkestone, and presenting himself at the entrance of an hotel, ordered luncheon for two. He was refused admission to the coffee room on the plea that his young friend was a soldier in uniform ;"

and, if so, whether he proposes to take any steps in the matter?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I can assure my noble Friend that I fully sympathise in the indignation he feels that any slight should be put upon any man on account of wearing Her Majesty's uniform ; but hotels are subject to the general law of the land, and I have no power to interfere in their management.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: Is it not within the power of the right hon. Gentleman to bring the matter before the Bench at the annual renewal of licences?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I will consider that question.

GUNS FOR THE DEFENCE OF TABLE BAY.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has observed a letter published in the Daily Graphic of 6th July, and purporting to be written by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), in which it is stated that a number of seven ton muzzle loading guns, which have been discarded by the Navy, and are deemed obsolete by expert artilleryists, have at a great expense been sent out and mounted for the defence of Table Bay and Simon's Bay, and that, although the garrison of Cape Town only amounts to 1,300 men, a staff equal to the requirements of 20,000 is maintained ; and whether these statements are correct ; and, if so, whether he can give any explanation of this apparent waste of Public Funds by the War Office?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Neither of these statements is correct. The muzzle-loading guns in question were sent out in 1877-78, being the only guns then available. They were not obsolete, and even now they form a good auxiliary armament in addition to the heavy breech-loading guns. Looking to our vast responsibilities in South Africa, the staff maintained at the Cape is certainly not in excess of our requirements.

THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the understanding that has been arrived at in respect to the status quo in the Mediterranean, between this country and Italy, has been communicated to France and the other Great Powers having possessions on the Mediterranean ; and whether Italy has been made aware that an understanding which has been come to between Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and a Foreign Government, which is not communicated to Parliament, is only binding, so far as this country is concerned, on the Minister who comes to that understanding?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: In answer to the first question of the hon. Member, I have to say that communications have from time to time passed between Her Majesty's Government and the French Government with respect to questions affecting the status quo in the Mediterranean, but they are not suitable for public discussion. As to the second question, I have no doubt that the Italian Government are well acquainted with the Constitution of this country, but we have had no occasion to express any opinion to them on the point raised by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then am I to understand that the French Government are in possession of the understanding which the right hon. Gentleman says has been arrived at between this country and Italy as to the status quo in the Mediterranean?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Member must not understand any more than I have said.

MURDER OF A BRITISH SUBJECT IN MACEDONIA.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has seen the following statement from the Pharos of Macedonia, with regard to the murder of a British subject in Macedonia:—

“The body of Mr. Basil Capreel, a naturalised British subject, was found beside the railway line between Salonica and Bodina on 19th June. The body was horribly mangled by rifle shots and sword cuts. No reason can be assigned for this crime, nor has any clue as yet been discovered to the perpetrators of the murder, although some carriers from Bodina have been arrested on suspicion. The deceased had left Salonica on the 16th for Bodina, where he was engaged in business, and nothing was heard of him until the following Friday, when his dead body was found. As the deceased was a naturalised British subject, the interpreter at the English Consulate at Salonica has examined the body and taken notes of the state in which it was found;”

and whether he will inform the House what steps have been taken by the Consul of Salonica or otherwise to discover and punish the murderer?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Certain arrests have been made of persons suspected in connection with this case, and Her Majesty's Acting Consul General is watching it.

EVENING SCHOOLS IN WALES.

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the almost universal insistence by Her Majesty's Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors in Wales of the need of evening schools and of the peculiar facilities afforded by many Welsh districts for the formation of evening classes for instruction in agricultural chemistry, geology, navigation, and similar subjects; whether the establishment of advanced elementary schools in Cardiff, Swansea, Ystrad, Gelligaer, Merthyr, and Festiniog has been attended by marked benefit to the elementary schools of the districts where they are situated; and whether, in view of the fact that the Elementary Education Bill will confer upon School Boards and school managers in Wales and Monmouth a sum of £20,000 in excess of the present income from fees, he will appoint a Departmental Committee, similar to the Committee on Welsh Intermediate and Higher Education of 1881, to inquire and report whether and how far a portion of this sum may be utilised for the establishment of evening schools, of advanced elementary schools in industrial towns, and for the appointment of organising and peripatetic teachers of class and specific subjects more especially in the rural districts?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I have no doubt that there is scope for the development of evening schools in Wales, but it is, I believe, a question whether the place of the advanced elementary schools would not be better filled by schools of a secondary type established under the Intermediate Education Act. There is obviously nothing to prevent School Boards in any town or district, where the payments under the Education Bill are in excess of the present income from fees, from establishing evening schools, or devoting the surplus to higher elementary education; and I do not anticipate that the managers of voluntary schools will disregard their responsibilities in this connection. But I am not able to adopt any plan for treating the sum in question as a whole to be disposed of under the direction of some Central Authority.

THE WIMBLEDON REVIEW.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the order for the early entrainment of the Volunteers on Saturday is caused by the railway authorities declining to carry them at a later hour at low fares; whether the Government would obviate the difficulty by increasing the grant for transport; and whether they would give a camp allowance for food and incidentals?

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that, in addition to those required for the Review at Wimbledon, other special train services will be required upon the Waterloo line on Saturday next; whether all Metropolitan regiments, without regard to the position of their headquarters, even if they are nearer to Wimbledon than to Waterloo, will be required to proceed via the Waterloo line, or what exceptions will be made; and whether permission will be given to regiments which have secured steamers, to go by river to Putney Bridge, and march thence to Wimbledon?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: In response to the inquiries made by the Military Authorities, the number of Volunteers applying to attend the Review was so large that special arrangements for their transport was absolutely necessary. Owing to the heavy demands made upon the railways in consequence of Sandown Races, a large meeting at Ascot, and Kingston Regatta, the company positively declined to carry Volunteers late in the day, and the last train carrying Volunteers must start at 1.25. It must also be obvious that to work the lines up to the last minute with troop trains would make it very difficult for the public to go to the Review at all. No question of fares has been raised. Where any corps has made a suggestion to be allowed to adopt a different route from that assigned to them, and it has been found practicable, they have been allowed to proceed independently. Among these are the Queen's Westminsters, the Civil Service, the South Middlesex, and the 1st Middlesex Engineers, and some of the earlier trains may therefore become unnecessary. Besides the allowance for transport, I authorised last week an allowance of 1s. a head for food and incidentals.

ACCIDENT ON H.M.S. CORDELIA.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can give the House any information regarding a telegram received from Sydney yesterday, stating that, on Her Majesty's cruiser Cordelia, while firing practice was being performed by the crew on the 29th June, "a 6-inch breechloading gun burst on the seventh round, killing six men and injuring 12 others;" if correct, can he state the cause of the explosion?

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg also to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can give the House any information, beyond what has appeared in the papers, respecting the lamentable accident on board H.M.S. Cordelia, due to the bursting of a 6-inch gun, on the Australian Station; whether the gun in question was of similar manufacture to the gun which burst in H.M.S. Collingwood in 1886; how many 6-inch guns of H.M.S. Cordelia's pattern still exist in the Navy; whether the manufacture of guns of wrought iron with steel tubes has since been discontinued in favour of steel only; and whether a similar gun to the one which burst may be forthwith tested to bursting point, in order to give confidence in the remaining guns of that pattern, if it be still approved?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I sent the only telegram we received last night concerning the sad accident on board the Cordelia to the public Press. It confirmed generally Reuter's telegram, and gave the names of those killed and wounded. A further telegram has been received, which runs as follows:—

"With reference to your telegram. Exercising June 29. Quarterly target practice. Gun had fired six rounds. Then loaded with full charge, 34lb., common shell, 7½lb. burster. Five minutes later, on seventh round being fired, gun burst explosively. Admiral, Sydney."

The gun was not of the same design as that which burst on board the Collingwood, and the accident was of a different character. This gun was one of the earliest design of 6in. breech-loading guns, and the later marks are an improvement upon it, and they fire much heavier charges—48lb. as against 34lb. There are 87 guns afloat of this pattern (total number 130), but the manufacture has been discontinued for some time past. I am doubtful whether such an experiment as my hon. Friend suggests would be advantageous, or give us any data as to the cause of the present accident, but if it should it shall certainly be ordered. These guns, I may add, have been in use for some years, and no want of confidence has been expressed in them. When particulars of the accident have been received the matter will be referred to the Ordnance Committee for a full Report. In the meantime, an exhaustive inquiry will be ordered at Sydney. I may further add that this lamentable accident is the more to be regretted as it is the only occasion on which loss of life has occurred on board any of Her Majesty's ships from an accident with a breech-loading gun caused by a defect in the gun itself.

BRIDGES ON THE BRIGHTON RAILWAY.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the advice given by Sir John Fowler, that some 20 bridges on the Brighton Railway should be reconstructed during the next 12 months, and about 60 others should be reconstructed when the former 20 are completed, and, in view of the fact stated by him, that—he will take steps to secure that the bridges of the railways within his jurisdiction shall be adapted to the heavier engines, higher speeds, and other new conditions named by Sir John Fowler?

“The advice given in this Report is based upon considerations affecting the vast majority of railways in the Kingdom, and that the result of the investigation does not indicate any unusual weakness in the Brighton bridges, which are neither better nor worse in that respect than those on similar lines of railway at home and abroad ;”

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: My hon. Friend is mistaken in supposing that the railways of the United Kingdom are within the jurisdiction of the Board of Trade, if by that term he means that the Board have any power to require that their bridges shall be reconstructed. I propose, however, to address a Circular to the Railway Companies on this subject, and, when issued, a copy will be laid on the Table of the House.

FREE SCHOOL PLACES.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education what will be the procedure of the Education Department with regard to the supply of free school places where a proved deficiency of such places exists in districts where there is already a School Board and where there is no School Board respectively; what is the interpretation by the Department of the provision of the Act of 1870 for supplying a deficiency of public school accommodation; and where, and under what circumstances, will it be possible to provide the deficiency of free school places by voluntary schools?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: Section 3 (3) of the Elementary Education Bill places no difficulty whatever in the way of the provision of free school places by the managers of voluntary schools, but where a deficiency of such places was proved to exist in a School Board district the Department would no doubt address itself in the last resort to the School Board; but my hon. Friend will see that it would only be necessary to do this if the managers of voluntary schools had declined to free their schools to the extent of the deficiency. In districts where there are no School Boards the effect of Section 9 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, will be to give voluntary managers ample opportunity to supply any deficiency which upon inquiry is shown to exist.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is now able to inform the House what is the estimated additional cost to the Revenue that is likely to result from the operation of Sub-section 3, of Clause 1, of the Elementary Education Bill?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: An excess of fee grant over the present rate of school fees charged in any school can only cause an increase, in the annual grant, when such annual grant exceeds the limit of 17s. 6d. per child, and the income of the school has hitherto been less than that sum, or less than the grant earned. In such a case the excess of the fee grant might bring the income of the school to more than 17s. 6d. per child, and the managers would receive an increased grant. But the amount of the increased grant could not exceed the difference between 17s. 6d. per child and the grant earned. We cannot, therefore, assume that an increase in the income of a school caused by the fee grant will in many instances increase the annual grant; and it is not therefore considered necessary to estimate for any additional expenditure under this head.

PROVINCIAL POSTMEN.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has now received a reply from the Treasury, and is able to comply with the wishes and claims of the provincial postmen as to the revision of their pay and satisfaction of other grievances specified by them in various Memorials of long date?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I have not yet received a final reply upon the subject to which the hon. Member refers, but I now expect one in the course of a few days.

THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

ADMIRAL FIELD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state the number of men of the Royal Naval Reserve of the first and second classes who have volunteered for service in Her Majesty's ships during the coming Naval Manœuvres; how many are proposed to be embarked; and whether such service afloat will be allowed to count in lieu of the 28 days' drill required annually, or a portion thereof?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The experiment of calling for volunteers from men of the Royal Naval Reserve for temporary service on board Her Majesty's ships has recently been tried with very satisfactory results. It was proposed to allow a limited number, 300, of the first and second classes of the Reserve to embark in certain ships during the Naval Manœuvres. This was made known on July 2, and by the morning of the 6th 305 men, of whom 195 were second class, had volunteered for such service. Entries were then stopped, but before this order was generally known 342 men had actually joined Her Majesty's ships, and it is estimated that 100 more are on their way to join. This temporary service afloat will count in lieu of the 28 days' drill annually required if the men desire it.

CAMP FOR RIFLE PRACTICE IN IRELAND.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a camp for rifle practice is about to be established at Baldoyle, County of Dublin; and whether he is aware that the project of establishing a camp for that purpose in the place mentioned is viewed with the strongest disfavour by every class of persons in the district, and especially by the fishermen; and, if so, whether he will reconsider any decision that may have been arrived at in favour of the Baldoyle site for the suggested camp?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There is considerable difficulty in procuring suitable rifle ranges in the neighbourhood of Dublin. Baldoyle is one of those under consideration, but no decision has yet been arrived at.

CONSULAR CONVENTION WITH FRANCE.

ADMIRAL FIELD: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the Consul General of Havre's Report, No. 839, page 24, referring to Mr. Consul Percy's remarks on the death from accident of the steward of the steamer Zaimis, when at Rouen, and whilst on duty, in which he points out the disadvantages under which certain British subjects are placed, due to a failing in our international arrangements and to the absence of a Consular Convention, whereby the widow and six children were debarred from seeking compensation by means of an application for "assistance judiciaire," and these unfortunate people not being able to defray the expense of a law suit the matter had to be dropped; and whether steps will be taken to remedy this state of things as recommended by the said Consul?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The meaning of the Consul in the passage referred to is not very clear, and he will be asked for an explanation. If the difficulty described was really owing to our having no Consular Convention, it is a matter for regret; but for many years the question has been found impossible of solution, though it has been frequently discussed.

THE REFORMATORY OFFICE.

ADMIRAL FIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the Second Report, of 6th May, 1891, by the Committee on Public Accounts, and the evidence on page 12 of Mr. Rogers, Assistant Inspector of Reformatories and Industrial Schools, wherein he states—

"I may mention that the staff is limited, and we have pretty well enough to do to get through our work in the way of inspection at present," and to Mr. Mills' answer that certain inaccuracies were to some extent "Attributable to the fact that the staff of the Reformatory Office is not sufficiently strong to cope with the additional work caused by the increase in the numbers both of schools and of inmates;"

and whether he will arrange for the inspection of reformatory and industrial school ships by competent seamen Inspectors, instead of as at present by a military officer?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallamshire): Yes, Sir; the Secretary of State is aware of the evidence referred to. The inquiry alluded to on page 18 of the evidence is now completed, and the Report has reached the Secretary of State's hands. He is now considering the questions therein raised of improving generally the office arrangements and the system of inspection. He will at the same time consider whether it will be possible to give effect to the views which have been repeatedly urged by my hon. and gallant Friend with regard to the desirability of employing naval officers to inspect the school ships.

DETENTION OF AN ENGLISH GIRL BY KURDS.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will explain what is the nature of the difficulty interposed by Turkey in regard to the rescue of Kate Greenfield by Persian forces; whether the British Ambassador in Constantinople has fully represented to the Porte the strong feeling of the British people as to this alleged outrage on an English girl; and whether both Powers concerned have been, or will be, informed that Great Britain cannot view with indifference the forcible capture and illegal imprisonment of any British subject?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The girl is detained by Kurds in the Turkish Consulate at Sonjbonlak, from which the Turkish Consul has fled, and the Porte has up to the present refused its assent to the employment of force within the Consulate by Persian Authorities. Her Majesty's Embassy at Constantinople was directed on the 28th ultimo to urge the Porte very earnestly to give their consent, and on the 2nd instant Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires was instructed to address a strong remonstrance to the Porte against its action, which imperils the life of British subject, and to urge the withdrawal of opposition to the steps the Persian Government desire to take for the liberation of the girl. To the Shah it has been represented by

Admiral Field

Her Majesty's Government that it is essential that measures should be taken to remove the girl from the hands of the Kurds and to punish them for the outrage, and to question the girl in the presence of impartial persons, both Christians and Mussulmans, and to dispose of her according to her real wishes.

NORTH SEA LIQUOR TRAFFIC CONVENTION.

SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to a statement that has appeared in the French papers to the effect that the French Government have declined to ratify the North Sea Liquor Traffic Convention, signed at the Hague in 1887 by representatives of the Governments of France, Great Britain, Belgium, Netherlands, Denmark, and Germany; and whether Her Majesty's Government can take any steps to prevent the failure of this most important and beneficial Agreement?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: All we know is that the Foreign Minister of France stated incidentally, in the course of a Debate in the Chamber of Deputies on the 25th June, that he did not propose to submit that Convention for ratification. Her Majesty's Government will gladly do anything in their power to obviate the failure which might ensue, but I am not at present in a position to make any statement in regard to this.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): What is the present position of the question, and what is the attitude of the European Powers in regard to it?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Ratifications have not yet been exchanged, and the intentions expressed by the French Minister, of course, necessitate a reconsideration of their position by the other Powers engaged. I do not think that the resources of diplomacy are yet exhausted, but I could not now make any precise statement as to the way in which the matter stands.

MR. BRYCE: Will Her Majesty's Government communicate with the French Government on the matter?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I would rather be excused from stating what course Her Majesty's Government will take, or are taking. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall leave no stone unturned to prevent the failure of the Convention.

WELSH COUNTY COUNCILS.

MR. T. ELLIS: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state by what powers in the Local Government Act, or otherwise, the Welsh County Councils can contribute towards the cost of inquiries, in conjunction with the Charity Commissioners, into the parochial charities within their respective counties?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Local Government Act does not confer any direct powers on the County Councils of Wales to undertake inquiries with regard to charities. It is probable, however, that under the Welsh Intermediate Education Act, 1889, powers might be found vested in the Joint Education Committees which by friendly understanding might be utilised for the purpose indicated in the hon. Member's question.

POWERS OF COURTS OF QUARTER SESSIONS.

MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I beg to postpone until Thursday my question to the Attorney General whether, under Section 9, Subsection 3, of the Local Government Act of 1888, a Court of Quarter Sessions has power, as such, to give orders to the Chief Constable of a county on general matters relating to the preservation of the peace within the county, or to require a Report from him; or whether the reservation made by such subsection merely preserves to the local Justices their previous powers to give such orders as to the preservation of the peace in their respective districts?

THE SCOTCH EDUCATION CODE.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollax): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, looking to the advanced period of the year covered by the Education Code, 1891, and to the fact of the financial arrangements of School Boards in Scotland for the current year having been all fixed upon the basis of the Code as originally issued, the Government will withdraw the amendment of the Code presently lying upon the

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Table of the House, and will leave the whole subject open and to be dealt with in the Scotch Code for 1892?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Minute of June 11 was laid upon the Table to meet a difficulty to which the attention of the Department had been very strongly drawn. It has now been fully before the School Authorities, and has been accepted by them, with scarcely any difference of opinion, as a satisfactory solution of the question, and any financial difficulty will be largely, if not entirely, met by the probable increase of the Capitation Grant already announced. It has been represented to the Government most urgently within the last few days that any change would be productive of serious inconvenience, and in these circumstances we propose to adhere to that Minute, and to allow full time to test its operation by experience before proposing any alteration.

MR. CALDWELL: I beg to give notice that I will move an Amendment to the Code.

THE ROLLS SERIES.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can inform the House upon what principle the publication of the Rolls Series is conducted, and to what class of documents it is confined; whether he is aware that there are no funds at present available for the undertaking of any new works under the direction of the Master of the Rolls; whether he can state for what period of time the Master of the Rolls has been without funds to carry on the publication of historical documents; and whether it is the intention of the Government to propose a Vote to be placed at the disposal of the Master of the Rolls for this purpose?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer the question. The principle upon which the Rolls Series is conducted is stated in a printed memorandum which is prefixed to every volume. It is confined to documents illustrating the history of this country previously to the reign of Henry VIII. There are no funds at present available for the undertaking of any new works for this series. The Master of the Rolls is not, and has never been, without funds to carry on the publication of historical documents, a large number of works undertaken at various times being either in the press or in course of preparation. The Government has, consequently, no intention of proposing any Vote other than that put down in the Civil Service Estimates.

MR. LABOUCHERE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if the last volume, relating to the reign of Henry VIII., is out of print, as I find that it is troublesome to get a copy?

MR. JACKSON: I will make inquiry.

Subsequently,

MR. SUMMERS: Will the First Lord of the Treasury communicate with the Master of the Rolls on the subject?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I would rather leave the matter in the hands of the Secretary to the Treasury, but he thinks the Master of the Rolls is fully informed.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

MR. ELLIOTT LEES (Oldham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government will recommend the Trustees of the National Gallery to arrange for the interchange by Provincial Art Galleries of the collections lent to them by the National Gallery under the National Gallery Loan Act, in order that, without removing any of the pictures now in Trafalgar Square, an opportunity may be given to the provincial public of seeing a greater number of the pictures belonging to the nation?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The notice given by my hon. Friend has been too short to enable me to consult the Trustees of the National Gallery; but I have ascertained generally that there would be objections to the proposal on account of the extra risk incurred through moving the pictures about the country, and also on the score of expense, as the National Gallery has no funds at its disposal from which the carriage, packing, and insurance of the pictures could be paid.

In reply to a further question by Mr. ELLIOTT LEES,

*MR. W. H. SMITH said: I am afraid we could hardly interfere with the complete discretion of the Trustees, who are solely responsible for the custody of the pictures.
Mr. Jackson

MR. WOODALL: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire what is the amount of injury done to pictures by their circulation to provincial museums? I believe it will be found that the injury is extremely small.

*MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): If the provincial museums undertake the expense of removal, packing, insurance, and other work, will the objections of the Trustees be overcome?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will undertake to communicate with the Trustees on that point. They are independent of the Government, and we have no power to control them.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill, with Amendments.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

(No. 401.)

CONSIDERATION.

As amended, considered.

*(3.50.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): In moving the new clause which stands in my name, I am carrying out a promise which was made when the Bill was in Committee. We have followed the lines of the proposals of the right hon. Member for the Brightside Division (Mr. Mundella). We propose to deal with the question of schools where the average sum received from fees and for books and other articles necessary to school life is less than the 10s. grant.

New Clause—

(Where average rate charged was not in excess of ten shillings no charge shall be made to parent)

"In any school receiving the fee grant, where the average rate charged and received in respect of fees and books, and for other purposes, during the school year ended last, before the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, was not in excess of ten shillings a year, for each child, of the number of children in average attendance at the school, no charge shall be made to parent in respect of any scholar,"—(Sir William Hart Dyke,)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Question proposed, "That the Clause be read the second time."

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The right hon. Member for the Brightside Division is not present; but I presume that he would be prepared to accept this clause in substitution for his own. I do not, however, think the clause goes quite as far as was intended by the Committee when the question was discussed. It only affects schools that will be free schools. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will go a step further, and apply the system to other schools. What we want to lay down is that not only the fee in excess of the 10s. shall be charged, but that the managers shall be enabled to exceed that average for books, &c. Under the Bill as it stands the manager will not be able to charge a fee in addition for books after deducting the 10s. I would ask the Vice President if he does not intend to supplement this clause by a further Amendment to carry out the intention of the House?

*(3.54.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I would suggest to add at the end of the clause, after the word "scholar," the words "over three and under fifteen years of age," in order to bring the clause in conformity with the rest of the Bill.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I would suggest that words should be introduced to the effect that books and other appliances shall be provided free, and as a first charge on any surplus which exists from the substitution of the 10s. fee grant over the school pence.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Code which has been in force since 1870 lays it down that the managers are to be held responsible by the Department for the conduct of their schools, for their maintenance and efficiency, and for the providing of all needful furniture, books, and apparatus.

*MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): Do "books" mean scholars' books?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly; it is "books and appliances," which, of course, includes school books.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in line 6, after the word "charge," to insert the words "by this Act provided."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(4.0.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I think it would be better to leave the matter as it is, because under the Bill any parent can claim free places, and under the Code managers are bound to provide school books where the parents do not provide them. If the parents provide the books, their doing so will be regarded in the light of a subscription. The question is a very difficult one to deal with.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I think it is not necessary to amend the clause in the way suggested, but we had better get on to the other and more important parts of the Bill.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I do not think the Amendment would do any harm.

Amendment negatived.

Clause added.

(4.5.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) moved to insert the following new Clause after Clause 2:—

“In any school receiving the fee grant a certificated teacher shall have a right of appeal to the Education Department against dismissal by the managers of the school, and no such teacher shall be dismissed contrary to the decision of the Department on such appeal.”

The hon. Member, who had another new clause on the Paper, providing that no teacher should be required, as a condition of holding his appointment, to undertake or abstain from any duties out of the ordinary school hours, said: The two clauses are so intimately connected with each other that I will at once speak to both. As the Bill now stands, the State, in making this enormous grant to the elementary schools, has absolutely reserved nothing for itself. As yet there is no quid pro quo. The right hon. Member for Wolverhampton did attempt to get some consideration for the grant in the Instruction which he moved some days ago, but he was not successful. The strong and formidable objection which was taken against that Instruction, namely, that there is no logical connection between what was demanded and the Imperial grant which this Bill makes, cannot, however, be applied to the present proposals. I demand, as a consideration for the increased grant, increased public control, and I propose to place that control in the quarter from which the Imperial grant comes. I have no great admiration for the Education Department or its methods or results; but the State has no other organ, and until some other is arrived at we shall be obliged to look to the Education Department. I propose to introduce the machinery of the Education Department; and some words would have to be introduced into the clause giving the Department the power of making rules to carry it out. Another set of objections which have been urged against Amendments to the Bill on this side of the House cannot be brought against these new clauses. They in no way involve the religious question, but equally affect the Board schools and the voluntary schools, and, therefore, I claim from hon. Members opposite fair and impartial consideration for my proposals. The object of the clauses is to protect the elementary teachers of England, in the first place, from capricious dismissal by school managers, and, in the second place, from the degrading conditions as to extraneous service which are now imposed upon them. This, indeed, may be said to be the programme of the National Union of Elementary Teachers, an organisation which numbers more than 50,000 teachers, and represents the vast body of teachers governed by the Education Department. It is not difficult to show that the elementary teachers of the country have a grievance which loudly calls for remedy, and I propose that they shall have a right of appeal to the Education Department against capricious dismissal by the managers. The Secretary for War denied a few days since that elementary teachers in the rural districts are subjected to persecution; but it can be shown, if they do not suffer persecution, that they have to bear considerable injustice from the managers of the schools. In a paper read two years ago at a meeting of the National Union of Elementary Teachers by Mr. George Gurling, head master of one of the London Board schools, the question of capricious dismissal was gone into. Mr. Gurling appears to have inquired into various cases of hardship, and he says that in one instance a clergyman alleged that the schoolmaster was his servant, and that he had just as much right to dismiss him as his cook or groom. Another clergyman remarked: “Why cannot a gentleman dismiss his servant without anyone interfering?” Now, the servants in regard to whom these insolent words are used are the servants of the State, and to the extent of 75 per cent. their salaries are paid by the State. No complaint is made of the action of the larger School Boards, but the objection comes from the elementary teachers employed in the smaller schools. I will give an example to show what they complain of

In one particular instance the Chairman of the Board was in the habit of employing children illegally, and it became necessary to make an inquiry. The master was applied to for information, but he hesitated to give it for fear of dismissal. He was told that he would be protected by the Education Department, and he accordingly gave information which led to a fine of £27 10s. being imposed. The teacher was subsequently called before the Board and told that he was at the bottom of the mischief, and eventually discharged. Numerous other cases have been placed in my hands, all to the same effect. Of course, statements of this kind made in this House can only be second-hand. I cannot guarantee them myself, but I have received an assurance from gentlemen of character and position that they are true. In one instance, I have been furnished with the copy of an agreement between the School Board and the teacher, containing the curious proviso that the teacher should attend the Sunday school and play the harmonium for the handsome sum of £2 per annum! In another case the teacher for eight years had been accustomed to play the harmonium on Sunday. He received no pay, but believed that if he were to decline he would be required to resign his position. I maintain that it is most unjust, unwise, and unfair to subject these public servants to such conditions as I have described. If professions are to be measured by their public utility I know none which would take a higher position than that of elementary teachers. They are poorly paid, and ought certainly to be free from worry. As far as the clerical managers are concerned, it is not proved that they are fit to exercise that despotic authority which the present state of the law allows them. In many respects the clergy of the Church of England are disqualified beyond other men for the exercise of this despotic power. Whatever lofty virtues their calling tends to develop, I do not think the sense of justice is one of them. They live in an atmosphere of female adulation, which, of itself, tends to demoralise them. The transcendental character of the pretensions they put forward on behalf of their duties and authority tends to blind them. [Cries of "Question!"] I am speaking of the qualifications of clergymen to exercise the powers which they claim. So far as I understand the case, elementary schoolmasters do not demand fixity of tenure; they only ask to be relieved from the capricious action of non-representative authorities and the small School Boards, without the review of such action by the Education Department. I beg to move that the clause be read a second time.

A Clause (Appeal of certificated teacher in case of dismissal,) — (Mr. Edmund Robertson,) — brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

*(4.23.) SIR W. HART DYKE: Her Majesty's Government are not able to accept the proposed clause. The hon. Member has raised no new question, either as regards discussion in this House or outside of it, in airing grievances on behalf of elementary teachers; but so far as the teachers of to-day are concerned, there can be no doubt that, whether as regards the pay they receive, the position they hold, and also the sanitary conditions under which they are called upon to perform their duties, the conditions are enormously improved as compared with four or five years ago. Here and there, in some village or another, some grievance might be urged, but the position of the Education Department in regard to that question is a very simple one. Since 1870 the Department has never had anything to do with the engagement or dismissal of a teacher, and it would, in my opinion, be most prejudicial to the cause of education if it had to sit daily as a Court of Appeal to hear causes between teachers and the managers of schools. Not only has the Education Department nothing to do with the appointment or dismissal of teachers, but, strictly speaking, it has nothing to do with the management of schools; all it has to do is to secure the efficiency of the schools. That is the beginning and end of the responsibility of the Department, and the Government must refuse for many obvious reasons to alter that state of things. I think it would be most hazardous to insert a change in the Bill so vast as this, and therefore I hope the House will negative the clause.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I would go further than my hon. Friend with regard to this clause, and insert after the words "fee grant"—

"The Education Department shall have the right, after due inquiry made and upon cause shown, to dismiss the teacher."

I have had a case brought before me of a child who was beaten by the schoolmaster, and who died after the beating. I have a mass of correspondence here sent me by the father of the child who died. The beating still goes on, and the parents have no power to obtain the dismissal of the teachers. One letter I have here says that the parents are afraid to complain, lest they lose employment with the gentry.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! This has no reference to the clause now under discussion. The clause has reference to the tenure of office of the teachers, and not their conduct.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I understand that hon. Members who were not prepared to support me in the first proposition are ready to support me in the next, and I shall, therefore, formally move the following clause:—

"In a school receiving the fee grant no teacher shall be required, as a condition of holding his appointment, to undertake or abstain from any duties out of the ordinary school hours, as shown by the time table of the school."

Clause (Tenure of office of teacher,)—
(Mr. Edmund Robertson,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Clause be read a second time."

(4.32.) SIR G. TREVELYAN: I certainly could not support the 1st clause moved by my hon. Friend; but as regards the 2nd clause, the point which it raises was a good deal discussed on the Second Reading, and it is one which I shall have the greatest pleasure in supporting.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): There is a very great deal, indeed, to be said for the clause, as I am sure will be admitted by those who have the interests of education at heart, even if they are against the proposition. The right hon. Gentleman said just now that the Education Department has only to do with the efficiency of schools, and nothing with their management. That is a very amazing admission, after we have been told, in reply to our demand for public control, that we have it already. Now we are told that the Department cares for nothing but the efficiency of the schools. But at what dreadful sacrifice to the teachers is that efficiency secured. Often their health breaks down. Frequently schoolmasters have to perform the duties of organist, choirmaster, secretary to Church Clubs and Societies, in addition to their school duties. Many hon. Members are serious observers of the Sabbath, because they wish every man to have his one day's rest in the week, yet there are hundreds of teachers of elementary schools who never have a day's rest. I do think that the Department should forbid the overworking of teachers, and deny to managers the right to employ them outside their school duties.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): This clause is absolutely absurd, because it will deny the right to a teacher, however much he desires it, to become choirmaster or organist.

MR. PICTON: No, no; it is that he shall not be "required."

MR. TALBOT: The clause is so utterly unreasonable that it will not allow the teacher, moreover, to abstain from certain duties. It will not allow him to eke out his salary by playing the organ, nor will it allow him to bind himself not to play that instrument. The whole thing is so intolerable as not to be worthy discussion.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I do not think the hon. Member for Oxford University understands the clause. It is simply this: that a teacher shall not be compelled to undertake any of these duties which are outside of his office of teacher. If a teacher chooses to become organist or choirmaster, this clause will not prevent his doing so. To interfere with him, either by compelling him to undertake, or to prevent from undertaking, any of these duties, would be an interference with his liberty. I have had an immense mass of correspondence, and I have had several instances brought under my notice of teachers who complain that they have been dismissed, or threatened with dismissal, unless they undertook to abstain from certain duties, in themselves perfectly harmless. I hold that there should be no interference with teachers outside their school hours. A schoolmaster, outside his school hours, should be allowed to do what he likes, go where he likes, spend or save his money, just as he chooses, free from interference. I shall certainly support the clause.

(4.40.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): If the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Talbot) will devote himself to reading the advertisements in newspapers connected with the Church of England, he will find it frequently stated that the person applying for the position of schoolmaster will be required to play the organ, to rub down the clergyman's pony, and various things of that sort. ["No!"] I ask them to read these newspapers as I do, and they will acquire some knowledge of these matters. If these things are required, obviously no one will apply for the place unless he is prepared to undertake them. The clause will prevent such obligations being imposed, and I therefore shall vote in favour of it.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): Although I am not so conversant with religious newspapers as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton, and perhaps the hon. Member for Oxford University, still they have been obtruded once or twice upon my notice by way of advertisement, and I have seen attached to the acceptance of a teachership the condition that the candidate shall be a communicant of the Church of England. That is a monstrous tyranny, and I shall, therefore, vote for the clause.

MR. A. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I wish to advance one argument in support of this clause. It is that our Civil and other public servants are allowed to do as they choose in connection with co-operative and other movements in their own time, and any attempt by the Public Departments or by large Railway Companies to control the movements of their servants in their own time would be promptly resisted. I venture to say that nothing of the sort would be allowed at the present time. I am certain that elementary teachers, just as are workmen and public servants, should have liberty of action outside their school hours.

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): It seems to me that the school teacher should be honourably paid, and not compelled to eke out his living in these various ways. I have no doubt the reply will be made that the clause can be so easily evaded that it will become inoperative; but I hold that once it is put in an Act of Parliament that a teacher need not, unless he choose, become a choirmaster or organist, the end we seek will be attained. A Minister on that Bench used wise words the other night when he said that an Act of Parliament was not so much to decide points of law as to serve for a guide to the will of the community. I have no doubt, if this clause were embodied in the Act, it would express public opinion on this point, and these hardships upon teachers would be stopped.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I wish to make an appeal on behalf of the 40,000 school teachers who for the most part entertain a very strong feeling upon this subject. I hope my hon. Friend will go to a Division, and that these teachers will carefully scan the Division List. They are a most deserving and hard-working body of public servants, and it is right that they should have the Sunday's rest, and should not be compelled, as actually a condition of their appointment, to enter into these degrading bargains as to duties outside their regular employment and outside the regular six days' work. Any Sunday duties they choose to undertake should be as entirely voluntary as the rest of the community.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I wish to point out that the clause as drawn will not effect the hon. Member's object at all. It deals with teachers already appointed, but not with making it a condition that teachers to be appointed shall combine with their other duties that of choirmaster or organist. The clause would be inoperative so far as concerns the 40,000 teachers, of whom the hon. Member has spoken.

SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): That point could be met by substituting for the words "holding his appointment" the words "being appointed."

(4.52.) The House divided:—Ayes 116; Noes 181.—(Div. List, No. 331.)

*SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): With regard to the new clause which stands in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield, I regret that owing to ill-health he cannot propose it. The discussion on the principle it involves will be taken, however, on the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvon.

(5.3.) SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): The clause which I have to propose is of a very simple character, although the object aimed at is an important one, for it seeks to secure that a child shall have a right to claim and receive free education in any school which receives the fee grant. I wish the House to consider, first, the extent of the funds which are being provided from public sources for the relief of education; and, second, the provision which has been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is an absolute fact that the provision made in this measure for giving a fee grant is almost identical with the amount of fees now received in the schools. I will not weary the House with figures; but, taking the average number of scholars in attendance, and allowing 10s. per head, we find that the sum proposed to be contributed out of the Public Purse—£2,000,000—is in excess of the amount now paid in fees to the extent of no less than £100,000. I think, therefore, we have a right to claim that every parent who desires to be exempted from paying fees shall be entitled to claim exemption. I want to ask the House to consider what is the effect of this scheme of the Government. The Vice President of the Council on Education has stated that 80 per cent. of the child population of this country who go to school will very shortly receive free education. That means that out of 4,750,000 children attending school 800,000 will not be free. What possible defence can there be for such a state of things as that? We may have in adjacent parishes one child receiving the full benefit of free education, and another not. Take, for instance, the case of two schools in Brighton. The attendance at one is 369, and the fees £478. The fee grant will be less than £190, so that £288 will have to be provided, and, therefore, the children will not receive a free education. In the other school the attendance is 420, the fees £112, the fee grant will be £210, and the whole of the fees will be swept away. Is the state of things with respect to those schools such as any statesman can defend? You are giving to schools which do not want it, money which ought really to go to other schools that require it. I think it only right the House should know what this scheme entails, and that in the first year of its working no fewer than 800,000 children will not have the right to claim free education. Out of these 800,000 children almost half are in national and Church schools, one-fourth in Board schools, and the remainder in British and other schools. I have shown that a state of things will arise under this Act which will be most unsatisfactory, and which cannot be defended by any sound argument. There will be two classes of schools side by side, and in one of them parents will have to pay fees whether they like it or not. The effect will be to deprive many of the free education they desire to obtain, and the contrast will, I fear, be most injurious to the cause of education. It may be said that if this clause is inserted in the Bill parents will be demanding free education for their children in higher grade schools, but I do not think that any difficulty is likely to arise in that direction, neither do I think that the managers of denominational schools will have any trouble in this matter. I beg to move the clause.

New Clause—

(Right to claim free education in any school which takes the fee grant.)

"After the commencement of this Act, where the parent or guardian of a child applies for it, in a school receiving the fee grant, free education shall be given to that child in that school,"—(Sir William Plowden.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That the Clause be read a second time."

*(5.19.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I think that if this clause were inserted in the Bill there would be great difficulty in working it, because the clause breaks up the framework of the Bill. The Government have claimed that the Bill preserves the elasticity of our present school system, and I object to the clause because it destroys that elasticity. The hon. Member has referred to the existence at Brighton of schools charging low fees and of higher grade schools charging high fees. If this clause passes it will be possible for any number of parents whose children attend the low-feed school to send them to the higher-grade school, and to demand that free places shall be found for them. This would thwart the object of the Government, which is to assist poor schools while preserving higher-grade schools. The clause would, therefore, injure rather than benefit the scheme of the Bill, and, under these circumstances, I cannot accept it.

(5.22.) The House divided:—Ayes 109; Noes 206.—(Div. List, No. 332.)

*(5.37.) MR. SPEAKER: The next clause, standing in the name of the hon. Member for Hornsey (Mr. Stephens), is not in order. It proposes an independent alteration of the existing system of management, and relates to all voluntary schools, whether they receive the fee grant or not. It therefore does not hinge in any way upon the Bill.

(5.38.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: The new clause I have the honour to lay before the House will be, I think, an improvement in the economical machinery of the Bill. It is as follows:—

“The managers of two or more schools in the same or neighbouring school districts, not being schools provided by a School Board, may agree together to pay the fee grant, or part thereof, received by each school into a common fund for distribution, as may be arranged by them, between or among such schools. Provided that the fee grant received by each school in the first instance shall alone count as income of such school for the purposes of this Act and of section nineteen of ‘The Elementary Education Act, 1876,’ and a contribution to a school from any such common fund shall not be reckoned as income of such school from other sources within the said section nineteen.”

I have wearied hon. Members, I think, more than once by telling them of the misgivings felt in the North of England with regard to this Bill. One of the principal of those misgivings is that the schools will be prevented, not by express enactment, but by the general feeling engendered during these Debates, from charging any fees in excess of the fee grants. I am not one of those who have ever shared that view. Much as I have sympathised with the difficulties which have been pressed upon us in the North of England, and great as I believe the risk to be which the Government run in passing this Bill, I earnestly hope there may be sufficient patriotism in all parts of England to induce parents to pay something towards the education of their children. The difficulty remains that the schools where fees may be charged may be those which do not require the fees in addition to the fee grant. With the view of meeting that difficulty I propose this clause, which is not compulsory, but voluntary, so that there may be an adjustment between school and school with the object of making the money go as far as possible. I hope that fees will continue to be charged after the passing of this measure, and I know that is the view of the Government. It has been found in both Glasgow and Edinburgh that there is an absolute demand for fee-paying schools on the part of parents who are not desirous of sending their children to the free schools. I want to provide that where a school continues to charge fees it may allocate the fee grant to other schools which may be more in need of it. It may be asked, “Why not leave the schools to make arrangements amongst themselves by assigning part of the voluntary subscriptions from one school to another?” As a matter of fact you cannot order voluntary subscribers about. You cannot say to a man who offers to subscribe to a school, “This particular school does not want your subscription. Will you assign it to a school at the other end of the town which does want it?” If you do make such a request he will probably say, “Well, if you do not want it I will keep it in my pocket.” My proposal can be carried out, and it will not only secure approval in many districts where the strain of this Bill will be unduly felt, but will meet many objections that have been urged in this House. As far as it goes this Amendment will be a suggestion to them that they should hand over the fee grants to schools that want it more than themselves. Last of all I recommend the Amendment to the Government because it will, to a large extent, in certain parts of England, smooth over many of the difficulties which may be offered to the working of the Act. I believe the House will find that, as a consequence of this clause, the money which the country is prepared to give for free education will go much further and be much more acceptable, not only to the North of England, but to all parts of the country, because those schools which need it most will enjoy the larger part of it, and those schools which need it the least will enjoy the lesser part of it.

New Clause (Power of Education Department to pay fee grant to group of schools,) — (Viscount Cranborne),—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(5.47.) SIR W. HART DYKE: Her Majesty's Government are prepared to support the clause which my noble Friend has just moved, as it merely carries out what they have themselves indicated, especially in regard to the schools in the North of England. The clause will give reasonable facilities for combination when a strain is brought to bear upon the schools in regard to this Bill. I think that the clause as drawn will carry out the object of my noble Friend without injuring the working of the Bill in any possible degree. It has one good feature, at all events. It will largely facilitate the providing of free education. Managers of schools will be tempted to take steps at once to meet any possible emergency, and the consequence will be a large increase of free places and free schools which otherwise might not be provided until after the expiration of a long period. Hon. Members will observe that my noble Friend has so safeguarded the clause as to prevent the possibility of rates being paid by a School Board to voluntary schools.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): I should like to know whether each of the parts of a school—that which is free and that which is fee-paying—will be considered a school within the meaning of this clause.

SIR W. HART DYKE*: The words of the clause will cover the case.

(5.49.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: When the clause was originally introduced objection was taken to it on this side of the House because it was believed that it might give rise to an increase of fees in a group of schools. I understand now, however, that that will not be the case. In the circumstances, I think there is really no objection to the proposal, and I agree with the Vice President that it will facilitate the creation of free schools in certain districts.

SIR G. TREVELYAN*: As the Government have accepted it the clause will certainly pass, and it matters very little whether my hon. Friend supports it or not. Of course, however, the approval of so distinguished an educationalist is a matter of importance. But I must own that I think that hon. Members who have voted on this question pretty often on former occasions should examine what they are doing. This is really the Glasgow system which we have so often discussed. I take it that in towns like Preston, Stalybridge, and Stockport the schools may agree together, and settle that some of them shall become entirely free without any necessity for further subscriptions by the process of accumulating the whole of the fee grant; and, on the other hand, that certain other schools shall maintain their present position without the need of any further subscription by the process of charging the same fees which they charge at present.

MR. W. H. SMITH*: They must in the first instance reduce their fees by the amount they receive.

SIR G. TREVELYAN*: I am glad to have drawn that explanation from the right hon. Gentleman, as it removes my strongest objection to the clause. At the same time, I feel bound to make a protest against the clause on the ground that it will give a Parliamentary sanction to a system which has worked very badly in Scotland.

(5.55.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I think it would be convenient if I asked the Vice President a question which he has already answered, but in two different senses; it has reference to the definition of an elementary school contained in the Act of 1870. According to that Act an elementary school means a school, or department of a school, at which elementary education is the principal part of the education given. There are many schools worked in departments, and it has been generally understood that each of the departments is an elementary school. But it seems it is now considered that this definition only applies to such schools as have other departments that are not elementary.

*SIR W. HARTDYKE: I have already stated that the grant will be paid to a school as a whole, although under the Act a department is considered a school by itself. Since I gave that answer I have consulted the highest authorities, and they assure me that my reply was quite correct.

*(5.59.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR: The clause of the noble Lord has a good many advantages. It will certainly facilitate free education in large towns where there are a great many voluntary schools. It will, however, interfere in a few cases with the Amendment, to which we attach considerable importance, standing in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Brightside Division. Under the circumstances I do not see any objection to the adoption of the clause.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added.

*(6.0.) MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I rise to move the clause in reference to the use of schoolrooms for public meetings—

*MR. ELLIOTT LEES (Oldham): I rise to a point of order, and beg to ask you, Sir, if a clause relating to the use of schoolrooms out of school hours is in order on this Education Bill?

*MR. SPEAKER: I understand this point was reserved in Committee for the Report stage.

*MR. COBB: This question has been before the House on various occasions; but it has not been discussed in reference to this Bill. I will shortly state the position of the law as it is as to the use of schoolrooms. Under the Ballot Act the Returning Officer only has the power to use the schoolroom for the purpose of a poll free of charge. Then, under the Allotments Act of last Session I remember very well what took place, and the President of the Local Government Board will confirm me. His Department was on the occasion, I think, represented by the Secretary to the Board, and he assented to a clause, which was carried, providing that the schoolroom of any public elementary school might be used for an inquiry under the Allotments Amendment Act or under the Allotments Act of 1887, or for any public meeting to discuss any question arising under those Acts. The clause was agreed to in this House, and in the House of Lords an Amendment was proposed to the effect that the schoolroom should only be so used with the consent of the managers of the school. On this there was a Division, and in Committee the Amendment was negatived by 21 to 12, and the clause was left providing that the consent of the managers should not be required. But on the Report stage Lord Salisbury moved an Amendment to the clause to the effect that the consent of two of the managers should be required for the use of the room for the purpose. Of course the consent of two of the managers in regard to a great number of schools means the consent of double the number of the actual managers existing, therefore the Amendment which was adopted actually wiped out all the good that was done in this House. When the Bill came back to this House, I proposed to disagree with the Lords' Amendment, and I remember very well what the President of the Local Government Board said on that occasion, and I thank him for saying it. He said—what, of course, was very true—that it was very desirable to get the Bill through; that it was the fag-end of the Session, and everyone was anxious to get away; but he added these words, which are important, and which I venture to quote. He said—"But the principle that schoolrooms ought to be granted for the purpose of public meetings is now conceded." Of course that was a very important concession, confirming what the Secretary to the Local Government Board had previously said when the Bill was in Committee. Now, I speak for rural villages rather than for towns, for I have more knowledge of village life as concerned in this matter, and I say it is a great grievance felt that the people who pay to maintain these schools are not allowed to use them for public purposes. We have heard over and over again during the course of these Debates, that there are 10,000 parishes where the school belongs to one denomination—the Church of England—and in very few instances are there any other rooms except these schoolrooms suitable for lectures, addresses, and public meetings. I may ask—Are there not a great number of us who during the elections of 1885 and 1886 were put to great inconvenience in consequence of not being able to get the use of schoolrooms? I can speak from personal experience, and so, I think, can many hon. Members. I remember very well the hon. Member for the Saffron Walden Division (Mr. Gardner)—I regret he is not here, for this subject he has made his own, and he would have drafted a much better Amendment than I have put on the Paper—he said there were 80 parishes in his Division, and in only five had he been able to obtain the use of the schoolroom for the purpose of addressing meetings of the electors; and that in 24 out of 30 agricultural constituencies there were absolute refusals to allow the schoolrooms to be used for political meetings, the managers refusing being, of course, the incumbents. Very often where use of the rooms has been granted the permission has been coupled with harassing and impossible conditions. I remember on one occasion the incumbent in a village in Warwickshire consented to the schoolroom being used, but on the condition that he and not I should select the gentlemen who were to speak. I need not say I declined the offer of the use of the building. But to show the right hon. Baronet the change that has come over the popular sentiment in this matter I may mention that only three weeks ago I attended a meeting in that very schoolroom, the incumbent having granted the use of the room without any such conditions, and he himself, being present, expressed an opinion that schoolrooms ought to be used for the benefit of the public. I remember also that in 1887 the hon. Member for Sudbury said that in consequence of the refusal to grant the use of the schoolroom he had spent hours in the rain addressing those who afterwards became his constituents, and he said that on more than one occasion the clergyman ordered the lamps to be put out, so that everything might be in darkness. Not only do I ask that schoolrooms should be opened for the use of ratepayers at election time, but at any time, and I venture to quote what the noble Lord the Member for

Darwen has said on this subject, and I hope for his support to my proposal. He said—

“Meetings could not be limited to election time, and he looked forward to the time when the Primrose League would be able to demand the use of any public elementary school for holding concerts three times a week for purposes of political education.”

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: May I ask from what report the hon. Member is quoting?

*MR. COBB: From the report in the Times.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: What I said was precisely the reverse. I was pointing out the impossibility of adopting the Motion of the hon. Member for Essex, for it must inevitably and logically lead to the use of schools for the purposes I mentioned.

*MR. COBB: Well, I am quoting fairly from the Times' report, and if the word “not” is omitted I cannot help it. Now, I do not propose this clause as in any way a Party matter; it concerns Members on either side of the House. The grievance is not confined to voluntary schools; we know that the use of Board schools has been refused, because the Boards have been bound by agreement with the former managers of the school. Now, if these refusals have been felt as a grievance, how much more keen will that feeling be after the passing of this Bill, when we know that a very large proportion of the public elementary schools in England will be absolutely and entirely maintained by public money. I am asking for nothing new, I am asking only for an extension of the principle fairly and wisely laid down by the President of the Local Government Board last Session. Why, I should like to know, should the schoolrooms of public elementary schools be used for the purpose only of meetings under the allotments Act and the discussion of allotment questions which are to a large extent of a political and party character [“No, no,”]—at all events it is a political subject. Why should a schoolroom be used for allotment meetings and not for vestry meetings and public meetings generally? I go further, and ask why should the room not be used for purposes of amusement? It would not be just in all cases to grant the use of the room free of charge, and, therefore, I have inserted in the clause the provision—

“Subject to such regulations as may be approved by the Committee of Council on Education.”

If any other safeguards can be suggested I am quite willing to adopt them in the clause. I merely wish to raise the question whether the public who pay for the maintenance of the schools are to be allowed to use them subject to proper supervision, the right, in fact, allowed for discussions under the Allotment Act, for the President of the Local Government Board will recognise the form of words which I have adapted from his own words for the Allotments Act. I will not occupy more time, for we are all anxious to get to the end of the Bill. If the Government desire any modifications in the clause I am quite willing to accept them, and if the clause is inserted I am sure it will give great public satisfaction, almost as great satisfaction as parents having their children educated without payment of fees. If the Government refuse to accept it I shall take a division in order that we may see who really are in favour of allowing the public the use of school-rooms for public purposes.

A clause—

(Schools may be used for public meetings.)

“Any room in a school receiving the fee grant may, except during ordinary school hours, and subject to such regulations as may be approved by the Committee of Council on Education, be used for any vestry or parochial meeting or for any public meeting or other purpose, either for recreation or otherwise, by the inhabitants of the school district, but any damage done to the room, and any expense incurred by the person or persons having control over the room on account of its being so used shall be paid by the persons calling the meeting.

Nothing in this section shall give any right to use any schoolroom (a) unless not less than six days before the user a notice of the intention to use the room, on the day and at the time specified in the notice, signed by the persons requiring such user, being not less than six in number, and being ratepayers in the school district, has been given, if the school is under a school board, to the clerk of the board, and in any other case to one of the managers of the school; nor (b) if the use of the schoolroom on the said day and at the said time has, previously to the receipt of the notice, been granted for some other purpose; but in that case the clerk, or manager, or someone on his behalf, shall forthwith after the receipt of the notice inform in writing one of the persons signing it that the use of the school has been so granted for some other purpose, and name some other day on which the schoolroom can be used.

If the persons so asking for the use of the schoolroom fail to obtain it, they may appeal to the county council of the county in which the school district is situate, who shall forthwith decide the appeal and make such order respecting the use of the rooms as seems just,”—(Mr. Cobb.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the clause be read a second time.”

*(6.17.) SIR W. HART DYKE: Her Majesty's Government must oppose the insertion of this clause. This is no new question, as the hon. Member has said. It has often been raised before, but in a more direct manner on other occasions, not concealed as now it is in many words. At first sight it is a little difficult to detect the real object, but the hon. member, however, has in his speech completely disclosed the object he is in pursuit of in this Bill, which is for the purpose of relieving parents from the payment of fees. It is perfectly obvious that what the hon. Member is in pursuit of is a compulsory power to hand over private property to be used for political purposes. As regards recreation, as everybody acquainted with village life knows, compulsory power is not necessary, and the clause in that respect is unnecessary, while the protection the hon. Member purports to give to the managers is of a very indifferent nature. I assume that a contest is going on in a county between what is familiarly known as a carpet-bagger, who, I believe, is a gentleman who comes from a distance to try and oust some representative locally connected with the district, either a local landowner or somebody of local connection. I have often suffered under the infliction. This compulsory power is brought to bear on the managers of a school during a contested election, and they have to give up the schoolroom for an evening meeting. Supposing there is a very noisy meeting, and the school furniture is seriously injured, and the benches broken up, what is to happen when the school meets next day? These things are continually happening. I can assure hon. Gentlemen opposite I have often had to bolt from a meeting. It is no new experience to me, and I am obliged, therefore, not only to suggest but to insist upon it as one of the unpleasant features of electioneering. But how is the efficiency of a school to be kept up under such conditions? Compensation is not effectually provided in the enactment that damage done to the room shall be paid for by the persons calling the meeting. It may be very well for allotment meetings, which do not excite political feeling, though the hon. Member takes a different view and uses the Allotment Act for political purposes. But see how the provision as to liability for damage would work. The unfortunate gentleman connected with the locality calls a meeting—[Mr. WINTERBOTHAM: The landowner]—call him by any hard name you please. The local gentleman as having called the meeting is to be responsible for damage, but his opponent comes in with a body of roughs and smashes up the whole meeting, and the unfortunate local gentleman not only has his head broken, but has to pay the whole damage caused, not by himself, but by his opponents. Surely this is not a proposition to be entertained. But these school buildings the hon. Member wishes to invade for political purposes are private property, and I insist strongly that the proposal might interfere seriously with the school work, and on that ground more especially I oppose the clause.

*(6.24.) SIR G. TREVELYAN: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has used very practical arguments in opposition to the clause. I share the desire to get through with the Bill, and will therefore only mention the arguments in favour of the clause rapidly. In the first place the use of the schoolroom may be argued on grounds of economy, that the one public institution which is alone available in many English villages ought to be utilised for all public purposes so long as those public purposes are proper in themselves, and will do no damage to the original purpose for which that institution is established. I say that political purposes are the highest of public purposes for which such a room should be used. Politics are now conducted in an intelligent and educated manner. The time has passed—and I avoid saying a word in reference to one side of the House or the other—when politics were carried on in the backyard of a public house by means of piles of sovereigns, the work is now done in the face of day, and candidates seek to become Members by persuading their fellow-citizens, and we ask that all proper opportunity should be afforded for the exercise of persuasion and argument. This proposition involves no interference with education. At the present time the highest of political functions is carried on in our schools—the polling for County Council and Parliamentary Elections. This does interfere with school work, for it is carried on during school hours, but I believe the gain to parents educationally is greater than the loss of the day to the children's education, for they see that the election of a Member of the Legislature is a serious and solemn matter, and is considered by the State an important public purpose. The right hon. Gentleman talks of his personal experience, and we have all had personal experience. There are many landowners and managers, and I have not the slightest doubt, from what I know of him, that the right hon. Gentleman himself is one who would not scruple to lend any schoolroom in which they are pecuniarily interested for any purpose their poorer neighbours are in sufficient numbers anxious to promote. And what harm comes of it? How often are schoolrooms let for concerts, readings, lectures, meetings with no more interference with the daily work of the school than there is interference with the discussion of a Railway Bill upstairs, by a meeting of Scotch Members being held in the Committee-room the evening before. It is not enough to say these are political partisan purposes. We are not ashamed that we are divided into two parties [An hon. MEMBER: More.]—two or more parties, that it is which in the long run keeps politics free and energetic. Finally, this is a question of justice, because in many cases, in the South of England at any rate, these schools are allowed to be occupied for political purposes by one Party and not by the other. I may be allowed to refer to a correspondence, omitting names of persons and places, a correspondence between the Secretary of a Liberal Association and one of the most amiable and kindly noblemen in the country. I will read only two sentences of his Lordship's reply when asked for the use of a schoolroom, which is the only place available for a meeting in a populous village. He says—

“At the time of the General Election and on ordinary occasions the use of the schoolroom has usually been freely conceded to both political Parties for these meetings.”

And then the noble Lord goes on to base his refusal on grounds with which I will not trouble the House, but one of them is that the opinions of the Liberal Party at this moment are specially objectionable. [Ministerial cheers and laughter.] I am glad to give Gentlemen opposite the opportunity of indulging in a laugh, and all the more because when they come to examine the statement of the noble Lord they will see it is the strongest possible argument in favour of this Motion. Well, that is a school which receives £75 of public money, and henceforth it will receive £130 a year of public money. There are 600 schools already supported entirely by means of public money, and after this Bill is passed there will be a great many more. And yet you will allow one man—for the poorer the school the more entirely it is in the power of one man—to say whether or not any one of them shall be used for political purposes or purposes of recreation. Wise, just, and kindly managers now allow their neighbours to use the schoolrooms for political and other purposes, and we know that such extreme cases of disorder as the right hon. Gentleman referred to do not occur when such kindness is shown. We ask hon. Members to use that generosity and public spirit in their character as Members of Parliament, which I am sure they would use in their character as managers of public schools.

(6.34.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I do not know whether it is of any good, but I wish to make an appeal to Members who represent rural constituencies on the other side of the House. I know many representing towns and cities know little of the intense feeling this question arouses in country districts, but some on the other side do, and I am not at all without hope that a good many hon. Members sitting opposite will vote for this Amendment, which ought not to be of a Party character. There is another appeal I want to make. I believe two-thirds of the clergy in the county in which I live already give more or less cordially the use of village schoolrooms for these purposes. I believe that the more moderate and broad-minded clergy of the Church of England, if they could advise the House on this point, would say, “In the interests of the voluntary schools themselves and of the Church do not flout public opinion and refuse parishioners the use of national schoolrooms.” The right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education said carpet-baggers and mountebanks would be able to take advantage of this clause, and actually commit the heinous sin of opposing local landowners! He forgot, however, the words put in the forefront of the clause, that the power shall only be exercised subject to such regulations and restrictions as the Education Department shall make. I think the argument about mountebanks was a very unworthy one to use. Speaking as a Churchman, I think the Government have listened far too much in these Debates to those who represent not the bulk of the clergy or laity, but a small and bigotted minority. I do not believe it is the wish of many of the clergy that this non possumus should be so constantly repeated again and again. We are going to take a Division, and those who represent rural constituencies will very soon have to explain to their electors why they have voted for or against giving the use of the national schoolrooms for national purposes; whether the labourers are to be trusted to behave decently and orderly; or whether the Minister of Education’s opinion is right, that they are a set of savages who will smash up the furniture! Are these schools, built to a large extent with national money, and which after the passing of this Bill will be supported almost exclusively with public money, private schools or national schools? If they are private property tell the people so, and I venture to prophesy that they will not remain private property long.

*(6.38.) MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I entirely agree with the arguments that have been used by my hon. Friends on this side of the House, and I only rise for the purpose of relieving the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President. I was for several years a member of the Sheffield School Board, and we had before us the question of the conditions under which schoolrooms should be used for meetings. We recommended that a moderate charge should be made, according to a scale, for the use of the rooms, and that the person hiring them should obtain a guarantee from responsible persons for any damage that was done. I do not understand on what ground rooms need be refused even to the carpet-bagger, who seems to be so much objected to by the right hon. Gentleman, provided that he and his Friends are able to give a substantial guarantee for the repair of any damage done. The opposition that comes from the other side is prompted by a desire to protect the landowners against other people going into their districts as candidates or as "agitators."

(6.40.) MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I could very much have wished that the hon. Member who moved the clause had been able to find some words to safeguard those who have the management of schools. I am anxious to see the village schoolrooms open to all political parties where there is no fear that any damage will be done to the schools. Unfortunately that is not safeguarded by the Amendment. I think we should remove the restrictions at present imposed upon many managers, who are altogether precluded from lending their schools for political purposes by the terms of their trust. That is the great difficulty that managers have not been able to cope with.

*MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I am glad that the hon. Member who has just sat down has shown that he has some sympathy with the Amendment. I quite appreciate two objections that have been offered to the clause. The first is that it is hardly cognate to the objects of the Bill, but as you, Sir, have ruled that the clause is in order, it is necessary for us, who are in favour of the principle, to vote for the Second Reading. The second objection is that the terms of the clause are too wide. I should have preferred to see this right confined to meetings of public interest and importance, excluding such general words as "for recreation or otherwise." I should also have preferred to see the clause confined to places where there are no other public buildings available for meetings. But I conceive that if the clause is read a second time it will be quite within the competence of hon. Members to move Amendments so as to frame it in accordance with their views. After all, the general principle is simply that these schoolrooms, which are largely supported out of public money, and which are often the only rooms available for public purposes, should, when necessary, be devoted to those purposes. That is a principle I have expressed approval of on many public occasions in my own constituency, and which I shall now by my vote express approval of in this House. In years gone by, when I was not so favourably regarded by school managers as I am now, I was constantly refused the use of schoolrooms, and driven either into public houses or barns, or even into the open air. I am now sometimes refused the use of them on, as it seems to me, the very unsatisfactory ground—that the use of them has already been refused to my opponents. I always say on such occasions that I wish my opponents had the use of the schoolrooms as I desire to have it myself. I desire that in future these rooms shall be available to all parties, under proper safeguards, for all legitimate public purposes.

*MR. ELLIOTT LEES: I very much regret that this proposal was not discussed in Committee, for then the clause might have been amended.

An hon. MEMBER: It can be amended now.

*MR. ELLIOTT LEES: We shall not be able to discuss it—that is to say, a Member will not be able to speak more than once. I shall be obliged to vote against the Amendment, but I should like to explain that I thoroughly sympathise with the grievance felt in many villages that the use of schoolrooms is not allowed for public meetings.

(6.45.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): There are two points I wish to put before the House before a Division is taken. This clause was first brought forward in Committee, and it is now brought forward on Report. We are, therefore, discussing it by consent of both sides of the House and by the direction of the Chairman of Committees. We are now on the Second Reading, and after it is passed, Amendments can be moved.

Several Amendments have been suggested from different parts of the House. I would call attention to the point raised in the speech of the hon. Member for North Somerset. He said there are cases where the trust-deeds of schools prevent school buildings being used for these purposes. It is desirable that where the managers would like to have them used for political purposes power should be given to enable that to be done. That power will be given under this clause. It may be that one or two words will have to be inserted in the clause to make it clear that the clause is intended to override trust deeds. They could be easily introduced after the clause is read a second time. The other remark I would make is this. I have often discussed this question as regards the use of schoolrooms with various clerical friends. Some of them have told me that they would like to be able to lend the schools to both parties. "But," they say, "we are in a position of great difficulty, for if we were to lend them to the party in a minority, to which very few of our friends and supporters belong, we should be exposed to a good deal of odium." I believe that if this clause were passed, and it were no longer a matter of option with them, a great many clergymen of the Church of England would welcome the change.

*(6.48.) MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I should not have risen if I had not been so pointedly alluded to in connection with several incidents which took place in South Suffolk, before I was elected. I would only say that since that happy time there has been a considerable change. I believe the use of the schoolrooms are now hardly ever denied. But, Sir, I do not think that removes the entire grievance. I think now, as I thought then, that the schoolroom in every village, where there is no other room suitable for the purpose, ought to be open for the political meetings of either party under proper safeguards in regard to enforcement of payment for any damage that might be done. I very much regret that the right hon. Gentleman who has conducted this Bill through the House with so much good temper and so much tact, has not thought it desirable to make some concession at least in the direction of the Motion before the House. I believe it would be possible to satisfy large numbers of people in the villages and a great many lovers of fair play without running the slightest risk of interrupting the labours of the schools or of damaging the buildings in which they are carried on.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I desire to second the appeal made by the hon. Member for Somersetshire, on the ground that this is by no means a Party question. I can assure the House that there are other managers of public schools besides the clergy of the Church of England who are hampered in this matter because their trust deeds do not allow them to grant the use of their schools for political meetings. There is a dissenting sect in this country whose sympathies, I believe, in the balance rather incline to the Opposition side of the House, who would grant the use of their schools to both political parties impartially, but they are unable to do it on account of the clauses in their trust. I hope the House will accede to the appeal of the hon. Member for Somersetshire, and amend the clause, as the hon. Member for Rugby is ready to do.

*MR. COBB: With the permission of the House, I beg to say that if the clause is read a second time I shall be willing to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Somerset and any other reasonable Amendment that may be proposed.

*(7.5.) MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I now beg to move the new clause which stands in my name—

"The accounts of every school receiving a fee grant shall be audited by the district auditor in accordance with regulations to be made by the Local Government Board, and a certified copy of the accounts shall be sent within 14 days after the conclusion of the audit to the local educational authority, who shall permit inspection thereof, and allow copies thereof to be taken at all reasonable times."

Hon. Members will observe that the clause divides itself into two parts. The first part has reference to the provision for auditing the accounts, and the second part deals with their publication. It seems to me that the provisions of the law, as far as the accounts of School Board schools are concerned, are already adequate and sufficient.

Under the Act of 1870 it was provided that the auditor of the School Board accounts shall be the auditor of the accounts relating to the relief of the poor for the audit district in which the school is situate, and, when the auditor has completed his audit, he is bound by the provisions of the Act to sign the balance sheet. After this the School Board has to cause a statement, showing the receipts and expenditure, to be printed in such form, and with such particulars, as may be from time to time prescribed by the Education Department, and must send within 30 days of the time the balance sheet has been signed by the auditor a copy of the statement to each of the rating authorities, and also to the overseers of every parish in the district, and to the Educational Department. So much in regard to the auditing of the accounts of the School Boards. I think the provisions of the Act are in that case perfectly sufficient and satisfactory, and so also are the provisions of the Act in regard to the publication of the accounts of different School Boards. It is provided that the School Boards may, if they think fit, publish a statement of the accounts, or an abstract thereof, in any local newspaper, or in any newspaper circulating in the district, and that they shall also furnish a copy of such accounts to any ratepayer in the district upon his application, and on the payment of a sum not exceeding 6d. I do not propose to alter the law as far as the School Boards are concerned. What I wish is that the law may be extended to the audit of the accounts of the voluntary schools. I contend that the provisions of the existing law, as far as the voluntary school accounts are concerned, are by no means satisfactory. As I understand the matter, the question of auditing the accounts of the voluntary schools is determined, not by Act of Parliament, but by the provisions of the Code. The provision of the Code dealing with this subject is to be found in Article 18. Under that Article it is said that the Inspectors are empowered to visit schools and examine whether the conditions of annual grants have been fulfilled, and they must report to the Department, but it is not said that the Inspectors must audit the accounts of the voluntary schools, and as a matter of fact, I believe they do not either claim to audit the accounts or carry out the audit in practice. I think I am borne out in my interpretation of the Code by the sentence which follows, and in which it says the Department may, if they think it necessary, employ auditors of accounts to visit these schools and inspect the accounts. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council will probably admit that the Education Department have simply the power to send auditors to audit the accounts of voluntary schools, but they are not obliged by law to see that those accounts are properly audited. Now, I hold that abundant evidence was given before the Royal Commission, showing that it is necessary that the accounts of all public elementary schools should be audited. If hon. Gentlemen will turn to the Report of the Minority of the Royal Commission they will see that they practically insist on the necessity of there being an audit of the accounts of the voluntary schools as well as of those of the Board schools, because they say, we "are of opinion that the accounts of all schools receiving public money should be equally thoroughly audited, and that the same rule should apply to their expenditure." The minority go on to refer to the circular which was issued in the North of England, and which proved the necessity for a public and efficient audit of the accounts of the voluntary schools. In that circular the managers of these schools are told of certain devices, which, if they follow them, will enable them to increase the sums of money they can obtain in the shape of a Parliamentary grant. I will quote only one or two of the hints given in this particular circular. It is there said that as much as possible the scholars should be encouraged to purchase their own school requisites, either from their managers or their school teachers. The amount returned from the sale of school materials may be reckoned as income. It is also stated that all accounts as to the purchase of school materials should be paid in full, and that the discounts received should be entered as items of income. Again, it is said that where the managers provide the residences for the teachers the latter should pay the rent for the same, and their salaries should be correspondingly increased

And, lastly, it is said that all necessary work which is performed gratuitously for the schools should be returned as paid for and the amount returned as donations. It seems to me that unless you have an efficient public audit of the accounts of the voluntary schools, you have no security that these schools are really earning the Government grant. So much with regard to the necessity for the audit. I now come to the remaining part of the clause which deals with the publication of accounts. On this subject the majority and the minority of the Royal Commission are at one. They say they think it right that the accounts of all voluntary schools should be open to public inspection in the same way as the accounts of the Board schools. I, therefore, claim that with regard to the latter part of my clause I have the whole of the Commission at my back—the minority as well as the majority. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council may tell me that the new Code provides for the audit of the accounts of the voluntary schools. It does profess to do so, but the terms of the Code in this particular are by no means sufficiently wide and satisfactory. I should like to know what steps the right hon. Gentleman has taken or intends to take to see that the provisions of the Code are vigorously carried out in the future. It seems to me that we ought to deal with the two classes of schools—the Board schools and the voluntary schools—in precisely the same way. The Parliamentary grant is given to both classes of schools on the principle of perfect equality, and both classes of schools ought, therefore, to submit to having their accounts audited and published in precisely the same way. I beg, Sir, to move the clause I have placed on the Paper, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will on consideration see his way to accept it.

Another Clause (Audit of Accounts,)—(Mr. Summers,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, 'That the Clause be read a second time.'

*(7.15.) SIR W. HART DYKE: The hon. Member has pleaded that there is no distinction between voluntary and Board schools, but it is perfectly obvious that there must be a great distinction. I will not press that point, however. I have already stated in Committee that ample provision exists with regard to auditing the accounts of voluntary schools. They are submitted to the Inspector, every item is examined. Afterwards they are subjected to severe criticism by the Education Department, and every source of income and its application are known to the Department, and also to the Auditor General. As to a local audit the hon. Member seems to be unaware of the fact that it would involve considerable expenditure, besides creating an additional Imperial charge. No school would obtain an audit under £2, and if the whole army of voluntary schools were to be subjected to this audit it is perfectly obvious that the central staff would have to be increased with consequent increase of the Imperial expenditure. I hope the House will not accept the first part of the clause. With regard to the remaining portion of it, I believe that the provision that all free school accounts shall be exhibited in some public place is ample for the purpose. I need hardly say that if the Code is insufficient in this respect it will be easy to amend it to meet the views of hon. Members. I hope, however, the clause will not be accepted.

*(7.18.) MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I think the House will regret the decision of the Vice President, seeing that the case for strictly auditing the accounts of denominational schools, strong before, has been made more necessary by the changes which the Bill has undergone in Committee, and still further by the adoption of the Motion of the noble Lord (Cranborne). The inspection of those accounts by Her Majesty's Inspectors is insufficient. They should go through the ordeal to which the accounts of Board schools are subjected. The Vice President was encouraged by the cheers of his colleague (Mr. Ritchie), who can hardly have forgotten that when, two years ago, we were discussing the Technical Instruction Act, he himself brought in a clause requiring that all schools receiving public money under that Act were to be submitted to audits by officers of the Local Government Board.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I would remind the hon. Gentleman that in that instance the public rates were involved, that it was not an instance of the expenditure of Imperial money.

*MR. WOODALL: I grant the distinction. Still, our contention is that we are dealing with schools supported by public money, and that, therefore, their accounts should be inspected on behalf of the public. I have heard of a case where the grant, instead of being paid to the school, has gone to the clergyman, and when he died, his affairs were in confusion, and the school fund sustained a considerable loss. I know of a case where money intended for the school has been expended in Church services. I know of another case—and I believe all these cases can be authenticated—where money intended for the provision of a recreation ground was spent upon a field for the clergyman, who allowed the school to use it only for their annual fête. I believe these cases could be multiplied indefinitely. At any rate, I think the accounts of these schools ought to be above suspicion, and subjected to the verification of a professional auditor.

MR. T. ELLIS: When rates are expended, you have some sort of guarantee that they will be spent properly, but in the case of Imperial money sent to the country in large sums, you have no guarantee that it will be spent according to the Act of Parliament or the intention of Parliament. I hold that there should be no distinction between local rates and Imperial money, and that in both instances there should be an audit such as is now demanded.

MR. SINCLAIR: One reason of great importance in support of this proposal has not been mentioned. It is that by allowing this audit, you would relieve the Inspector of a great deal of detail, and give him more time for his educational work, for which he has little enough time now.

(7.25.) The House divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 145.—(Div. List, No. 334.)

Mr. Woodall

(7.38.) MR. TALBOT: The Amendment which I have to propose has for its object to make it clear that the school managers are free, not only at the present time but hereafter as well, to refuse the fee grant. I do not think any harm could be caused by accepting this Amendment.

Amendment proposed in page 1, line 13, after the word "are," to insert the words "from time to time." — (Mr. Talbot.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I do not quite understand the Amendment. I am afraid it would allow of school managers making their schools free at one time, and fee-paying at another. If this would be the effect, I object to the Amendment.

MR. A. H. D. ACLAND: I hope my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council will not accept the Amendment. We much prefer the clause as it stands.

MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I think we ought to have some authoritative explanation of the meaning and effect of these words.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I must say I think that the words are unnecessary, because it is clear that the managers have absolute freedom at any time to refuse the fee grant. If any alteration is to be made I shall prefer the words "at any time" to "from time to time."

*MR. F. S. POWELL: I think some alteration of the clause is necessary.

*SIR L. PLAYFAIR: Unless we can ascertain the exact meaning of these words, I think it would be very dangerous to accept the Amendment. They might enable managers first to accept the fee grant and make a school a free school and subsequently to reimpose fees.

MR. TOMLINSON: I think the difficulty which is being raised by hon. Members opposite is purely imaginary.

MR. TALBOT: I have no desire to introduce any new principle into the Bill. As the Amendment is objected to I ask leave to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.44.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: I beg to move the omission of the words "as to fees" in line 15. The clause provides that the fee grant is to be given if it is desired by the managers, and if the Department are satisfied that the regulations of the school as to fees are in accordance with the conditions of the Act. I think the words "as to fees" are unnecessary and in some respects inconsistent.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 15, to leave out the words "as to fees."
—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'as to fees,' stand part of the Bill."

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I cannot accept that Amendment. The words were carefully examined in Committee.

*MR. SUMMERS: I must say that the words as they stand are not quite clear. The new clause which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to incorporate in the Bill deals with other matters besides fees.

*MR. ROBY: I hope the Vice President will be good enough to reconsider his decision. I do not think the omission of these words can do any harm.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is impossible to strike out the words.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I cannot see any force in the objections to this Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

(7.48.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I now propose the next Amendment standing in my name. I desire to insert words to provide that where the fee grant of 10s. exceeds in a school the amount of fees that have been paid in the year ending 1890, the surplus shall be applied for such educational purposes and in such manner as shall be approved by the Education Department, and for this purpose the manager shall submit to the Department a scheme for the application of the surplus. This is, I think, a matter of considerable importance to denominational schools; if voluntary schools are to be kept up they must justify their existence; the result of incorporating this clause in the Bill will be to secure greater efficiency in these schools. If the clause imposes upon managers the duty of preparing a scheme it will be operative, and in this way means will be taken to secure the application of the surplus to educational purposes, a point wholly unprovided for by the Bill as it stands. A Return recently presented to the House shows that in many of the schools the fees are less than the amount of the fee grant now to be given. There will, therefore, be a surplus in the hands of managers, and I desire that it shall be used to secure greater efficiency of education instead of relieving the friends of voluntary schools of the duty of subscribing to their support. In many schools in Wales there will be a surplus to be disposed of, and I would urge that the money might be used for providing technical instruction which is of especial importance to particular localities. I strongly believe that subscribers to voluntary schools will much prefer that this should be done, because their poorer neighbours will greatly benefit by such an arrangement, and I have no doubt that one result will be the preparation in rural districts of schemes of agricultural education, which would be of immense benefit. Unless something of the kind I suggest is done, very much of the time of Parliament will be occupied, and probably wasted, in fruitless discussion as to the way in which the money has been allocated. Questions will be asked from all sides of the House as to how the money has been applied, and if the answers are not satisfactory, it is very likely there will be endless discussions in Supply. It may be said, in respect to the latter part of my Amendment, that a considerable amount of additional work will be imposed on the Education Department. But surely it may well be provided that each district shall submit their scheme for the utilisation of the surplus to the local Inspectors. The previous submission of the schemes to the Inspectors would considerably lighten the burdens of those gentlemen when they went down to examine the schools, for they would simply be carrying out schemes of which they had approved. The Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Darwen (Viscount Cranborne), which has already been accepted, enables schools to be grouped together for certain purposes. That is a very admirable idea, and may well be carried out in the case contemplated by my Amendment. I submit it is very important we should do something in the nature of what I propose, otherwise there will be a blot upon this Act which it will be very difficult to remove.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 16, after the word "Act," to insert the words "Provided that where such fee grant of ten shillings shall exceed in any particular school the aggregate amount of fees paid at such school for the year ending the thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and ninety, then, and in such case, the surplus shall, subject to the provision hereinafter contained with regard to the grouping of schools, be applied for such educational purposes, and in such manner as shall be approved by the Education Department, and for this purpose the managers of such school shall from time to time after the commencement of this Act submit to the said Department a scheme for the application of the said surplus."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted." (8.5.)

*(8.41.) MR. T. ELLIS: I desire to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and I do so largely on the ground I have previously stated to the House, namely, that if the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill is really desirous of giving a great boon to the parents and children of this country he ought to accept some such Amendment as this. One of the charges which is often brought against this Bill by hon. Members on the other side of the House is that it is a mere piece of electioneering tactics, a charge which hon. Members on this side of the House have certainly not brought so frequently against their opponents.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*MR. T. ELLIS: I was observing, when interrupted by the counting of the House, that I do not agree with the charge of this Bill as a mere bribe. I have too good an opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council to make this charge against him. It is a charge which is brought more frequently by his own friends than by his enemies; but unless this Amendment, or something like it, be adopted, the charge that will be made respecting this Bill will be not so much that it is an electioneering Bill as that it is brought forward partly in relief of the parents and partly in relief of the subscribers. I feel assured that the right hon. Gentleman is not anxious that this Bill should go down to posterity as a subscribers' relief Bill; he would infinitely prefer that it should hereafter be regarded as a real educational measure which not only does away with fees, but which can be used as a great weapon for the improvement of our national education. Now, Sir, I maintain that nothing can be done in the way of improving the education in our elementary schools by means of this surplus except by direct instructions from Parliament, and here I would point out that Acts of Parliament like this are not so valuable as means of deciding questions of law as they are when considered as guides to administrators. Unless some special provision be made to meet the case of those schools where the fee grant exceeds the present income, the measure cannot possibly be useful as a means of bringing about what my hon. Friend desires to effect by his Amendment. It has been contended by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, and especially by the First Lord of the Treasury, that our attempts to earmark the surplus grant is in reality only a penalising of the managers of schools who have been hitherto able to charge low fees. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to argue that this House had, in effect, contracted with School Boards and the managers of voluntary schools that if they could only charge low fees this House would pass a Bill giving them a sort of reward that would enable them to carry out their contracts. So far, however, from this, we know that in every constituency in England and Wales numbers of gentlemen have denounced root and branch any attempt to secure free schools; and, instead of the school managers doing their work under any implied contract with the House, they have done it by their own efforts, and have thus evidenced the futility of the arguments offered by the First Lord of the Treasury. I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, who knows what is the condition of elementary education in this country, and ask him whether he can get up and deny that there is great need, especially in the schools to which this surplus will come, for increased efficiency. The right hon. Gentleman admitted the other night the figures quoted by a colleague of mine, to the effect that a percentage of boys and girls who attained the Fifth and Sixth and Seventh Standards, is deplorably low, and a former Vice President of the Council, the Member for Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair), has also called attention to this matter. I think it is one of the most deplorable facts in connection with our educational system that, in spite of the millions of money expended every year on elementary education, only a few miserable thousands of boys and girls are receiving education in the higher standards. Is it not natural when we find a sum approaching £250,000 is to be given to these schools as a sort of wind-fall, which they never expected and have no right or claim to, that we should press the right hon. Gentleman to insert a provision in this Bill that this large sum shall be utilised for increasing the educational efficiency of the schools? During the discussions that have taken place on this Bill I have looked through the Reports issued by the Inspectors for several years past, and, without wishing to weary the House, I will ask leave to read one or two short extracts to show that the Inspectors who come into actual contact with the details of this educational system are quite alive to this fact. The Inspector for the Eastern Division of England (Mr. Smith) says—

"The great problem, it seems to me, is how to secure to our children on leaving school the instruction, admirable as far as it goes, which they have attained. It is lamentable to notice the difference between the boy of 11 or 12 years when he is turned out of school as a finished article and the lout of 15 or 16 when one meets him very rarely in a night-school. Polish, manners, often, I fear, morals—all gone; he is a complete contrast in his dull, dense, deadened faculties to the bright, sharp lad with eager eye and hand outstretched scarcely to be restrained from answering every question before his turn whom one remembers only a few years ago."

Sir, we have £250,000 of public money which can be earmarked for the special purpose of increasing the efficiency of the schools, but we see that the vast majority of the children, especially in the rural districts, leave the schools at the age of 12 or 13, and have no further educational advantages whatever. The right hon. Gentleman may ask me, how do you expect to confer the benefits of continued education on these children? I think the Amendment of my hon. Friend makes it easy to do this. Take an ordinary country school well started and well conducted with a surplus of £50 or £60. Surely a part of that sum could be devoted to the object of enhancing the work of the school. It might be utilised for the purpose of starting an evening school, or for the teaching of specific subjects. Suppose the case of a number of schools, say five or six, with a surplus of £5 each in a particular district. By organising and grouping those schools you may employ a peripatetic teacher, who would go to each of them imparting the instruction that might be required. I would remind the House that, speaking at a Conference of the Society of Arts on 15th of December, 1890, in the presence of a large number of the ablest educationalists of this country, the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council made these very sage and wise remarks—

"To my mind, the only practical way in which to carry on agricultural teaching is to have a central system. You must, I think, group together different villages and different schools, and have peripatetic teachers. If you do this you will find that the extra cost to school managers on the one hand and to the rate-payers on the other would be very small indeed, and yet you will be able to carry out in excellent system of agricultural education."

But I say that, unless the right hon. Gentleman accepts this Amendment, the present Bill, so far from being used for the organisation of schools with a system of peripatetic teaching, will merely operate in the relief of local contributions; whereas, if the Amendment be accepted, instead of shovelling out money to relieve subscribers, he will be starting a system of much-needed education whereby he will be enabled to stimulate local effort. I wish here to make a special point with regard to Wales in reference to the question of evening schools, and, in doing so, will quote one sentence from the Report of Mr. Watts, one of Her Majesty's Inspectors in Wales

—the Inspector for the Carnarvon District, who, speaking on the question of evening schools, says—

“I hope, notwithstanding that the day is not far distant when the peculiar facilities which this district physically and otherwise affords for the study of natural science, will suggest the formation of evening classes for instruction in agricultural chemistry, geology, and navigation.”

In Wales there is special need for these evening schools. Until lately, the language of the people—the language used by them in their homes and in public worship—was proscribed in all the public schools. It was the right hon. Gentleman who first admitted this, and inserted provisions in the Code which will have the effect of revolutionising that system. But I say that that is not enough; we ought to do something to remedy the injurious effects already produced by that system on the education of Wales. The result of the proscription I have referred to was that, although the teachers were at first able to secure favourable results, yet so artificial, automatic, and unnatural was the method of teaching the children in a language they did not understand that it will be long before its effects will be wiped away. I say, then, that when we are giving so much money under this Bill, we ought to do something to repair this state of things—something to compensate the children for the immense and incalculable loss they have hitherto sustained. But there is another point on which education can be immensely improved by means of this surplus grant. The surplus of the grant will be about £250,000, and Wales will have about £20,000. Now, in answering a question I put to him to-day, the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President seemed to cast a doubt on the value of the advanced or high-grade schools in Wales, and suggested that the work would be better done in the secondary schools. Let me call attention to the fallacy, the mistake in the suggestion.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: No; I only indicated an alternative. I suggested that the excess of income might be applied to establishing evening schools, or to higher elementary education.

*MR. T. ELLIS: I am glad the right hon. Gentleman admitted the necessity for increasing higher-grade schools, and

by adopting this proposal much would be done under this Act. In the towns of North Wales—in such towns as Ruabon, in the coal districts, in Glamorganshire, in Monmouthshire, and other industrial centres—it would be possible to establish higher-grade schools, to which would be drawn the pick of the boys and girls from all the elementary schools in the district. You may say that these boys and girls should go to the secondary schools, but the aim of educationalists in Wales is not to diminish the use of these schools, but to utilise them to prepare children for special and technical education. Where these exist you could give a higher education to the more promising children. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman ought to take an interest in this matter. There is nothing in the official career of the right hon. Gentleman of which he is more justly proud than that he has established technical education and helped to pass the Welsh Intermediate Schools Act. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman now to increase the number of scholars by establishing higher-grade schools and evening schools. I will not refer to the question of agricultural schools—my hon. Friend has referred to that part of the subject—but let me say a word on the question of organisation of schools. By a very small amendment in the proposal of my hon. Friend you might draw up a scheme for the grouping of schools in a district for the disposal of the surplus. In this grouping there would be an opportunity for organisation and for using the surplus to the best purpose. I can understand that one objection that will be brought is that in many cases the surplus is so small as to be inappreciable. Then I say that, by a scheme comprised in two lines, the small surplus could go to increasing the efficiency of the present day schools; but if the surplus is appreciable, the school managers ought to be called upon to draw up a scheme to be submitted to the Education Department, which could approve or amend it. Another objection will, no doubt, be urged to this Amendment, that it sets up different tests for different schools, but I think this is a very small objection. I have dealt with the argument that we are under no kind of bargain with the schools which will get this money that it is a reward for services in the past, and we may quite fairly ask that it shall be used for educational purposes. There is nothing in the objection that we are applying different tests to different schools. The only value it has, if any, is that it means that we are placing upon a certain set of schools the duty of levelling up. The first duty of a Minister of Education ought to be to raise the level of the best schools, and the next to try to bring the inferior schools to the level of the superior. Here is an opportunity, with this £250,000, to raise the level of half the schools of England and Wales. This Amendment will have no prejudicial effect upon the forward schools, but it will have a stimulating effect upon backward schools. The first, last, and middle argument of the right hon. Gentleman is that all this can be done by the present Code. But the fact is, there must be some special provision if we are to deal with a special class of schools. The Code cannot deal with this surplus. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of education generally, and especially of education in Wales, to make the concession we ask for.

(9.15.) MR. CROSS (Liverpool, West Derby): It seems to me the hon. Gentleman's Amendment is not quite consistent with the object of the Bill, and, further, the Amendment he proposes is to be carried out at other peoples' expense. The existence of the surplus depends entirely upon the continuance to the voluntary schools of the voluntary subscriptions; if the donors do not agree to continue them there will be no surplus. The only principle upon which the Government fixes upon 10s. as the amount of the fee grant is by going upon the average, and when we go upon the average we must take into account places where fees are low as well as where they are high. I hope, as the Government have taken the principle of average, they will stick to it and resist the Amendment. I do not see the force of the objection urged against relieving the rates or the subscribers whose resources have been taxed in the past. Nor do I see why, when the Government propose to relieve the parents of fees and to make a grant to the locality, those who have borne the heat and the burden of the day in time past should not, to some extent, reap the benefit of the Bill.

*(9.18.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): The speech we have just heard supplies abundant proof of the necessity for the Amendment. It shows that, in his opinion, the surplus grant beyond the fees would be used for the purpose of reducing rates and subscriptions. This seems to be a view which is largely taken by persons who are connected with the voluntary schools. Before the Vice President rises I wish to add a few words to the forcible speeches of my hon. Friends who have put the Welsh point of view, for I have experience of a rural district where this question is equally important. This is the last opportunity we shall have of doing something in the clauses of this Bill for the promotion of education. As the Bill stands it does nothing for education. The Bill confers an enormous boon upon the parents of children at school, and it will confer great benefit on schools; but the Bill does nothing for securing better education. There will be a surplus of something like £300,000 arising from the substitution of this fee grant for the fees paid hitherto, but we have no security that the efficiency of the schools will be increased. The hon. Member for the Bordesley Division said a few nights ago that there was a question affecting Board schools as well as voluntary schools. He spoke of the system of rigid economy pursued by some School Boards in the South of England, and I quite admit that this matter equally concerns voluntary and Board schools. I have within my personal knowledge a case of such rigid economy being practised to the extent that the School Board determined to dismiss their schoolmaster, who had carried the school to an extraordinary pitch of efficiency — bettering his own position at the same time — in order to save £30 a year. Though the Board did yield to the strong public feeling excited, and the petition I was instrumental in getting numerously signed, and did not actually dismiss the schoolmaster, he was so worried and disgusted by the affair that he sent in his resignation, and a new schoolmaster was appointed at a salary less by £30. I find that the effect of this Bill will be to give a grant to this school of exactly £30 a year in excess of its present fees. I have no confidence whatever that this £30 will be spent in increasing the efficiency of the school. It should be made known in the clearest manner to managers, Inspectors, and others that the excess which may accrue to the school should be really used for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the school. I contend that it is greatly in the interest of the voluntary schools that this Amendment should be inserted. If the increased grant which is given to the schools is not used for the purpose of increasing the efficiency, but for the purpose of enabling a reduction of subscriptions to be made, then the number of schools which will be able to get on without any subscriptions at all will be enormously increased; and, therefore, just as in proportion as those schools increase so will the danger to the voluntary system grow.

*(9.29.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): The wording of the Amendment is ungrammatical, not to say nonsensical, and I do not think that it will accomplish what hon. Gentlemen expect from it. But apart from verbal criticism, I do not see how you can by this means provide that the money shall not be applied to the reduction of subscriptions. But there is something to be said even in favour of that point of view. One result of this Act will be that in future School Board schools will be entirely free. That can only be brought about by a considerable increase of the rates; and in the districts where the voluntary schools and the School Board schools exist side by side, the people who are supporting the voluntary schools will find their pockets taxed far more than they have been in the past in order that the children in School Board schools may get their education free. If, then, the Bill takes money out of one of their pockets, it is but fair that it should put something into the other. The keenness of competition will ensure that the money received by the voluntary schools will be spent in increasing their efficiency. It is a great mistake to impute blame to those schools that maintain a high degree of efficiency with small or with no voluntary subscriptions at all, for it must be remembered that the managers are responsible for all the expenses of the schools; and that if they do not manage them economically, they will have to pay all the additional expenses requisite. If they are able, by economical management, to make their schools efficient, and avoid a deficit, why should we throw stones at them on account of that economical management? It is because they are answerable for extra expenses that the extra expenses are small. Credit is due to them for obtaining good results with economical expenditure, especially when we see around us examples of lavish expenditure without securing good results. The Education Department has it in its power to secure the efficiency of all public elementary schools. The Inspectors will have to go round and see that the schools meet all the requirements of the Education Department; and, if that is so, what reason is there for demanding more? If the schools have not been up to the mark why is it? It is because the Inspectors, finding them in poor neighbourhoods, with very limited resources, have been lenient to them; but this leniency will not be extended to them in the future. Under this Bill they will be in receipt of more money, and the Inspectors will insist on their being made more efficient. I think the House will be well advised to let well alone, and will be unwise to hamper managers in the way proposed by the supporters of the Amendment.

(9.35.) MR. PICTON: The hon. Member has given rather a dark picture of the present state of efficiency of the voluntary schools, and I suppose he must be taken as having had considerable experience of the working of the Elementary Education Act. He has based his objection to the Second Reading of this clause on what are really only verbal difficulties.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: We are not upon the Second Reading of the clause, but upon an Amendment.

MR. PICTON: At any rate, the objections the hon. Member raises can be removed by Amendments. The main principle we are discussing in the Amendment is that any surplus arising from the fee grant ought to be devoted to the purpose of educational improvement. Now, I should like to know whether the right hon. Baronet the Vice President of the Council or the Government generally deny that there is likely to be a surplus in a considerable number of cases? Undoubtedly there will be a surplus in many cases. Well, what is to be done with that surplus? Something should be done with it. Does the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council hold that it would be right to make use of the surplus in such a way as to reduce the necessity for subscriptions? I cannot think that the right hon. Gentleman entertains such an idea. Then to what purpose does he propose that the surplus shall be devoted? Surely there can be no better application of it than in the improvement of educational appliances and results. The hon. Member for Stockport has said: "If you obtain efficiency, what more can you want?" Those who put that question forget that efficiency is a constantly growing quantity. What was regarded as efficiency 10 years ago is not regarded as efficiency now, and what is regarded as efficiency now will not be considered efficiency 10 years hence. We wish in supporting this clause to have an eye to the future, and to secure that we shall have the resources for obtaining that improvement to which we all look forward. But it is possible that, if the surplus is not taken advantage of to reduce subscriptions, it will be used to defray Church expenses, Sunday school expenses, and the cost of Sunday school treats. Expenditure for such objects out of the funds of elementary denominational schools is not unknown at the present day. For example, the accounts of the schools connected with St. Augustine, Kilburn, as published by the Rev. R. C. Kirkpatrick, vicar, in the Parish Magazine, show that a sum of £40 was spent in this way in the year 1889. The voluntary subscriptions towards these schools amount to £102, whilst the expenditure is £1,701. I find in the Parish Magazine, in a statement of accounts, the following items — Sunday school expenses, deficit on treats £26 12s. 9d., and expenses of parish house — whatever that may be — £16 8s. 8d. Well, Sir, here is the whole case. What guarantee is there that the surplus of the fee grants will not be devoted to similar purposes? I think we are justified in asking for some guarantee that this money, coming direct from the Public Exchequer, shall not be spent for purposes of this kind.

*(9.41.) SIR W. HART DYKE: So far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned this Amendment certainly does not break fresh ground, for a great deal has been said about this subject in Committee. I have very little in the shape of new argument to add to what I have already said. I cannot get over this, that whatever may be the intentions of the framers of the Amendment, yet there is not in any part of it a power to insure the efficiency of schools. This efficiency was, as a matter of fact, provided for under the Code, which lays down that a school must be efficient to secure the grant. The hon. Member for Merioneth expressed a hope that I would not adduce the Code as an argument in answer to the appeal now made. But it is necessary to refer to the Code, as there, and there alone—for they are not in any Act of Parliament—are laid down the penal consequences of inefficiency. I have given assurances again and again, that whenever and wherever there is a surplus over the fee grant, that in the case of an inefficient school, it shall be at once applied to increasing the efficiency of the school, and bringing it up to a proper level. This Amendment is again a direct challenge as to the future action of the Education Department in dealing with this class of schools. The question has been asked again and again in debate, as to whether or not the Department will do their duty in the future and secure the efficiency of the schools; and it has been hinted that the Code is not a sufficient instrument for enabling them to do this. Well, I should like to point out what the instructions to the Inspectors under the Code of 1891 are. The Code says that in the case of the less efficient schools, unless improvement is made, the whole grant may be withheld. Through the Code itself, and through the instructions given to the Inspectors, penal consequences must be incurred by these schools if they are not efficient. It has been said that where the fees are low and there are no subscriptions, or scarcely any subscriptions, it is injurious to the cause of education that the school should continue to exist. In reply to that, I maintain that it is impossible for such schools to exist at the present moment. This Amendment is either mandatory in its character or it is not. If it is merely declaratory it is not worth much, but even if it does command something, what more effect could it have as regards the operations of the Education Department than that which will be produced by the measure as it now stands before the House. The Education Department, and all those who guide its destinies, are pledged, under the Code of 1891, that there shall be efficient schools. It is true that it is impossible that all these schools can be brought up to a standard of efficiency at once, but after the year's notice has expired the provision of the Code will in every case be enforced. The Amendment proposes that the surplus shall be applied for such educational purposes and in such manner as may be approved by the Education Department, and for that purpose the managers of the school shall immediately on this Act coming into operation submit to the Department a scheme for the application of the said surplus. I assert that this is putting the cart before the horse. It seems to me that it is for the Education Department, through its Inspectors, to say by what means the efficiency of a school shall be secured. We have inserted in the Code a special requirement in view of the passing of the Bill. It is thereby provided that after September 1, 1892, every school shall teach a class subject. That provision was placed in the Code with the special object of dealing in the future with the demand made on those weak schools which have not yet come up to the proper standard. The mover and seconder of the Amendment have laid the greatest stress on the subject of agricultural education; but here in the Code there is the very best possible scheme for dealing with this extra or class subject. The surplus can be spent under the supervision of the Department by employing a teacher to go round to various schools and teach agriculture.

MR. T. ELLIS: Will the right hon. Gentleman insist that it shall be so spent?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: Yes, Sir; the Education Department must insist that it shall be so spent. The Amendment as it is now drafted will bring the managers of these schools, however anxious they may be to carry out a scheme of this kind, into direct conflict and collision with the Education Department, which has here in the Code as complete a scheme for dealing with the question as could possibly be devised. I have been met again and again with the statement that some provision ought to be inserted in the Act of Parliament in order to insure that it will be carried out. I cannot see the necessity for any such provision, as I believe it to be impossible for the Department, looking at all the circumstances of the case, to neglect its duty in regard to these special class subjects. The hon. Member for Merioneth has challenged me to say whether I think there is not a general demand for increased efficiency in our schools in regard to the higher standards. All I can say is that in Standard IV. the scholars have been steadily increasing year by year, ever since I have been at the Education Department. The hon. Member has also asked how far the surplus may be applied, particularly in Wales, to the improvement of evening schools. My reply is that where the elementary day schools in Wales are in a state of efficiency, I see no objection to a portion of the surplus being applied to the improvement of the evening schools. As far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned they are unable to accept the Amendment, because they believe that all demands which may fairly be made upon the management of schools in the receipt of this grant will be met to the very utmost extent by the Department, and that the efficiency of these schools will be absolutely secured.

(9.56.) MR. JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street): I confess I have failed to gather from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman one solid argument why this clause should not be accepted. After listening to the speeches of the mover and seconder of the Amendment, I am of opinion that their case is quite unanswerable. The right hon. Gentleman made no attempt to deal with the principal question at issue. He went round and round the main point, and never attempted to give any solid reason whatever why public money voted for educational purposes from the Imperial Exchequer should not be applied directly and exclusively to such purposes. He said he had power under the Code to deal with the matter, but he did not say he had power under the Code to deal with the main question. Suppose a school which receives a fee grant under this Bill should, instead of utilising any surplus there may be for increasing the efficiency of the teaching, use it to decrease the subscriptions it receives, what can be done under the Code to prevent it? The ingenuous Member (Mr. W. H. Cross) who spoke opposite, really let the cat out of the bag. He seemed to think that those who had borne the burden of the day, as he called it, in educational matters in our rural districts ought to have some relief under this Bill, and I think it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to give them some relief. In the County of Durham I believe most of the miners would be anxious to see that the surplus is really used for educational purposes. Her Majesty's Government has no right whatever to take the money of the Imperial taxpayer and devote it to the relief of those who are contributing towards the cost of our voluntary schools. I believe there is a strong desire among the mining population to have an opportunity of qualifying themselves for the positions of managers of mines. I know that in many districts there is a strong wish to have higher grade schools. I think that any surplus might be used in support of University extension. The Vice President has expressed his desire that the surplus should go to secure increased efficiency of education; I hope, therefore, that he will reconsider his decision as to this Amendment, for I think it is incumbent on Her Majesty's Government to see that any surplus which exists is applied to educational purposes, and is not used simply to relieve the pockets of the friends of denominational schools. The Government have refused to give public control over these schools, but I warn them that when the Liberals get into power pressure will be used to secure that control.

*(10.5.) MR. F. S. POWELL: I do not think there is any reason to fear that the effect of this Act will be to place money in the pockets of the subscribers to voluntary schools. For many years I have taken an active part in the distribution of funds entrusted to the National Society, and I have found that week after week and month after month applications are made to the executive, with a view, not to diminish local subscriptions, but to add to local efficiency. There are many cases where we have been asked to make grants for repairs, and I have no doubt that sums which will be placed in the hands of managers under this measure will be expended most wisely in improving the buildings and their sanitary condition, as well as in the provision of books, the increase of salaries, the widening of the curriculum, and the strengthening of the teaching staff. I object to the Amendment because of the increased power it gives to the Education Department. I am not anxious to increase the power of the Education Department except under the control of Parliament. Again, I hold that this scheme is too rigid. Our system of education advances day by day, and the adoption of such a scheme as this would cause it to lag behind. Therefore, I think it would be far wiser and better to leave the managers of schools to themselves, and allow them greater freedom of action. I believe myself that this Government Bill will do much to advance the cause of education, but if it is to be effective you must not tie the hands of school managers; you must allow them to do what is necessary to supply the requirements of their particular locality.

*(10.12.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR: The speech of my hon. Friend is one of the best that could be made on behalf of the Amendment. He has explained the objects to which the surplus will be applied, and they are the objects we seek to attain. The hon. Member objects to the Department getting increased power and not being subject to Parliament, and the Amendment asks for Parliamentary authority that all the surplus shall be used for the educational purposes he described. I, therefore, hope that we shall have his support in the Lobby. I maintain that the Opposition are justified in bringing forward this subject on Report, bearing in mind the position in which it was left in Committee. On other points the Government carried their views and their clauses with triumphant majorities of 70 and 80, and in some cases of 100; but when it was pointed out that there was nothing in the Bill to cause the surplus to be used for the increased efficiency of education their majority fell to 24, and even the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who was probably the chief author of this Bill—[Cries of "No, no!"—]—went against them. At any rate, the right hon. Gentleman has been the chief promoter of free education. Therefore the Government got a strong hint that in this question at least they were not in accord with the general feeling of the House. What are the purposes of the Government in this Bill? They are only two. First, to have free education; and the next to lower the fees in voluntary schools. I believe the Government will repudiate the idea that they have any other motive, but all their supporters do not repudiate that. There is one man who has been very much at the back of the north wind. I refer to Lord Sandford, who for a long time was Secretary to the Education Department, and who is justly consulted by gentlemen opposite upon educational matters. Speaking at a meeting of the National Society on the 16th June, he said that the surplus must be employed to lessen the heavy burden of voluntary contributions. The noble Lord on that occasion told us something which we did not know. He asked—

"What right have the Government to impose an extra burden upon voluntary schools; to insist upon the teachers having first-class certificates, and upon two class subjects being necessarily introduced, as has been proposed."

That shows what was in the mind of the Government at the time this Bill was being framed. Then the noble Lord goes on—

Sir L. Playfair

"No. We are not going to allow the Government to do this. The surplus must be applied to lessen the heavy burden of voluntary contributions. The supporters of voluntary schools will have to subscribe quite enough to keep the schools going as it is. They have hitherto been subscribing far too much, and, therefore, I claim for them that they should share the benefit of the 10s. fee grant."

These were the words of one of the greatest educational authorities, and one of the warmest supporters of voluntary schools in this country.

MR. ADDISON: Where was that speech reported?

*SIR L. PLAYFAIR: In the School Guardian of June 20, 1891. This is a distinct announcement that this surplus is to be used, not for the efficiency of education, but for the reduction of voluntary subscriptions. I quite agree that that is not the view of the Government. Their object, no doubt, is to free education when it is possible, and to reduce the fees where the school cannot be made free. I think, however, we have a right to be alarmed when we are told by Lord Sandford that the surplus will be used to prevent the need of voluntary subscriptions. The First Lord of the Admiralty told us that by some prophetic instinct the Government, when it drafted the Code of 1890, had this Bill in its mind. But there is nothing whatever in the Code in regard to the subject before us, and we want to provide that this surplus, when granted on September 1, shall be earmarked as being devoted to the increased efficiency of the schools by Act of Parliament. We want to do what Article 92 of the Code says has been done in other cases by special conditions in Acts of Parliament. We wish to lay down this condition—that the surplus over the whole fees shall not be used for improper purposes nor for paying back voluntary subscriptions, but for the purpose of promoting the efficiency of the schools. I may instance the Jewish school. In that school there are 3,300 scholars, some of whom pay a small fee, but the bulk of whom are educated free. That school will, under this Bill, have a surplus of over a £1,000. What is to be done with it? The Jews do not wish to be relieved of their subscriptions, for they have always shown greater liberality than any other voluntary contributors. The Jews even subscribe to give the children a meal of bread and milk in the middle of the school course, so that the strength of the child may be kept up while it is being educated. What will they do with the money? No doubt, if the surplus had to be devoted to increased efficiency of education, they would at once frame an admirable scheme of scholarships to higher grade schools. But the Government by this Bill are giving them this money, and suggesting to them to pay back the voluntary subscriptions. It has been said—and truly so—that this Amendment is much more in the interest of voluntary schools than of Board schools. No doubt voluntary schools in rural districts will be greatly assisted, but we must not forget that Mr. W. E. Forster, in 1870, said that voluntary schools could not continue unless they had a considerable amount of voluntary subscriptions. The Royal Commission said the same. But the fact is that 3,000 or 4,000 voluntary schools will in future be worked solely by means of the Government grant and have no voluntary subscriptions. They will thus become State schools supported by State funds. If the House wishes to support voluntary schools, it will pass this Amendment, and will thus secure increased efficiency in the schools. I know of nothing more calculated to do harm to the voluntary system than to allow the surplus to go in reduction of voluntary subscriptions.

(10.30.) MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I assume that the Government intend that this money shall be applied in the improvement of education, but I am persuaded that they are not taking the proper steps to carry their intention into effect. I fear that before they can interfere to prevent it, evil will be done by the Bill in the shape of a diminution of subscriptions and a reduction of the rates. The Vice President says he will take care, by means of the operation of the Code, that the large sums now being voted by Parliament in aid of education shall go to the purposes of education, but it must be remembered that the people whom you want to prevent taking another or an opposite course will not read the right hon. Gentleman's speeches, and will know very little about them. It is not places like Birmingham that will require any stimulus in this matter. Well as the voluntary schools in such places have done their work, they will be the very schools which will take advantage of this increased grant to improve the education given by them. Those whom it is necessary to teach are the people in rural districts, who care and think little about education. In rural districts education is most backward, and the subscriptions to the voluntary schools have been raised with very great difficulty, and will be retained with great difficulty by the clergymen of the parishes and the few people concerned in education. A provision such as that suggested is required in those small outlying School Board districts of Merioneth and other counties, where money is not spent in a way to give the greatest advantage, and where the feeling for education is not very strong. When this Bill passes subscribers to voluntary schools in rural districts will find that the schools they have hitherto supported are in receipt of a large excess of funds, and they will say, "Why should we go on subscribing?" I ask hon. Members to recollect that when once they have buttoned up the pockets of the subscribers they will find it very difficult to unbutton them again. And also in the case of School Boards, when the rates have been reduced it will be found uncommonly difficult to increase them again. How are you going to meet such a state of things? [*Sir W. HART DYKE: By taking away the grant.] But you are not going to take away the grant in a hurry. Will the Department be allowed just before a General Election to take away the grant? I feel there is only one way in which you can practically prevent the evil feared, and that is by showing in the Bill itself that the Bill is meant to be an Education Bill, and not a Relief Bill. I assert without the smallest feeling of doubt that if you once allow voluntary schools to deteriorate instead of improve their system of education, they are inevitably doomed to extinction. I appeal to the supporters of voluntary schools to prevent such a state of things by making it clear that by this Act it is intended there shall be an improvement in the education given.

(10.38.) The House divided:—Ayes 93; Noes 143.—(Div. List, No. 335.)

*(10.48.) MR. LLOYD-MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): I beg to move to add at the end of the clause—

“(4.) Except in schools under the control or management of a School Board, no fee grant shall be paid to any school of which at least one-sixth of the total expenditure is not met by voluntary contribution.”

The effect of the Amendment is that where there is no public control no fee grant will be paid unless one-sixth of the total expenditure is subscribed voluntarily. In recent years the tendency has been for the subscriptions towards the support of voluntary schools to diminish, and the grant given by Parliament to increase. Voluntary schools now rely to a very great extent on the grant given by the Education Department. There are 1,176 schools in this country which are called voluntary schools, but which really have no voluntary subscriptions at all, and are supported entirely out of public funds and school fees. I propose that unless one-sixth of the total expenditure is obtained by means of voluntary subscriptions the schools shall not have the fee grant. I regard one-sixth as the minimum sum that ought to be contributed voluntarily if a school is to have this grant from Parliament. The question of control is an important one, and I think this is a fair way of raising it, although perhaps it is a somewhat late stage of the Bill at which to do so. In the case of School Boards you give control to the ratepayers, because they subscribe by means of the rates to the support of the schools, and you give the control of the voluntary schools to the subscribers, because they contribute by their subscriptions towards its support. That is an intelligible position to take up, but when you have divested these schools of every characteristic of a voluntary school, I cannot see why they should remain under the control of those who formerly supported them.

Mr Rathbone

Amendment proposed,

In page 1. line 26, at end of the clause, to add the words, “(4.) Except in schools under the control or management of a School Board, no fee grant shall be paid to any school of which at least one-sixth of the total expenditure is not met by voluntary contribution.”—(Mr. Lloyd Morgan.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

*(10.57.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I am unable to accept the Amendment, because the immediate result of it would be to prevent a large number of free schools from being opened. The hon. Member has referred to the case of a school where the subscriptions are very low, and there are scarcely any subscriptions. He has rather shadowed forth that such a school might exist on the fee grant. I believe that would be absolutely impossible if it was to remain efficient, and, therefore, such a school would have to raise its subscriptions or be struck out as inefficient. My belief is, that immediately the Bill becomes law there will be an automatic increase in the subscriptions of schools, and on that ground I submit that the House ought to rest satisfied with the new state of things which will be inaugurated.

MR. PICTON: The right hon. Gentleman has made some remarkable admissions in the course of this discussion, but I think none of them has been more remarkable than that contained in the words he has just uttered. He says the effect of adopting this Amendment would be that a considerable number of schools would be prevented from giving free education, so that it is evident that in those schools actually not one-sixth of the money required to support the school would be raised by voluntary contributions. I would like the right hon. Gentleman to define what he means by a voluntary school. We have heard the word “voluntary” ad nauseam during these Debates. Is a voluntary school one for the maintenance of which the whole expense is to be furnished by the public? Why, it reminds me of the story of the ancient knife, still considered a relic though blade and handle had been renewed. All the voluntary subscriptions are to be replaced by public contributions, and still the thing is called a voluntary school. I think Members on this side of the House are to blame for using the phrase "voluntary schools" instead of denominational schools, for they are this and nothing else. If the Government do not accept the Amendment, I hope nobody in future will be guilty of the misnomer of calling these voluntary schools, for, as I have said more than once, the Government are engaged in demolishing the voluntary principle altogether. I cannot understand upon what principle the Government object to this Amendment, unless they have that object in view. I hope the motion will be carried to Division.

(11.1.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): The right hon. Gentleman has stated that the result of adopting this Amendment would be to prevent the opening of a large number of free schools, so that it may be inferred that, in his opinion, there are a large number of parishes where there are not a sufficient number of subscribers to voluntary schools to contribute a sixth of the expenditure.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: That was not what I said.

MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: If the result should be that schools do not become free in large numbers, it will be because subscriptions do not amount to a sixth of the expenditure, and then, under this provision, free schools would have to be built; and if free schools have to be established under the procedure of the Act, then the voluntary schools have been a failure. If voluntary schools are to be perpetuated as a system, I urge this Amendment as a strong step towards that perpetuation, for if the result should not be that which the right hon. Gentleman has prophesied, but the reverse, if in the result it should be found that a sixth of the expenditure is provided by voluntary subscriptions (and I have sufficient faith in the supporters of the system in country districts that rather than see the schools abolished they would subscribe to this extent), then there would be the greatest justification for the continuance of the system. Failing this, the voluntary system must be swept away. I submit, therefore, that the Amendment is in the interest of the voluntary system, for it would stimulate subscriptions to the extent of a sixth of the expenditure.

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

(11.6.) The House divided:—Ayes 90; Noes 159.—(Div. List, No. 336.)

(11.15.) MR. T. ELLIS rose to move an Amendment to provide that the Education Department should report annually the amount of the fee grant to each school, together with the amount of rates and subscriptions.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Before the hon. Member proceeds to move his Amendment, may I make an appeal to him? I have undertaken that this information shall be given in the form of a Return, if not in the annual Report; and I hope, therefore, he will not insist upon inserting this as a statutory provision. It is quite unusual to do so. I also ask Members to consider the hour of the night at which we have arrived, and the general desire there is that we should conclude this stage of the Bill to-night. I believe there are only one or two questions upon which difference of opinion exists, and, if it is thought necessary, we might take Divisions; but I think, after the discussions we have had, there should be nothing to prevent our finishing the Report to-night.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I am sure there is a feeling on both sides of the House in favour of concluding the Debate to-night, and I think the discussion this evening has been of a most practical character. There is one obstacle in the way of closing the Debate to-night—

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): On a point of order, Sir, I wish to know what is the Motion before the House?

*MR. SPEAKER: There is no Motion before the House; the right hon. Gentleman interposed before the Amendment was moved.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: There is only one obstacle, and that is the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman to Clause 3, to substitute "or" for "and," which I must say we look upon as going back from a solemn Parliamentary engagement entered into before the House.

MR. T. ELLIS: I am quite satisfied with the reply of the right hon. Gentleman. I hope he will include the income from fees?

2 B

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We will give all the information in our power.

(11.17.) MR. W. H. CROSS: After the appeal made by the right hon. Gentleman, I will not detain the House many moments in moving my Amendment, and I hope it will be accepted. The effect of the Amendment in Clause 2 in the second line would be that the power of raising fees in future would not be limited by the amount received in the past, but by the amount charged by the managers, whether received or remitted. As the words now stand, those schools which have been most liberal in making remissions will suffer most from the loss of power to raise fees in the future. I know hon. Gentlemen opposite object to the raising of fees, but still, if they are to be levied at all, I do not see why we should penalise those schools whose managers have been most generous in past remissions; we should give them all the advantage we can. My Amendment does not propose any additional charge on the Imperial Exchequer; it only means a very small increase of fee in certain schools where it may be of the greatest value to the school. The right hon. Gentleman may tell me that the Department does not know how these amounts have been charged or remitted, but I am sure this can easily be ascertained. There are several reasons why the Amendment should be accepted, but in deference to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman I will not take up time in arguing the question. I hope the Government will now be in a position to say they accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 2, after the word "received," to insert the words "or remitted."—(Mr. William Cross.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or remitted' be there inserted."

*(11.20.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I have gone carefully into this matter, and, having made inquiries, I find that the Department have no data on which to go in dealing with the question of remission of fees. We must be accurate in dealing with this Bill throughout, and it is impossible to indicate what was the precise amount of fees remitted. There would be no adequate guide because schools are in the habit of grading fees, and it is obvious that the smaller fees would be those remitted. I regret that I cannot accept the Amendment.

*MR. G. W. BALFOUR (Leeds, Central): I must confess I am greatly disappointed with the answer to which we have just listened. I think after what passed in Committee we had reason to expect something more than this. It is true that when my hon. Friend raised the point in Committee the right hon. Gentleman at first met the proposal with a negative, but afterwards, finding that it obtained sympathy and approval from the hon. Member for Poplar, he consented to consider it on Report, and I am, therefore, not a little disappointed that we should now receive nothing more than a departmental answer. The strongest arguments can be urged in favour of the Amendment. One of the principal reasons given in favour of free education was the hardship and humiliation to which parents were exposed who were too poor to pay the fees for their children, and had to have recourse to the Guardians. In a certain number of voluntary schools the managers have remitted these fees altogether, and for this generosity they are now to be penalised by the permanent loss of the fees thus remitted. I have never approved of the rigidity with which the schools that will still be allowed to charge fees are tied down to a precise amount of fee, which they must not exceed under pain of having the excess deducted from the fee grant. No necessity exists for such a provision, regard being had to Clause 3 of the Bill, which in effect allows all parents to claim free education for their children if they desire to do so. But by refusing to accept this Amendment my right hon. Friend goes further still. He practically imposes a special penalty on schools whose managers, by the remission of fees, have practised a generosity which is now to be so ungenerously requited. My right hon. Friend says the Department does not possess the data for calculating the fees thus remitted. But surely he will not say it is impossible to obtain them? Is he prepared to say the information cannot be obtained? I should have thought, indeed, the Department was in possession of it already, for we have Returns giving the different fees charged throughout all elementary schools in the country, and the percentages of children paying each rate of fee, together with the percentage of those whose fees are remitted; and it would seem to me that for the compilation of these tables the Department must be in possession of the data in question. In any case, I do not see any difficulty in obtaining the information. Once more I ask my right hon. Friend to consider the point, and see if he cannot do something to remove the painful feeling that has arisen among some of the most loyal supporters of the Government, that their representations have not been received with favour nor yet met by argument, but have been simply set aside in order to conciliate hon. Gentlemen opposite.

*(11.27.) MR. BARTLEY: I think we should not treat with undue haste this important matter. Nobody can say the Debate has been protracted by hon. Members on this side of the House. Scarcely a concession has been made on any point urged from this side, while every consideration has been given to Amendments moved by hon. Members opposite. This is a very moderate concession asked. The case has been very fairly put by the hon. Member for Leeds, who has just spoken. In many schools managers have met cases of poverty of parents by remitting fees, and have not insisted on an application to the Guardians, and this remission is to be perpetuated, to the disadvantage of those schools. It is no large sum concerned, and the Government might fairly make this concession. I may remind the Government that, although my Motion on the Second Reading received a very limited amount of support, yet not half the Members who sit on this side of the House voted for the Second Reading. There is evidence that there are many considerations of expected Amendments that have influenced the supporters of the Government to take a favourable view of the Bill, and I strongly urge the right hon. Gentleman to re-consider this matter.

(11.30.) The House divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 195.—(Div. List, No. 337.)

(11.42.) MR. TOMLINSON: I beg to move the Amendment in my name to Clause 2. The Vice President of the Council says that the Amendment he is about to move will settle the case. I am unwilling to detain the House under the circumstances, but I should be glad if he will assure the House that his Amendment will meet the point I have in view.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 17, at the end of Clause 2, to insert the words—" (3.) In reference to any school provided after the passing of this Act this section shall be read as if the first day of January after the completion of the first year during which the school has been carried on were substituted for the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one." —(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The Amendment I am about to move deals with this very point.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I beg to substitute the word "or" for "and" in line 25. An hon. Member moved in Committee the insertion of the words "owing to a change of population in the district," which were not printed on the Paper, and these words the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury accepted without fully appreciating their complete effect. They were moved in consequence of an explanation I gave as to the necessity for Clause 3, when I said that the clause was necessary to provide, among other things, for cases of shifting population. It will be necessary to substitute the word "or" for "and" so as not to limit the power of the Department to approve a charge or increase to those cases only where there has been a change of population. I did not quite appreciate the scope of the Amendment moved in Committee, but I have since gone very carefully into it, and I find that it would be impossible to carry out the Bill without the insertion of the word "or." I may be met by the argument that we ought at once to have appreciated the effect of the Amendment, and that we are now guilty of something like a change of front. ["Hear, hear!"] I rather anticipated that cheer, but I have stated how it was that the Amendment, moved in Committee, was accepted. Hon. Members opposite do not understand the scope of the clause. I have pointed out again and again that the clause is one that has been inserted to meet the requirements of the Education Department itself in the working of the Bill. This clause, as I have explained, is only intended to meet cases of emergency; and, unless this Amendment is agreed to, the Department will be debarred from acceding to perfectly legitimate applications of schools to increase their fees in order to make them higher grade schools, or such as to meet the altered circumstances of a district. The Amendment is also required to meet the case of newly-established schools where grant was not due on 1st January, 1891. I have had before me the cases of several School Boards who have been anxious to establish higher grade schools, and who have raised their fees from 2d. to 6d. and 9d. If this Amendment is not agreed to it will be impossible for this to be done.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 25, to leave out the word "and," and insert the word "or."—(Sir William Hart Dyke.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'and' stand part of the Bill."

(11.47.) MR. A. DYKE ACLAND: The right hon. Gentleman says that the hon. Member for Merionethshire suddenly sprung on him certain words that he did not understand in Committee. In the first speech the right hon. Gentleman made in explaining the sub-section he said it was designed to meet the case of localities where the population shifted, and accordingly the hon. Member for Somerset suggested an Amendment. The First Lord of the Admiralty touched on the same question of shifting population; the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division expressed a hope that the modifications suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds would be adopted, and a little later on, when the hon. Member for Sunderland proposed his words, the First Lord of the Treasury said the Government would be prepared to accept modifying words, and shortly after that he said he accepted the principle involved in the Amendment which was ultimately moved. Of course, it is open to the Government to re-consider the matter on Report; but it was said that the clause was framed to meet the case of shifting population exclusively. ["Hear, hear" and "No, no!"] Yes; we have been repeatedly told that that was so. At least 30 speeches have been made on the subject. The House is now brought back to where it was at the beginning of the Debate, and managers may be empowered to raise a 4d. fee to a 5d. fee, a 5d. fee to a 6d. fee, and so on. The managers will say: "Do let us raise the fee, and we will then get the efficiency you want out of the parents by raising a 3d. fee to 4d. or by turning a free school into a small fee school." I think we are justified in saying that we have not been fairly treated by the right hon. Gentleman.

(11.52.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I do not think my hon. Friend has at all fairly described this alteration. It is expected that our school system will develop, and cases will arise where School Boards and other bodies will be inclined to give education going beyond the scope of that which they now are empowered to give. Unless the word "or" be inserted, therefore, School Boards and school managers will be debarred from developing education in that direction. The House must consider the Amendment when taken in connection with the words "when it is for the educational benefit of the district." Those words govern the word "or," and unless the Amendment be adopted you will be putting a fetter on the development of our educational system.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I am not quite able to follow my hon. Friend in his last remarks. We believe that, unless this particular clause is very strictly limited, it will do a great deal to re-introduce the system of fee-paying schools, where it has been hoped to set up free schools. It is clear that the right hon. Gentleman has been "got at" by his hon. Friends sitting behind him. We all remember how the hon. Member for Wigan said the other night that the action of the Government had entirely shaken his confidence in them, or words to that effect. I do not think it is quite fair for the right hon. Gentleman to say this matter was sprung upon the Committee at the eleventh hour, because on the Second Reading he said deliberately, and no doubt after consultation with the Department, though perhaps not after consultation with the gentlemen who sit behind him, that it was intended to provide merely for shifting populations. We say it is not fair, it is not conducive to the interests of free education that the right hon. Gentleman should now go back on what he has proposed.

*MR. BARTLEY: I must say that I think hon. Members opposite are very ungrateful. They have had it all their own way hitherto, and it is too much to say that the Government have been "got at" by their own friends. If the Government has been "got at" this is the only occasion on which such a thing has occurred, but hon. Members opposite have "got at" the Government a great many times. I hope the Government will, for once, stick to the position they have taken up.

*(11.57.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I support the Amendment in the interests of higher education. The hon. Member for Bordesley has put it quite correctly. The clause expressly provides that the charge shall be only made if it is for the educational benefit of the district. But in that case why should it be confined to cases where the population has changed? The hon. Member for Rotherham objects that this will enable a free school to be turned into one where fees can be charged, but he overlooks the express provision in the clause that it can only come into operation in a district where there is already sufficient school accommodation without payment of fees. If such free schools exist why should a district be debarred from establishing a higher school?

Word "or" inserted.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to make an appeal to hon. Members who have Amendments on the Paper which I think are not of vital importance. If they withdraw those Amendments the questions involved are of a character which could be raised in another place. If they are not withdrawn, we cannot take the Third Reading until Thursday.

*MR. SUMMERS: I shall be glad to withdraw the Amendments which I have on the Paper.

*SIR L. PLAYFAIR: I think the suggestion is a very fair one considering that these Amendments are not of very great importance, and considering that any to which my hon. Friends attach importance could be moved in another place.

*MR. SPEAKER: If the Amendments are withdrawn I shall have to ask when the Third Reading is to be taken.

*MR. SUMMERS: I would like to know what the Government propose to do with regard to the question of the Schedule?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That is a matter which will be carefully gone into, with the view of securing the remission of fees so long as the necessity exists.

*MR. BARTLEY: On the point of the Third Reading, are we to understand distinctly that all the Amendments are withdrawn?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: They are all withdrawn.

RANGES [PAYMENTS].

Resolution reported—

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament for Army Services, of any sums required for the repayment, in certain cases, of money borrowed for the purchase of land under any Act of the present Session to facilitate the Acquisition of Ranges by Volunteer Corps and others."

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I would like it to be distinctly pointed out whether this Bill will include underground ranges and short ranges.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): If the hon. and gallant Gentleman refers to Clause 14 he will see that provision is made for artillery and rifle practice, and it is distinctly understood that underground and short ranges will be included.

COLONEL NOLAN: Perhaps the Financial Secretary will make inquiry on that point before passing the Bill through the House.

MR. BRODRICK: Certainly, but I have no doubt whatever about it.

Resolution agreed to.

RANGES BILL.—(No. 399.)

TRAINING COLLEGES (IRELAND) BILL.
(No. 391.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I do not feel disposed to oppose this Bill; but inasmuch as it gives to Ireland a principle of education which is somewhat novel, I think we ought to have some information with regard to it.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Was inaudible in the Gallery.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): (who was indistinctly heard) It is true that as the Bill is drawn there is no mention of furniture and fittings; that is a matter on which the Bill may be amended. On other points, also, I will take care that the drafting is made clear. It is not necessary for me to say anything upon the general scope of the Bill, because I have already made a public statement on that subject. In 1883 the late Government agreed to assist the training colleges for Presbyterian and Roman Catholic teachers, and it was arranged that two-thirds of the cost should be paid out of public funds. This did away with part of the grievance felt by the Catholics, but it was still felt that they were hampered in the competition with undenominational colleges, the whole cost of which was defrayed out of public funds, and hence it was felt necessary to go back to the old system. The Government are very anxious to remove what is felt to be a great grievance, although they cannot do all they desire to do.

(12.33.) COLONEL NOLAN: After the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman I hope the Bill will be allowed to pass.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I have no intention of opposing the Bill; but after the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, I may say that it may be necessary for me to take some action in Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

(No. 401.)

THIRD READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Sir W. Hart Dyke.)

*(12.25.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): Perhaps the House will allow me to say a few words upon this Bill, seeing that I was not able to make any general remarks upon it, either upon the Second Reading or upon the Instruction which was moved on the Motion for going into Committee. I think I shall express the entire sense of the House when I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir W. Hart Dyke) upon the straightforwardness and courtesy he has shown throughout the conduct of this difficult task. I have not been for so long a time, perhaps, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) an advocate of free schools. Probably I derived too strong an impression from what I saw in connection with the endowed schools to welcome free schools with much cordiality. The experiment in connection with endowed schools was a dismal failure. I have objected to free education because it seemed to me that it would involve a large draft upon the Public Purse of which I did not approve. That objection has now been removed by the action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who tells us that 1d. from the Income Tax will do all that is necessary. Another objection I had was that the tendency of free schools would be to render parents careless and indifferent, but I must admit that the conditions under which the endowed schools lived were very different from those under which school life in free schools will be conducted in the future; and, therefore, the arguments which I drew from the endowed schools will be very little applicable to free schools. I think there is now a fair prospect that none of the obstacles which formerly existed will continue to prevail. The logic which says that because the State imposes a duty upon the parent it is therefore bound to pay him for performing it, is not very good; but popular logic is often more effective than strict logic, and in the eyes of the people it has often seemed that they have some claim on the Government for relief. Consequently, if, in any way, this Bill, as I believe it will, removes from the minds of the people generally any obstacle in the way of sending their children to school, it will be welcomed as an excellent measure. But one is bound to consider what were the motives which actuated the Government in bringing in the Bill, and whether it will fulfil its title. As far as I can understand, the motives of the Government in bringing in the Bill were—first, to take out of the hands of the Liberals a proposal which was calculated to be popular in the country. The second motive was to safeguard the denominational schools. The title they have given to the measure is a Bill for assisting education in the elementary schools of England and Wales, but instead of that title being a true indication of its contents and character, I submit that it should have been styled a Bill for relieving parents from some payments and voluntary schools from some subscriptions. I failed to find throughout the progress of this measure that the Government have shown anything like a strong desire to come to the assistance of education, because over and over again they have refused Amendments designed to assist the cause of education. I may instance particularly that they refused to secure by the Bill that the denominational schools, for whose activity and success they profess to be so zealous, should be supported by a living body of subscribers interested in making them a real success. Curiously enough, one of those who urged that the voluntary schools should take the money of the State in aid solely of themselves was the hon. Member for the City of London, who perhaps, of all men in this House, has given in his lifetime one of the most noble endowments that were ever given to the cause of education.

No doubt it was an easy task for him to say what ought to be done in favour of voluntary subscribers, but, at the same time, I think that his practice is far better than his precept, and that he would do better to tell voluntary subscribers to do as he has done, and not do or say as he says. There was another proposal made by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) to secure some popular representation upon the Committees managing the schools, both in the country and in towns, which are supported by voluntary subscriptions. It is perfectly true that these schools, to a certain extent, are the result of voluntary subscriptions, and they remain as a monument of what can be done by voluntary efforts. But, at the same time, I maintain that when the Government are giving such an enormous grant as this from the Public Treasury to voluntary schools, they were bound to secure that there should be persons in the district acting on behalf of the public to see that the schools are well managed, and that it should not be left to a body of persons who built the schools in the past, and now support them with a modicum of subscriptions to receive enormous sums of public money without giving a full and complete account of them, and without security that the schools shall be managed in the interests of the public. The schools are not likely to be managed in the interests of the public as long as the public are excluded from a share in the management of them. The Government refused also a proposal to have a more efficient audit of the accounts, a matter which I look upon as of the utmost importance, seeing that something like 27s. out of every 36s. of the cost is contributed from the Imperial resources. Again, it was proposed on this side of the House that the school-rooms might be used for public purposes. They are not private property, but are held on trusts, either explicit or implicit, for public purposes—the purposes of education. When you have the State coming in and supporting, as well as to some extent assisting in building, the schools, I think the least we can demand is that they should be made available for all the public needs. The Government refused to accept that Amendment, and there was a further important Amendment which the Government also refused to accept. It was to the effect that the surplus in cases where the fee grant exceeded the amount of the school pence should be devoted entirely to educational purposes. The answer given by the Government was that this was provided for already by the Education Code. [Sir W. HART DYKE: Hear, hear!] Surely the Ministers and those who sit at their back must be aware that there is an enormous difference between accompanying a grant from the Public Treasury with specific instructions in an Act of Parliament marking the purposes for which the grant is to be used, and relying upon some expressions in the Code that may or may not be used according to the whim of the managers for the time being. All the Amendments moved from this side were directed to the improvement of education and making the grant the means of giving the public a wider interest in the schools which receive the grant, and seeing that better means are taken to secure proper management and control. We have been met by the argument that the denominational schools must be safeguarded, and it was supposed that all the Amendments which were submitted would do something to injure the position of denominational schools. I do not hold the same views as hon. Gentlemen opposite: probably I do not hold the same views as many who sit on my own side of the House, but it is a little strange to me to hear those who, like the noble Lord the Member for the Darwen Division (Viscount Cranborne), insist on fixed principles of religious teaching, and lay such stress upon them, condemn the religious instruction which is given in the School Boards, although quite willing to join with the heterogeneous religious instruction given in the various denominational schools. Provided that it is denominational and has a fixed principle of some sort they seem to think it matters very little what it is. Nay, hon. Members opposite seem to entertain a strange objection to the religious instruction which is given in the Board schools. I should like to remind the House that children from the age of 3 up to 14 are hardly capable of taking in all the points of theology and ecclesiastical doctrine which the school managers seek to impress upon them. They may be got from time to time to repeat with more or less intelligence the formulas taught them, but I am afraid that they understand very little of them. One hon. Member—I think the hon. Member for the Loughborough Division of Leicester—spoke of the distinction between Christians and nondescripts, describing as nondescripts the children who attend the Board schools. I may be permitted to say that, for my own part, whenever I hear these claims put forward on behalf of the denominational schools, I am reminded of the famous letter of Paul to the Corinthians, in which the Apostle, referring to those who said, “I am of Paul, I of Apollos, I of Cephas,” spoke in terms of the highest condemnation of divisions and contentions among Christians. I claim that, with very few exceptions, in this land we are all Christians—with one notable exception, of which I speak with the utmost respect—the Jews. In my opinion, it, is not only offensive, but utterly wrong and illogical to speak of the religious instruction given in Board schools—such as that of Manchester—as being in any way non-Christian. It is essentially Christian, and the children attending the Board schools are Christians—far more Christian, indeed, than those who lay stress on small differences, instead of urging men to follow the example and the teaching of our common Lord. I differ from them because their action tends to prevent common working in a common cause. I do not confine religion within the narrow area of so-called denominational instruction. Every attempt to relieve poverty and distress, and to cast out the evil spirits of ignorance and idleness, are better entitled to the name of religion than any instruction in metaphysics and ecclesiastical history. I do hope that this Bill, which will create some stir and ferment in the education of the people, and may disturb both the financial business and the general relations of elementary education throughout the country, will be worked with success, and that hon. Members who support the voluntary schools will seek to work out the problem of free education which now presents itself on friendly terms with the Board schools and with one another; and that they will endeavour so to conduct the education of the country that while full opportunity is given for religious teaching in all the schools, the primary duty of assisting the education of the younger portion of the community will be adequately discharged. There is one other aspect of the question which I desire to mention. We have here another instance of what has taken place within the last year or two under the control of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, the giving of large grants from the Public Treasury to be administered in the country. I regard such a policy with doubt and reluctance. I do not think it is a good thing to make grants even to the County Councils without giving them any control over the collection of the money or making them responsible for the application of it; but if there is danger in giving it to an elected body like the County Council, there is still greater danger in giving it to a large number of small bodies all over the country who are without proper representation or control. I think it is most important that we should decentralise as much as possible. This matter is peculiarly one of local importance, and it is best that it should be carried out under local supervision and supported as far as is possible by local taxation, the grants being administered by the localities themselves. Surely it is also desirable that we should go one step further in the direction of establishing District Councils. It is not enough to have given us County Councils, but we must have smaller Councils, and it is to these smaller Councils that I look for the establishment of a great system of decentralisation. I certainly desire to see, to a large extent, each district charged with the administration of education. I thank the House for the kindness and patience with which it has heard me, and I heartily hope that this Bill, whether it works for the advantage of one political party or the other, will work for the benefit of the children in our elementary schools.

*(12.45.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Before the Bill finally leaves this House I wish to say a few words in regard to it, although I do not intend to frighten the House by enlarging at any great length upon the question. I look upon the Bill on many accounts, educationally, socially, and financially, as wrong in principle, and I further regard it as a serious attack upon voluntary schools; but, unfortunately, the view which I and my friends take was utterly annihilated by the Division which took place, so that I am not encouraged to divide the House again. But I wish to remind my hon. Friends behind me that although we figured in small numbers in that Division the Division itself gave evidence of a fact which ought to weigh gravely with Her Majesty's Government, namely, that in the Division List the names of not one-half of the Conservative Members appeared as having voted for the Second Reading of the Bill. That is a matter upon which I for one rejoice, although I am fully aware that hon. Members opposite rejoice the other way. In passing through Committee the measure has undergone several important changes. The first point to which I wish to call attention now is, that the idea which lies at the foundation of this measure is that inasmuch as compulsion has been made the law of the land, and children are compelled to go to school, it is only right and proper that we should enable them to be taught for nothing. There is a certain amount of logic in this argument, but we threw it all over in the course of the debates. It was the foundation of the whole Bill when it was originally introduced, but it has been ignored since; and we provide now, as a material and vital point, that children under five years of age and over 14 shall have free education, although the law does not compel them to go to school. However, as all principles have been thrown to the winds, I voted for an increase of the maximum age, because I thought that if we are to have free schools we should keep the children there as long as possible, and that there should be no inducement to take them away. I should even have voted for an extension of the limit indefinitely so long as the parents choose to keep their children at school. We are now going to vote £2,250,000 for free education, and yet this Bill gives no sort of return for an increase of education to that extent. I very much regret that when the Bill was passing through Committee we did not put something into it to secure an educational return for this enormous outlay. To my mind we are going to pay not only the fees which are now received, but something more, and the position is so peculiar that I cannot imagine it will last long. As an educationalist I maintain that this is anything but a satisfactory result. Then, in regard to the 3rd clause, I must confess that I look upon it as a most unfortunate and disastrous one. It will inevitably give rise to agitation in all parts of the country against the voluntary schools. As a matter of fact they are not now voluntary schools at all, but simply denominational schools. It is of no use to quibble over names; since the Act of 1870 these schools have become not voluntary but denominational schools, and as denominational schools I am prepared to support them. Judging from the enthusiasm with which this Clause 3 was received on the other side of the House, I am satisfied that it will work immense mischief to the denominational schools. It will lead to agitation in every district and an unpleasant political and social agitation, and in the course of a few years the practical result will be to destroy a great number of the denominational schools. I know that for those hon. Members who are not within the charmed circle of official life, it is always an unpleasant thing to oppose the Government which they generally support in other matters. I have felt this strongly, but I must candidly confess that I have not at any moment been alarmed that any action we may have taken would be likely to damage the Government, seeing that they have so many allies on the other side. I had, therefore, no fear as to the result of our action on the fate of the Government. At the same time, I feel that it is most unpleasant to be compelled to take this decided opposition to a measure which has been brought in by Her Majesty's Government. It is only right that I should say we have never pledged ourselves to it, but that on the contrary, we have most emphatically pledged ourselves the other way. The disastrous state of the position is this. If what we say is correct, the Government are damaging their future prospects, and it will take pretty well our lifetime before we recover our position, while, if we are not correct, we shall be regarded as false prophets of evil. Many of my hon. Friends have told me that I am acting the part of a Cassandra in this matter, because I have ventured to prophecy great disaster and misfortune from the passing of this measure—a disaster so great that it will be like the fall of Troy. No doubt I feel that the disaster is great, and certainly, in my judgment, it somewhat resembles to our Party the fall of Troy in the time of Cassandra. But the House very well knows that, whatever happened, Cassandra was right in the prophecies she made. [An hon. MEMBER: She did no good!] An hon. Member says “She did no good.” That is quite true, and I am afraid that I shall do no good. Nevertheless, whatever she predicted came to pass. Why were her prophecies not believed? Let me remind the House of a line in Virgil—

“By the gods’ decree:

All heard, but none believed the prophecy.”

The gods, in this case, are the Government on the Front Bench, and it is by the decree of the Government that my hon. Friends have been blind and deaf to all warning, and refuse to listen to it. As I have been called Cassandra, I have taken the trouble to read up once more the classical tale, with greater ease I acknowledge in Dryden’s translation than in the original Latin. I think the Government are to be regarded as the gods who have turned a deaf ear to Cassandra’s prophecies. I think the story affords a curious and a serious omen for us. We have been besieged by our enemies, the Greeks, on the other side, but they have hitherto failed to get into our strong places. As a last resource, our enemies invented and built the wooden horse of free education for it. It is not our measure, but that of hon. Members on the opposite side, that we are passing. It is of no good to say that it is not so. I wish to give everybody his due. Our opponents then built the wooden horse of free education, and they loaded it with a destructive and treacherous cargo of secular schools, absence of parental responsibility, discouragement of self-reliance, and the annihilation of denominational schools. I should not have objected to this but for the extraordinary fact that we have been induced to admit this wooden horse within our own walls. In the case of Troy this result was brought about by a subtle and clever freak. We are told that it was Sinon who undertook to persuade Troy to admit the wooden horse. He said that it would be beneficial in every way, and that it would be dedicated, when it was got inside, to Minerva, who was the goddess of Wisdom, Literature, and Education. He said that this would not only appease the gods, but would turn away the anger of the gods from Troy (probably having in view the next election) and turn it on their enemies. May I ask if the modern Sinon is not the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). Has he not persuaded the Front Bench to receive the wooden horse in this instance? My conviction is that he is the man who has done it all, and that he is the man whose influence has been so all-powerful. We have all been convinced by his wisdom, and perhaps I may be allowed to quote a line or two from Dryden’s translation of Virgil, which are on all fours I think with the present position. What is it that Virgil says?

“All vote to admit the steed . . .

Some hoisting-levers, some the wheels prepare,

And fasten to the horse’s feet; the rest

With cables haul along the unwieldy beast.”

Well, my hon. Friends voted to admit the steed, and have helped to haul it along. They have become so enthusiastic that they compete with one another. Even the Junior Member for Stockport was found pushing the horse a little at the back. In the words of the poem—“Each on his fellow for assistance calls,” and so we now find hon. Members coming forward and saying that, in honest truth, they have had for a long time a sort of secret idea that free education was the right thing. Others, like the Member for South Islington, say now that ever since they stood for Parliament they have believed in free education, and yet others again have talked so enthusiastically on the subject that one would almost suppose that free education was drawn in literally with their mothers' milk. But like many of the qualities of their parents, their mothers especially, my hon. Friends have not thought of those things until maturity has passed, and old age has come upon them. This is exactly on all fours with our present position, and the result now is that we have reached the Third Reading of the Bill with all this enthusiastic support and—

"At length, the fatal fabric mounts the walls, Big with destruction."

That is the view I take of the position. We know perfectly well what was the result in Troy. We know that in Troy, the very night the wooden horse was brought in, and before it had been there 24 hours, the great city which had resisted, as we have resisted our opponents for years and years, was taken and destroyed. I venture to assert that the same sort of thing will happen with us. We have been deluded enough to believe that the horse of free education which we have admitted, is but a harmless hobby. But it is not so. It is as dangerous as that wooden horse of Troy, and we shall be as ruthlessly undeceived before long by the destruction of our denominational schools. I believe, to end as I began with the classic simile, that in the night of a not far distant future our "sacred city" of religious education, "built by hands divine," like the homes of the "Valiant heroes of the Trojan line," will be taken and destroyed by this measure of so-called free education, which we are now admitting, and that unnecessarily, though perhaps unwittingly admitting, at the dictation of the modern Sinon, in spite of the warning of 10,000 Cassandras, within the hitherto impregnable stronghold of religious education.

(1.5.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): We have listened to a very amusing speech from the hon. Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley), and having heard the statement he has made I should recommend my hon. Friend to repeat that speech in some of the 25,000 parishes of this country among the men and women who hardly know what it is to get the means to provide their next meal, let alone the 1s. 3d. a week they may be called upon to pay for their children's school fees. They would hardly compare the measure brought in by Her Majesty's Government to the wooden horse with which the hon. Member has compared it, and I think that if the hon. Gentleman had gone to those districts as I have done, and assisted in the relief of human beings who are destitute of human necessities, he would probably have spared himself the trouble which I daresay occupied some considerable portion of his time last night in order to prepare the amusing story he has put before the House about the wooden horse which obtained admittance into Troy. But my hon. Friend the Member for North Islington has told us the object of his speech. He is followed by a brand new fourth party, of which he is at present the only possible sign of membership, and I may here express a hope that the other three will be as able, and that their prospects and career will be as favourable as those of the other fourth party. But it is not my intention to go into all the questions which have been raised by the hon. Member, and which have been discussed in this House over and over again. The speech of my hon. Friend touched on every point connected with our complicated system of national education, and his object seemed to be to endeavour to hang all the questions arising on that subject upon a simple Bill for relieving parents from the payment of school fees. The apparent object of that speech was to minimise the value of this measure and support the voluntary school system, to show how much the Government have not done, and to carefully conceal the great things they have accomplished by this measure. But I think it would take a considerable number of such speeches to explain away the fact that on the 1st September next the great mass of the English people will be relieved from what has been to them hitherto an intolerable burden. Of course, the questions as to local control, and the great religious question, and all those other matters which have been referred to by my hon. Friend, in preference to the main topic of free education, will probably take years to settle, and, although it is easy to hang them on to a simple Bill for free education, my hon. Friends in this House and the country generally must not forget that if their efforts had been persistent, whether in the case of the Instructions that have been moved or of the Amendments which have been referred to, the Free Education Bill must have been killed, and there would have been no relief of school fees for the people of this country—at any rate during the present Session. But, Sir, my object in rising was not to enter into the details of this question, but simply to congratulate Her Majesty's Government and the country at large on having practically completed—so far, at least, as the House of Commons is concerned—a great and important public measure. I think it is not only the greatest measure of the Session, but that it is also the greatest measure which the present Parliament has done. It is a measure that has been subjected to a large amount of criticism, and there are one or two great dangers from which we, the supporters of Her Majesty's Government, have happily been successful in saving the Bill. But the fact, at any rate, remains, that the Bill will leave this House as a good Bill, a satisfactory Bill, and an efficient Bill—efficient for the object it is intended to serve—the one and the only object for which it was introduced—namely, to relieve the people of this country from the payment of school fees. It is a great Bill, because it will remove the reproach that has been hanging over this country, that after having made education compulsory for the public good and for the general safety, we nevertheless imposed fees on the parents and the children whom we have compelled to enter our elementary schools. This Bill will remove hardships such as only those who are engaged in the work of education in connection with the School Board system are familiar with. It will remove a terrible hardship under which poor parents are now suffering in striving to make good the weekly fees. Those who have been on the Attendance Committees, as I have been, and who have seen the poor people coming up to explain their position and to beg for a remission of the fees, must know what a humiliating process that is. There are Magistrates who will not convict for breaches of the law in regard to the payment of fees, and who refuse to imprison the parents, because they know they are too poor to pay. And there are also people whose time is taken up very much by the collection of fees, and all those demoralising agencies which directly tend to the destruction of that self-respect which ought to be one of the first objects of education, who desire to see those demoralising agencies done away with, and who think that education will receive an impetus from this Bill such as we can hardly have estimated. But, Sir, as I have already said, I only rise to express my thankfulness to Her Majesty's Government for having passed this Bill. I have a large personal acquaintance with men to whom the payment of fees has been one of their greatest burdens, and I am sure that in almost every cottage in this country, while the other questions may be admitted to be matters of great importance, the effect of this free education measure so long talked of, and which has been at last conferred, will be fully recognised, and I venture to say a great debt will be held to be due to Her Majesty's Government, or to any Government that shall have conferred this great boon upon the people, and especially upon the poorer classes. I ask my hon. Friend to rise to the greatness of this occasion, and not to be prevented by a feeling of miserable partisanship from recognising the great boon which is now being given to the country. I must remind my hon. Friend that when we talk about the conversion of this or that or the other Member—

*MR. BARTLEY: I did not use the word "conversion."

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Well, I will substitute alteration of opinion in regard to free education — I say, I must remind them that when the question was first raised by the hon. Member for the Edgbaston Division of Birmingham, he had only 32 Members following him into the Lobby in favour of free education. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, the former Home Secretary, is an exception, but with a few exceptions the bulk of the Members who are supporting this measure may be called converts, because there has hitherto been no Party that has adopted the principle of this measure as a Party, and there has been no Government that as a Government has ever tried its hand upon it. I am very glad to find that Her Majesty's Government having tried their hand upon this question have so far succeeded, and I beg to congratulate them upon the result, and especially the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, who has piloted this measure through the House with so full a sense of its importance, and so anxious a desire to make it what it is in point of fact—a Free Education Bill.

(1.20.) COLONEL COTTON-JODRELL (Cheshire, Wirral): I congratulate Her Majesty's Government on having got through the difficult task they have undertaken in the passage of this Bill, although I do not know that hon. Members on this side of the House can congratulate themselves on the manner in which some of the Amendments, neither hostile to the Bill nor to the Board schools, have been received. Those Amendments have been proposed simply with the object of improving the position of voluntary schools in the North of England. I hope that when the Bill reaches the other House the Government will consider the desirability of introducing an Amendment dealing with the quarterly payment of the fee grant. I do not see why that matter should be left entirely in the hands of the Department. I should also like to call attention to the 4th sub-section of Clause 3, relating to the extent of school accommodation in the district, and to ask whether the Government will object to the insertion of words making it quite clear that the inquiry should be public. I trust that, on the whole, the Bill will be found valuable in the interests of education in the future.

(1.23.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I do not think that the Debate which has been raised on the Third Reading of this Bill has been altogether useless, because it has afforded an opportunity not only of saying things which we found some difficulty in saying while the Bill was in Committee lest we should be accused of delaying the measure, but also of reviewing the position into which it has brought us with a better and wider prospect than was possible when the measure was in the Committee stage. It is only on these grounds that I desire to offer a few words on the present occasion. I think, Sir, the time has come when we ought to ask ourselves when this Bill leaves us what the future education of the country, as set up by it, is likely to be? The measure has three aspects. First of all, there is its political or electioneering aspect, on which I shall say nothing now, because that aspect of the subject has been dealt with by the Cassandra of Islington. It is very interesting to us to know from the hon. Member that that noble beast which played so distinguished a part in the Siege of Troy, is still sound in wind and limb and able to show his paces so well when mounted by a competent rider. But passing this by, I ask the House to look at this Bill in its educational aspect, and I will endeavour to sum up the impression it has made on those of us whose interest in the question of education is of 20 or 30 years' standing. In our view, a great opportunity has been, I will not say neglected, but very imperfectly used. The Government might have made this Bill an opportunity for insisting upon improvements in education which it would have been hard to secure at any other moment. They might have raised the standards. That would have been an enormous gain, and this would have been the aptest moment for undertaking the work. The occasion has also been neglected for obtaining a higher education in efficient schools and for re-organising and resettling a number of school areas. I do not, however, make this a charge against the Government. I feel that they had an extremely difficult problem to deal with. But looking back at the whole question, it surely is a neglected opportunity. It was unfortunate that ecclesiastical disputes should be mixed up in any way with educational policy. In this case the ecclesiastical question has been forcibly brought to our attention by the language used by Lord Salisbury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Prime Minister said that the object and scope of the Bill would be to place denominational schools in a position where they could not be shaken; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer ascribed it to the necessity of saving denominational schools. Therefore we cannot ignore the ecclesiastical side of the question. What, then, will be the result of the ecclesiastical provisions in the Bill? It is necessary to distinguish between town schools and country schools in considering this question. In towns, especially in the North of England, the fees, as a rule, are much in excess of what would be covered by the 10s. grant, and the voluntary schools there will be placed at a considerable disadvantage. They will have to raise their subscriptions, and it is by no means certain that this can be done. Therefore, unless there is a larger rally to the denominational schools in the manufacturing towns by subscriptions, those schools will be unable to maintain themselves. Board schools will come in, and the schools will become free. But in the rural districts the managers will gain, and the Government will attain their object of easing the burden of local subscribers and of confirming the clerical control of these schools. I think we ought now to get rid of the word "voluntary," because these schools will be State-supported, though left under denominational and, in many cases, under clerical managers. I think that no school should be in the hands of one denomination, and I should be glad to see schools managed by elected bodies. I admit, however, that in the case of towns there may be a case for allowing denominational schools, because it might be argued that there is no reason why we should not allow a denominational school to be managed on its own principles so long as there is no grievance on the part of the other children. I do not personally adopt that view, but I admit there is great force in it. It may also be said that there are advantages in having schools under a variety of private management—that there should be an honourable rivalry between schools of one denomination and another. Denominational schools in towns or thickly populated districts stand on the whole on a different basis to those in the rural districts, where often the denominational school is the only school, and to which the child is compelled to go. It goes there on sufferance; it is to be treated exceptionally and to be tolerated. Is that right and fair? The Dissenter is just as much a taxpayer as the member of the Church of England, and the child of the former is entitled to equal terms with the child of the latter. We want something more than toleration. We want equal civil rights, and the right hon. Gentleman may rest assured that the claim will not be allowed to rest. That is a grievance of which we complain, and it is one which is greatly aggravated by the present Bill. I read with some interest the evidence before the last Royal Commission, and the argument was used that the State made a payment in respect of secular, and not religious, teaching. That might be so, while the denominational contributions bore a large proportion to the State grant; but when denominational schools are almost entirely supported by the Public Treasury, then the argument is destroyed, and we claim whatever power the denominationalists have now in the control of their schools. What will be the consequences of this Bill? I am not surprised that many Members think it will work dangerously to denominational schools. I entirely agree with that view. The most probable forecast is this: Board schools will increase in towns, particularly in the North of England; the people of the country at large will become more and more accustomed to seeing education conducted by publicly-elected bodies, and the more Board schools cover the ground in towns, the more anomalous and indefensible will be the position of schools in the country districts. We shall, therefore, have a stronger feeling over the whole country in favour of School Boards than we have at this moment. We will in the end see a sort of rural revolt. When the benefits of Local Government work down into the districts, there will be a strong feeling among the inhabitants of rural parishes that they should have control of their own schools. I believe, therefore, that the ultimate result of this Bill will be to strike a fatal blow at the denominational system. I may be asked why, then, am I discontented with the Bill. I say, with all sincerity, that I care more about education than about anything else, and I look forward with regret to the prospect that our education in this country will for some time to come involve ecclesiastical controversies. I believe in the interests of denominational schools themselves the Government would have done far better had they accepted some one of our proposals for local control. By so doing, they would have left the Church of England and denominational schools in a better position than they are likely to occupy. I know many think that the true policy of the Church of England is to fight every parish, the weak and the strong. That is a mistake constantly made by the Established Church. They defend what they consider the outposts, lest the citadel be taken. They did so on the Universities question, and on the question of the burial of Dissenters. Has the Church been made weaker by the removal of those grievances? She is stronger. If I may venture to prophesy in the present instance, the effort of the Government to maintain ecclesiastical exclusiveness is an injury to denomination and to the Church of England. Now that the question of civil and religious liberty has been re-opened, we will lose no opportunity of endeavouring to get this Bill amended. Not only have old controversies been re-opened, but new ones have been introduced, and we will lose no opportunity which may be afforded us in the course of politics to get rid of the educational deficiencies which this Bill leaves, and of that ecclesiastical injustice which, as we think, aggravates them.

(1.53.) MR. DE LISLE: (Leicestershire, Mid): I thank Her Majesty's Government for having successfully carried through this Bill, and I do not pretend to argue whether the Conservative or Liberal Party ought to claim free education as their own. Looked at historically, free education is a principle 1,000 years old. We have it in our Westminster school, which is brought down free to the people of England. I congratulate Her Majesty's Government on having given effect to a very ancient principle, which will conduce to the happiness and prosperity of the people. I think it is almost time to drop the distinction between voluntary and denominational or other schools. Practically, all the schools of the country are subsidised to a very great extent by the State. They should be divided into two classes: Board and denominational schools. There is a great difference between the two. The latter while subsidised by the State are not supported by the local rate. The Board schools are supported by the rates. The denominational schools are confined by the 17s. 6d. limit, while the Board schools enjoy an enormous revenue from the local rates. The total yearly cost of Board schools was £3,373,845 for educating 1,468,892 children. The yearly cost of the denominational schools is £4,201,592 for educating 2,262,435 children. The denominational schools educate their children for £2 per head, and the Board schools for about £3 per head. I proposed the other day that there should be some limitation of the extravagance of School Boards, and that the 10s. grant should not be made where the rate was 1s. in the £1. The School Board of London is about to plunge into a 1s. rate. I was very much surprised that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt) did not come to my assistance, because in 1870 he was very eloquent on the point that the rate should not exceed 1d. in the £1. We were told that it would not be more than 3d., but it has amounted to about 1s. This is a direction in which the present Bill will prove a failure. In the long run those who support voluntary schools will be beaten out of the field by the unfair competition of the School Boards who have the local rates in which the voluntary schools have no share. I suppose we must be thankful for small mercies in these days and be content with what we have got. I very much regret that Her Majesty's Government did not see their way to getting rid of the 17s. 6d. limit which confines denominational schools, and to limiting the extravagance of School Boards. It is useless to say that the ratepayers have the matter in their own hands. But for these defects I think the Government have certainly succeeded in carrying a most admirable Bill, and one of the principle of which they certainly may be proud. The hon. Member for Eccles referred to an expression of mine, which I did not intend offensively. I was representing the views of those who complain of the secularising tendencies of School Boards. I admit the necessity of School Boards where denominational schools cannot be supported. With regard to the question whether Christian teaching should be imparted in Board Schools, I think the recommendations of the minority of the Royal Commission are ominous. The minority, traversing the Report of the majority, state their strong opinion that the moral teaching under the present system had been most valuable; it was given throughout the whole school time, and was not confined to religious teaching, but given through secular instruction. It was not my purpose to say anything offensive to any quarter of the House, and I hope I have justified what I said. I think of all Members of the House, the hon. Member for Poplar may claim the parentage of this Bill. In his evidence before the Royal Commission he made the suggestion which fairly entitles him to that position—that free schools should be established out of the Consolidated Fund. I am sure this Bill carries out his intention. I would only say, in conclusion, that I am certainly in favour of the popular control where the schools are rate-supported, and if denominational schools received a share of the rates, I should be prepared to concede some form of public control. (2.0.)

*(2.16.) MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): It is somewhat difficult, Sir, to answer speakers in their absence. I do not know whether I am at liberty to call attention to the fact that there are not 40 Members present.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*MR. BRUNNER: I should like to assure the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. De Lisle) that we on this side of the House do not impute to him any idea of saying anything offensive to persons opposed to him. We look upon the hon. Member as a most interesting, but, at the same time, a venerable relic, and we are desirous of treating him in a spirit of kindness. The feelings we experience when we listen to the hon. Member for Leicestershire are not exactly the same as those we experience when we listen to the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division, and his leader, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), when we hear ourselves addressed as hon. Friends by a speaker whose tones are full of sneer, we experience something very like the nausea which is the beginning of influenza, and I should be very glad if the word friend were used only when it means a political friend in this House. Now, complaint has been made that the Government have given way to their supporters. While I thank the Vice President of the Council (Sir W. Hart Dyke) for the great courtesy with which he has conducted these discussions, I am bound to observe that the Government seem to have leaned heavily against us. We have asked for some measure of popular control, and we have been denied the smallest concession in that respect. The question of popular control is very frequently argued as if it were entirely a matter of religious difference. As far as my experience teaches me, it is nothing of the kind. The master of a school not very far from my home in the North had been in the habit for a considerable time of picking out from a so-called London letter in a Conservative newspaper all the spiteful bits about the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and reading them to the pupils. Alluding to the matter in public, a short time after I heard of it, I said that if any schoolmaster who professed himself a Liberal resorted to similar tactics I should refuse to shake hands with him, and regard him as a cad. The schoolmaster gave up the practice, very much to the gratification of his neighbours. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. De Lisle) complained that the Government has not given way about the 17s. 6d. limit. I think the right hon. Gentleman has given way, and to an amount which is a very considerable percentage on the 17s. 6d. We have asked the Vice President to put into the Bill words to secure that any free schools shall be as good in their curriculum as those schools in which fees are paid. He has denied us that concession. Again, the right hon. Gentleman has refused to insist that a certain definite proportion of the income of the voluntary schools shall come from voluntary subscriptions. We think this a matter of principle. We would all much prefer that no fees should be paid at all, and that the schools should be really national schools; but we think it only right that if any set of people claim to themselves the control of the schools, they should be called upon to pay a considerable portion of the cost of the schools. The Government have refused to make a grant for night schools, greatly to my regret. Night schools have been very steadily discouraged by one Administration after another, and my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham has done very good work in encouraging the supporters of these schools to make headway again. The result of the action of the hon. Member's Society has been that the number of pupils in night schools has of late been largely increased. It is a great pity that a little more money should not have been expended in the encouragement of night schools, for the reason that it is largely in the first year after leaving school that boys and girls feel for the first time the advantage of the education they have received. I should have been delighted if the Government had done something which would have encouraged our young people to continue their education in night schools. I give the right hon. Gentleman fair warning that I mean to agitate and agitate until he gives way as to night schools. Again, the Vice President has refused to give any definite instruction to the managers of the voluntary schools that they are to use any surplus they may have in the improvement of education. He has refused to give us an audit of the accounts of schools, and what to my mind is rather worse, he has refused our proposal that the managers of schools shall send copies of their accounts to the Local School Authority. I can understand managers resisting an audit. They claim that the schools are private property, as to which they are not bound to account to anyone. But we have the analogy of the local charities all over the country. Parliament has decreed that the managers of charities shall be bound to send in their accounts to the Commissioners, and the Commissioners are willing to supply to the Local Authorities copies of the annual accounts. Why should we favour the managers of voluntary schools in a way we do not favour the managers of charities? It seems to me the duty the managers of the schools owe to the public is just as clear as that the trustees of charities owe to the public. I have recounted a number of cases in which the Government have refused to give way to us. What have they done on other points? No spectacle could be more humiliating than the attitude taken up by Members from Lancashire. I am a Lancashire man myself by birth, and I am proud to think there is truth in the adage that "what Lancashire thinks to-day, England will think to-morrow." I am not competent to say what Lancashire thinks of a section of its representatives to-day, but I am satisfied that England will agree that the continual policy of grab, grab, grab, pursued by Members from Lancashire on behalf of these half-time full-fee schools has not by any means been a credit to that great county. Especially would I say this with regard to those hon. Members who represent districts in which half-time schools are situated. Those Members have been coming to us all through this Session, asking for consideration for the population in those districts on account of their poverty. They have been asking that they should be allowed to send their children to work at 10 years of age on account of this poverty, these people perhaps the best paid in the country. We have heard since the discussions on the Factory and Workshops Bill from the right hon. Member for Sheffield that these poor little children get no wages for a long time after they attend the factories for half-time; they go to work at half-past five or six in the morning, and they get only half the proper schooling, and are charged the full fee, and it is to these schools that the right hon. Gentleman has been peculiarly generous. I do hope and trust that at no distant date this House will give these Lancashire Representatives to understand that no more concessions of this kind are to be made, and that many of those made will be rescinded. The hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) has congratulated the Government upon this Bill; but I think we on this side have reason to congratulate ourselves, for many of us have been advocates of free education since 1868. That the Bill will do great good I readily grant, that it will be amended hereafter and do very much more good I heartily pray. I congratulate hon. Members on this side upon the passing of the Bill, and I wish I could congratulate them upon having been more successful in amending it.

*(2.34.) MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): Twenty years ago, when I was a candidate at a School Board election, I advocated free and undenominational education, and ever since I have held the same view. Now, I think the speech of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division (Mr. Jesse Collings) was conceived with bad taste, and delivered in a bad tone. He seemed desirous of claiming a Party victory in the passing of this measure, and he congratulated the Government and those who had assisted the Government in saving the Bill from dangers that threatened it. But there has been no Motion from this side of the House that was not friendly to the Bill, and all the speeches delivered here have had but one object, the improvement of the Bill, the widening of its scope to make it more efficient, and more useful to the people. I yield all honour to the Government for the drafting and introduction of the measure and for finding the money for the remission of school fees, but to no Party in the House, but to the House as a whole is the final result due. We are glad the measure is about to pass, and I, born in an agricultural district and having knowledge of the difficulties of the agricultural labourers' life and the burden of the tax school fees impose upon him, thank the House and thank the Government for this act of tardy justice to the class. I am glad to know that on this Third Reading stage there is no discordant voice from our side. We admit that the Bill is to a great extent a further endowment of Church authority and Church influence in rural parishes, a fact that the promoters of the Bill and the supporters of the Government have not attempted to conceal. They are desirous of maintaining the influence of denominationalism, which means the extinction of the independence of Dissenters in 10,000 rural parishes throughout the country. It will have that effect no doubt for a time, but it is as certain as the Bill passes this House to-day that this will not be allowed to endure. To the agricultural labourer and his family it is, of course, of the greatest importance to be released from the payment of school fees. Yet the Dissenting agricultural labourer is as keenly alive to the necessity of religious freedom and equality as are the dwellers in the towns. That religious freedom and equality will inevitably follow in the wake of this measure, and before many years have passed. You cannot hope in these days to continue to use public funds—the funds of the taxpayers for the advantage of one religious denomination. It is hopeless to suppose that such a system can continue to prevail, and all these props set up by the Government in this Bill for the maintenance of denominationalism will surely, and in natural course decay, and those strong enough to resist the natural process will certainly be removed ere long by Liberal legislation. I am delighted to witness the passing of this great measure, and I can fully appreciate its enormous advantages. I have experienced all my life the disadvantage of the want of early instruction. I know that there are thousands of children among the labouring community as capable of receiving and using instruction as the children of the wealthy class. The opportunity has been denied them in the past. Only want of opportunity has prevented many of them from rising to positions of influence and public usefulness. This measure will to a great extent remove the initial difficulty from the labouring classes, and so far as it does that it is a great measure worthy of the commendation of the House of Commons and the thanks of the whole country. But let it be for all time understood that there have been no stronger supporters of the Bill in the House of Commons than the Members sitting on the Liberal Benches. During the whole of the Debates on this Bill we have not heard a single speech from the other side of the House in praise of education for the people on its own merits. Yes, I have listened with attention throughout the whole of the Debates, and there has been no great speech from that side in praise of education, and the merits of education; but there has been a continuance of Party and sectarian wrangles as to whether denominational schools would be benefited or not. In the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to his constituents, a few weeks back, in commending this measure he did not commend it as a great means for aiding and developing the intellectual resources of the labouring community, he only recommended the Bill, because, he said, if his Party did not pass it the other Party would do so, and it would be so much the worse—for what? For education? Nothing of the kind. There was no appeal to the patriotic instincts of his constituents in favour of education, he appealed to them to support the Bill, because the other Party if they passed such a measure would make it worse for denominationalism than his own Party would. But I hope the occasion for recrimination has gone. They would not have been raised to-day but for the friends and supporters of the Government, the tail, I might say, of the wooden horse, dragged out by the hon. Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley). I rejoice that the Bill has reached this stage, not for the sake of Party purposes or any political advantages. I would rather that the labourers should have this free education, though denominational teaching is mixed up with it, than that they should not have it at all, for I am sufficiently acquainted with the labourers to know that they will use the advantage this measure will confer to free their schools from the dictation of the parson and the squire, and will place control in the hands of representatives of the people duly and publicly elected. I am delighted, I say, at the passing of this measure, and I think it a great privilege and honour to have a seat in this House, and to be permitted to say a word in favour of a measure that will go far to raise the status of the labouring community, and enrich the nation, giving to the working classes the opportunity of taking a high position in the future in the affairs of the country. I feel it a great privilege to be able to say “Aye” to the Third Reading of this important measure.

(2.45.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I join with the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down in thinking it a privilege to be a Member of the House of Commons which passes this important measure. It certainly, if it does not crown the edifice of education, lays another stone which will carry the building up towards that crown which some day we may hope to see. I join too, in saying that though credit is in the first place due to the Government for the introduction of the Bill, so is it due to the entire House for the way in which the Bill has been carried through. Nor do I wish to exclude even those 10 or 12 Members who opposed the Second Reading, because I believe that every one of them is an educationist, and did not oppose the Bill from an educational point of view. I was very much struck with an observation from my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvon, in dealing with a point frequently raised, that the Bill would strike a fatal blow at voluntary schools, that this could only be under certain conditions; if the managers of voluntary schools do not rise to the occasion, a fatal blow will no doubt be struck at the system, but if they rise to the occasion, if they make their schools effective in the future, instead of a blow struck at them this will be a pillar raised for their support. Our system of education throughout is not, and should not be, of one cast-iron design; it is to the advantage of the country that it takes different shapes, and when this Bill becomes law we shall see in the future, as we have seen in the past, voluntary schools and Board schools flourishing side by side. There is really no antagonism between the two systems. I have not been a member of a School Board, but I can speak from personal experience as manager of a voluntary school some time ago, and I know that in Liverpool, ever since the Act of 1870 passed, the managers of the Board schools have unquestionably derived great assistance from experience in connection with voluntary schools. In only one instance have I found the religious difficulty arise, and that was very soon got over. It is not truth to say that the Board school teaching is irreligious, or that morality and religion are not recognised in the instruction given. I, of course, do not speak for all, but, speaking generally, I believe that in the management of Board schools the education is given a religious turn; there is the force of religion behind it just as much as in the voluntary system. I may mention that the Chairman of the Committee of Management of the School Board to which I refer is Chairman also of the management of a voluntary school in connection with the Church of England, and though his colleagues are not in connection with that Church yet they work most harmoniously together, and the education given in the Board schools is thoroughly efficient. We shall find, I believe, in the future that efficiency under either system will be in no way diminished, but the competition will be as useful for education as it has been in the past. I may take the opportunity to mention a fact that has not, I think, been referred to, that the amount derived from the rates in aid of education is not a very large amount. In Liverpool, to take an example, a sum of about £54,000 comes from the rates in support of schools, but of this sum only £11,000, or 20 per cent., is devoted directly to educational purposes. The balance is applied indirectly and to such purposes as the payment of interest due in connection with the erection of school buildings, the repayment of principal, and the enforcement of the compulsory clauses. In this voluntary schools and Board schools equally share the advantage. I join in the expression of regret that the Government have not thought right to assist continuation schools, for our system permits children to be withdrawn from school too soon for the completion of their education. One of the best parts of the Bill is the clause which sanctions children remaining at school until 15 years of age without payment of fees. In closing these few remarks I venture to say it is not given to every Minister to introduce Bills having such far-reaching consequences as those which must attend that which it has fallen to the lot of the present Vice President of the Council to propose. Most ably has he piloted this Bill through the House. This is not the first time he has so well discharged similar duties. Not many Members probably remember that when the right hon. Gentleman held the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland, he had charge in this House of the first Ashbourne Act, an Act which has been productive of more benefit to Ireland than any other Land Act, and of which the Land Purchase Bill we have just passed is but the supplement and complement. I trust that the success which has attended that Act in Ireland will be repeated over a wider area in con nection with this Bill with which the name of the right hon. Gentleman is associated.

(2.55.) MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): I was, unfortunately, prevented from moving the clause which stood in my name on the Paper yesterday, and may be allowed a few words at this stage. It is to be regretted that the Vice President has not repaired what must have been an omission in the drafting of the Bill. The Bill rests so far as voluntary schools are concerned on administration of schools by managers, but it is a fact well known on both sides of the House that in many schools there is no manager. It is a delusion to suppose that there are only a few schools in the country which are not under the administration of a committee. It is a delusion to assume that the managers always sign the documents constituting the authority for the payment of the annual grant. Many Members of this House, I feel sure, must often have been asked to sign such documents, although they might know little or nothing about the management of the schools for which the grant was claimed. This state of things has already created some hostility against the voluntary system, and under this Bill the mischief will be still more serious, for there is a likelihood of the increase of arbitrary and irresponsible management. Provision ought to be made against despotic management, and I trust that the point will be dealt with in another place.

(3.2.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I think almost every Member of the House is delighted that parents are in future to be relieved of the Poll Tax which they have hitherto had to pay in the shape of the school fees of their children. The Bill has been made to a certain extent a battle field between the respective supporters of secular and denominational education. There were two remarkable speeches delivered at the beginning of this Debate—one by the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Roby), expressing regret that the Bill had not been made more of a settlement, and the other by the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen. The latter was a very fair speech from the hon. Gentleman's point of view, although I think the practical effect of his views would be to crush out the voluntary schools and to have a large system of education with a certain amount of religion, defined by Act of Parliament, introduced into it. The question of denominational or secular education is not necessarily mixed up with that of free education. Roman Catholics could send their children to a secular school, although they would prefer not to do so, but they would rather suffer persecution and imprisonment than send them to a school where there is given a certain amount of religious instruction which is not that sanctioned by their own Church. I understand the hon. Gentleman to give us fair warning that in future times he and his Party will attempt to introduce a system of that kind.

MR. BRYCE: What I argued for was the establishment of complete religious equality in those schools which are alone accessible to the children in any district.

COLONEL NOLAN: I had better not, perhaps, follow the right hon. Gentleman into that subject, because we are all agreed about perfect religious equality. The desire of those Members who are anxious for denominational education has been in these discussions, not to gain any point for denominational education, but to prevent this Bill being turned into an engine for secular education, or for the control by one denomination of the religious education of another. Fortunately most of the Amendments that would have been detrimental to voluntary schools have been rejected, and the question between denominationalism and secularism has been left as nearly as possible where it was. The Bill does not extend to Ireland, where, however, it may have a serious indirect effect, for already large numbers of parents are saying that, as there is to be free education in England, they do not see why they should pay for it in Ireland. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President will represent the matter to the Government. It is easy to get it into the heads of the people that they ought not to pay money, and it will take a long time to convince the people that they are not taking a right view of the matter. The result will be that education in Ireland will suffer.

(3.9.) MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I look upon this Bill as the complement of the Act of 1870. When that measure was before the House I protested against the enforcement of compulsory attendance, with its consequent burden upon parents, not of fees only, but of the loss of the labour of their children, and I took the sense of the Committee on the clause which enforced compulsory attendance. I pointed out that it was an injustice to the great mass of the people, and I took the liberty of dividing the Committee against the clause. I was supported by a very appreciable number of Members, though defeated by what may be called a considerable majority. More than 100 Members followed me into the Lobby, and I am by no means ashamed of the course I took on that occasion. I have been greatly struck by the altered tone which has been adopted as to the question of education during the discussions on this Bill. Of course I make allowance for the altered views which are entertained on many subjects in our day, but throughout these Debates I have heard scarcely any reference made to the pecuniary burden cast upon taxpayers as well as upon ratepayers. I am not going into the question of whether our action is right or wrong, but by this Bill we are simply adding in perpetuity 1d. in the £1 to the Income Tax. That is what it will resolve itself into. I have no doubt I shall be told we are simply dealing with a surplus, but I deny the existence of any surplus at all, because, without going into an analysis of this somewhat nebulous surplus, as is well known, we have been with one hand borrowing for the current requirements of the year, and with the other spending money in addition to that required for the ordinary expenditure of the year. All this involves a distinct contradiction of what we were told by

VOL. CCCLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Mr. Forster in 1870—that the School Board system would not, in the lifetime of anyone listening to him, cost more than 3d. in the £1. [“No, no!”] That is an historical fact which I commend to the attention of hon. Gentlemen opposite who do not seem to be acquainted with it. The question remains—how far are we safeguarding the interests of taxpayers and ratepayers in the course we are adopting? I am well aware that the interest of the ratepayers and of the taxpayers of the country are very little thought of nowadays. The vast majority of those who have to spend the money raised by the rates, and who return to Parliament the men who raise the taxes, pay an infinitesimally small proportion towards the taxes they spend, and, therefore, the interests of the ratepayers and the taxpayers go by the board; but, at the same time, I hope the House will note that an additional burden is being permanently thrown upon the income tax and upon the rates by this measure. I may, perhaps, be told that I have no right to earmark the income tax as the source from which these funds are drawn, and that no additional burden is being thrown upon the income tax by this Bill; but my reply is that when a future Chancellor of the Exchequer has to choose between taking off direct or indirect taxation, he will find himself compelled to select the latter, and, therefore, the burden will be left upon the income tax and upon the rates. One of the grounds upon which I felt bound to oppose the Act of 1870 was because I feared that the School Boards would be subjected to the influence of self-opinionated doctrinaires on both sides of the political line, who would be very apt to endeavour to carry out their fads regardless of the cost that might be imposed upon the ratepayers or the taxpayers of the country. I cannot say that the gloomy forebodings that I then entertained have been belied by the subsequent experience of the last 20 years. The Government, I have no doubt, when this Bill was introduced, thought they had better leave all the machinery of the Act of 1870 to stand by itself, and that they need only concern themselves with the one single question of freeing the parent from the duty he had to discharge in regard to the education of his child. No doubt those who support this measure may think that those who oppose it do so because they regard a Bill which frees the parents from the discharge of their duty towards their children as objectionable, because of a Socialistic character. For my own part, I cannot go that length, because I have always held that when Parliament steps in and interposes the law between parents and their children, and makes the attendance of children at school compulsory, Parliament should pay the cost itself. On this question, therefore, I have felt it to be my duty to differ from those Members of my Party with whom I am accustomed to act. Parliament having interfered into the domestic life of the country to this extent is bound to provide the money for carrying out the object that it has in view. I think, however, that the Government are wrong in supposing that this will be a universally popular measure throughout the country. On the contrary, I have found that there is uncommonly little enthusiasm evinced in its favour, even in quarters where one would expect some anxiety to be felt for relief from the burden of school pence. I believe that even in the rural districts uncommonly few people appreciate the boon that the Bill is intended to confer upon them, while in the great urban districts the measure appears to be received with considerable distrust, and I am afraid that it will give cause of offence in those quarters from which Her Majesty's Government derive their strongest political force. It may be that my views are erroneous. My own view is that there has been a vast amount of exaggeration on both sides. I believe the popularity of the measure has been enormously overrated, while I believe that many of the objections that have been raised to it in the towns will be found by practical experience to have been to a great extent overstated also. But there is one point, and one only, which I would venture in a very few words to urge on the notice of the House. The right hon. Gentleman—whose able conduct of this Bill is, I am happy to find, so generally appreciated on all sides of the House—said that a large discretionary and controlling power will remain vested in the Education Department in regard to seeing that fair play is maintained amongst the various interests concerned. Now, I confess that I do not coincide with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that that is a point from which any great consolation is to be derived. What does "department" mean? We are familiar enough with the expression "My Lords," but that generally means some 5th class clerk who arrogates to himself that title. I have myself known requisitions made for structural alterations involving very material cost to the managers and owners of voluntary schools. One day it may be perhaps thought that a classroom is required because the isolation of certain grades of children recommended itself to "my Lords" and their nominee. At another time precisely the opposite theory may be in vogue, and we may be told that the main structure of the school requires enlarging at very great cost. I heard the other day of an Inspector going down to a certain place and actually talking of a cloak room being built—I suppose on some architectural principle, which "my Lords" thought of enforcing at great cost and injury to the system of voluntary education. These are the points I would venture seriously to urge on the notice of my right hon. Friend. I hope that some means will be taken to prevent the heads of Departments in future going in for measures of this kind, which have in the past been found to be a serious impediment to the efficient working of the voluntary schools. There is one fallacy which pervades the replies of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, and to which I should like to draw his attention. He seems to think that he has conclusively replied to the objections urged as to his measure pressing hardly on the voluntary schools, when he says that the Bill will affect equally the voluntary and the Board schools, but that is not quite an accurate statement, because there must always be a great distinction between the School Board schools, which are supported out of the rates, and voluntary schools, which are struggling for their existence, and which can only look to voluntary subscriptions. In connection with the Board schools, those who spend the rates are not largely affected by the imposition of the rates, but in the case of the voluntary schools, those who are mainly interested in them have to provide a large proportion of the funds necessary to carry them on. But my main object in rising was to enter a protest against the disregard that has been shown on this question for the interests of the ratepayer and the taxpayer. Education, no doubt, is a great boon, and a great benefit to the great mass of the people, but, at the same time, when the Act of 1870 was agreed to, the idea was that elementary education alone was to be given at the expense of the ratepayers and of the taxpayers, whereas now we have gentlemen urging on the Vice President of the Council the necessity of arranging costly classes for the completion and finishing of what goes perillously near the higher order of education. I cannot help thinking that we have unlearnt many of the lessons we learnt in 1870. ["Hear, hear!"] An hon. Member says "Hear, hear!" Is he acquainted with the scandalous extravagance of a former London School Board, which was thoroughly exposed in this House? We have heard of the purchase of pianos, and luxuries of that kind, at the expense of the most needy section of the community. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will give the House some assurance that some limit will be placed upon the future expenditure for educational purposes, otherwise I am afraid that we shall find ourselves committed to a system of absolutely reckless extravagance.

(3.28.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I do not desire to interpose for more than a few minutes at this stage of the Bill. The measure was originally introduced as one to further assisted education, but I think that Her Majesty's Government may congratulate themselves with regard to it on having acquired the right to the title of an assisted Government, so far as the Opposition is concerned. I have now been in Parliament for a good many years, and have had the satisfaction of seeing many Liberal measures carried by a Conservative Government, and when each such Bill is on the point of being passed we have always seen some such scene as we have just witnessed. We always have some staunch Members of the Party opposite, like the hon. Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley) and the right hon. Member for Thanet (Mr. J. Lowther), who have wailed at the fate of the principles they at one time entertained. The hon. Member for North Islington has refreshed the House with a classical quotation from Dryden's "Virgil." If he will permit me I would apply to him another classical illustration: Victrix causa deis placuit, sed victa Catoni, and will say that if the conquering cause of free education has recommended itself to the gods on the Treasury Bench, the hon. Member for North Islington well represents the atrocem animum Catonis. Faithful to his principles, he has clung to them to the last. Well, that is not a new spectacle. We remember the language of Mr. Disraeli on the repeal of the Corn Laws. We remember the sentiments which were expressed in 1866 by Lord Salisbury with reference to the reform of that year. Many evils were predicted. It was said that the ruin of the country would ensue from the adoption of Free Trade, and the destruction of the Constitution from Household Suffrage. Somehow or other we have managed to survive these things, and I hope we shall survive the evils which have been predicted from the adoption of Free Education. We have had experience of dissentients on this side of the House, and we are not surprised to find dissentients opposite. But I am not going into the details of the Bill. The hon. Member for Eccles and the hon. Member for Aberdeen have pointed out what, from their point of view, are the defects of the measure. I will only say that recognising, as Members on this side do, the great boon which the Bill will confer upon the poorer classes of the community, we still regret that it should be defective in some respects. To some gentlemen the defects are a recommendation. We have heard recently that the incompleteness of the measures of Her Majesty's Government are their main recommendations to certain gentlemen who sat on that side of the House, and I am, therefore, not surprised that the admirers of incomplete legislation should welcome this Bill as the perfection of human reason. One of those gentlemen, meaning to administer consolation to the hon. Members for North Islington and Thanet, pointed out certain things that made one think that there is still balm in Bordesley, and that there are still physicians there. That is to me a melancholy recollection, because, when the right hon. Member for Thanet was speaking, my mind was carried back to the days of 1870. We then sat opposite one another as we do now, and if the right hon. Gentleman maintains the sentiments he advocated in those days, I also maintain the sentiments that I then advocated. The hon. Member for the Bordesley Division was good enough to bear testimony in that respect, though he seems to have forgotten that I no longer hold the office of Home Secretary. I regret that having contended in those days for the principles of the Birmingham League—free education, School Boards everywhere, and popular control—the chances of carrying out those principles have been defeated by the very gentlemen who were then the leaders of the Birmingham League. The hon. Member for Bordesley, who was Secretary to that League, while complimenting me upon my adhesion to those principles, has himself abandoned them. We have achieved, after 21 years, the cause of free education; I hope that it will not be so long before we achieve the rest of the principles that were maintained by the Birmingham League, and which we might have achieved at this time if the Representatives of Birmingham had been faithful to their own friends. There are two features which we regret are absent from the Bill. We are sorry that the principle of popular control has not been established in the Bill. I was rather struck by a sentence in the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan). He said what “we object to is that men of one class of religious opinion should manage the schools of persons who don’t belong to the same opinion.” It is exactly upon that ground that I object to the management of the rural schools being exclusively in the hands of persons with one set of religious opinions. Therefore, when the hon. and gallant Member advances arguments which he thinks are in favour of denominational schools, he is using the strongest arguments in condemnation of the denominational system. Another thing which I regret is that we should be advancing £2,000,000 under a Bill which practically gives no security for advance in education. The main thing which the Government has done is to safeguard and protect the denominational schools. It has never been on the other side a question how far these £2,000,000 are to be expended to advance education, but how far it is possible to spend £2,000,000 and redeem the fees without injury to denominational education. I believe the more we make it apparent that the cause of denominationalism is in opposition to the interests of education, the more certain it is that in this country the denominational system will come to an end. I should not like to sit down without recognising, as gentlemen on all sides recognise, the extreme ability and courtesy with which this Bill has been conducted by the right hon. Gentleman, who disarmed opposition, and certainly stifled quoques by the frankness of his confession in his opening speech that he has changed his mind on this subject. I believe that the responsibilities of office have the effect very often of altering the opinions of persons whose views have been founded only on theory before. I remember altering my views with regard to the liquor question when I was Home Secretary, and I am sure the experience of the right hon. Gentleman in the Education Department has made him alive to the interests of free education. I have observed that no man ever entered that Department without embracing more liberal views on education than he entertained before. When a man comes frankly forward and says he has changed his views, we accept that declaration at his hands. But I cannot speak in the same terms of the two great protagonists in the cause of free education—the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Member for West Birmingham. As there is only one of those right hon. Gentlemen present I will only speak of him. The right hon. Gentleman opposite advocates the measure, not because the dread of dangers of a socialistic character has been removed from his mind, but because it is possible that the successors of the present Government might carry out measures more injurious. I never heard great principles of public policy maintained on such grounds. When Sir R. Peel changed his views and adopted the policy of Free Trade, he said it was because he was convinced it was a sound and just policy, and he was prepared to recommend it to the country. So when Mr. Disraeli proposed Household Suffrage he did not admit that his opinions were unchanged. It was a more reckless politician who said he had adopted it for the purpose of "dishing the Whigs." I observe that the nearer the present Government approach the General Election the greater seems their dread of their successors. It is quite plain that they do not anticipate being their own successors. They proceed, as a beaten and retreating army sometimes do, to devastate their own country and burn their own villages in order that their pursuers may be starved out. That is the policy of a great Administration representing a great Party. That is the policy which the Chancellor of the Exchequer says lies at the root of free education. [Mr. GOSCHEN: I did not say that.] I am merely illustrating the position of the right hon. Gentleman. There is another thing which is noticeable, namely, that as a General Election approaches the Conservative Party become more and more enamoured of Liberal measures. To recur to a military image, they have put on "the uniform of their opponents" in order that they may be mistaken for the other side. That is the policy which is favoured by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is only one thing wanting in this Debate. I remember that when Sir R. Peel passed the measure for the repeal of the Corn Laws he paid a well-deserved tribute to the unadorned eloquence of Richard Cobden. I think we ought to hear to-night similar grateful testimony from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). After what has passed upon this subject a compliment of that kind would be well deserved. I remember perfectly well that differences of opinion upon that subject existed between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and my right hon. Friend, and I am glad to think that those differences have been completely removed. With reference to the measure generally, though it is not all we wish it to be, or all we intend it to be in the future, we can accept with satisfaction what has been obtained. The Party who are in favour of complete legislation may look with satisfaction to the legacy of incomplete legislation that has been left them by the Party of "incompleteness." With reference to this Bill, I may venture to repeat what I said with reference to the great Bill of Mr. Forster in 1870. Differing, as I did, from many of the principles on which that Bill was founded, I felt no man could deny that it marked a great advance in the cause of education in the country. I ventured then to say of that Bill what I say of this Bill in the words which end the great romance of Sir Walter Scott,— "There are many things that are ower bad for blessing, and ower gude for banning; like Rob Roy." I think that may be fairly said of a measure like the present. It contains great good, and also some evil—evil which may be remedied in the future; and we may all be glad, at least, at having taken part in passing a measure which will be a great relief to the poorer classes of the population, and which we hope in the long run will lead to the extension of the cause of education.

*(3.50.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE): I have listened to the Debate with great interest, and I should be ungenerous were I not to thank hon. Members for the allusions they have made to my conduct of the measure. I have had a difficult task, and I have done my best. That is all I wish to say concerning my conduct. I wish also to be allowed to offer my thanks to the First Lord of the Treasury for the constant advice and assistance I have had from my right hon. Friend in carrying forward the measure. As far as I am concerned, I am satisfied with this discussion. The Bill has been, as I always expected it would be, criticised on both sides of the House from adverse points of view. The measure in its inception and production was essentially a compromise between contending parties, and I think the criticisms we have heard from various quarters show that we have, at all events, arrived at something like a balance of opinion. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt) has criticised the Bill in a very adverse spirit. I am not sure whether in one part of his speech he did not come perilously near a tu quoque. He alluded to the prospects of the Party opposite at the next election, and he indulged in metaphor. I remember in bygone days that Lord Beaconsfield, contemplating a General Election, also descended to metaphor, and referred to the members of the Administration of 1868-74, at the conclusion of their labours, as a row of extinct volcanoes. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman opposite will find, when the picture he has imagined appears on the canvas, that it is painted in totally different colours from what he has assumed. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman assumed that his opponents would all run away. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that those who have done battle for the Conservative Party, some of them for a quarter of a century, have not won their laurels by running away; and, whatever panacea they may seize upon for any evils which threaten, the last thing they will think of doing will be to run away from their opponents. I should like to deal with one or two points of interest in the discussion. And first of all I must refer to the Virgilian oration of my hon. Friend the Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley), who has had the cast of gloom on his countenance ever since the introduction of this Bill. My hon. Friend endeavoured the other day to impress upon the House that the Bill was introduced at the bidding of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. I can assure the hon. Member that he never made a statement more at variance with the facts. The Bill was introduced in pursuance of a pledge given long ago, and I fearlessly assert that if there was one cause more than another which induced the Government to produce the Bill it was the strong pressure brought to bear upon them by a very great number of their own supporters. The hon. Member stated that the Government had conceded everything to hon. Members opposite, and rejected proposals coming from their own side. The statement is unjust, unfair, and absolutely devoid of truth. I have gone most carefully through the Bill as it is to-day and compared it line by line with the Bill as read a second time, and I find it has been modified in only three or four particulars at the suggestion of hon. Members opposite, and with regard to the most important of the Amendments, the raising of the age from 14 to 15, that concession was made at the last moment by the First Lord of the Treasury in deference to the pressure of a large body of opinion on this side of the House. At the suggestion of the hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. S. Buxton) a very small Amendment was accepted—that is to say, where fees were imposed in a school a Report should be made to Parliament. In addition, there was a verbal Amendment, proposed by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Summers), and one other Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Pickersgill), that where fees were reimposed they should not exceed 6d. These were the sole alterations made at the suggestion of hon. Members opposite. I will now deal with the concessions made to hon. Members on this side. In the first place, there was the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for North Lancashire (Mr. Ainslie), urging the Government to make the age for free education begin at three years. That was accepted, and it was an enormous concession for the benefit of voluntary schools. Then there were one or two Amendments introduced by the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell) and others of an unimportant character. Then there was a clause introduced by the noble Lord the Member for Darwen (Viscount Cranborne) as to the grouping of schools, which was of the utmost importance. What happened with regard to the matter? When my noble Friend brought that clause forward the First Lord of the Treasury promised that Her Majesty's Government would carefully consider the matter with a view to introducing an effective clause. As a result we spent the greater part of a day in considering the question, and a clause dealing with it was carried through Committee. Another demand which was conceded was that relating to half-timers, which was a considerable concession. One other Amendment on Clause 3 related to change of population in school districts, which resulted in obvious advantage to voluntary schools. That is not a pleasing matter for me to deal with, but I feel bound to say that since I have been in Parliament I have never known so wild an assertion as that made by the hon. Member for North Islington supported by so little fact. My hon. Friend the Member for Cheshire urges that we ought to have inserted in the Bill that the payments were to be made quarterly. I can only repeat that there is in the Department a scheme ready prepared by which, if the Bill should become law by September 1 next, the first payment will be made on September 30, and the payments will go on quarterly until the end of the school year. There is a distinction between the position I take up and that taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the future of this measure. It must in the future be an educational measure. It will be very easy in a few years to raise the standard, and perhaps to have one universal standard of exemption—the fifth. We are making steady progress, and I hope that in a few years we shall be able to show not only progress in the elements and in book work, but also in education which is of a real, practical, and useful character. Such a scheme has been shadowed forth in the Code, and I hope that before long a good harvest will be reaped. With regard to attendance, there will be a great change after this Bill is passed. Hitherto it has been in many cases impossible to secure a conviction against poor parents who say they have difficulty in getting the school pence together to pay the fees for the education of their children. The humane feelings of the Magistrates prevent them from convicting in such cases. After the Bill passes that excuse will be no longer available, and the laxity of attendance which results from it will be cured. The hon. Member for Hornsey has made an appeal with reference to the number of managers. No doubt it is a grievous pity that there is not a greater and more complete interest taken in the management of small voluntary and Board schools. After all the Debates that have taken place, I am not able to alter the original estimate I made as to the future of education in connection with the Bill. Gloomy predictions have again been made by the hon. Member for North Islington, but as regarded him and hon. Members opposite who see in that Bill an engine for the destruction of the voluntary schools, I think they are misjudging and miscalculating the resolution and courage with which the new situation will be met by the managers of the voluntary schools. I know it will be urged, and with truth I that there is a difference between the enterprise of the North and the South of England with regard to voluntary schools. How that comes about I cannot say, but I think that one of the first effects of the Bill in the North of England and in large towns will be that comparisons will be made between the subscription already made in voluntary schools and the liabilities which many persons in the South have willingly incurred. It has been the habit with many of us not only to subscribe, but to render ourselves liable for any deficit in the school accounts. That is a practice with which I have for many years been personally acquainted. Hon. Gentlemen leave out of account two facts—they do not recognise the spirit and energy with which the Bill will be met by the managers of voluntary schools and the dread and terror of the large expenditure of the School Board, and the fresh energy and impulse with which such terror will naturally imbue those who have an interest in the educational reforms of any district in the North of England. I am grateful to hon. Members on both sides of the House for the generous assistance which they have given me. Whatever the educational future of this country may be, I hope that my successors will, as I have always done, endeavour to remove that question from the domain of Party politics. With regard to the advantages conferred by this measure, I hope that we shall strengthen, on safe and broad lines, our educational system, and that it will be a great benefit and an intense relief to a large mass of our fellow-countrymen.

*(4.20.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I also wish to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the ability and moderation with which he has piloted this difficult Bill through its various stages. When the Bill was under discussion I purposely abstained from taking any part in it, as I was anxious to see it passed safely through the House. I did so, not because I was satisfied with it, but because it recognises the right of the people to free education, and although, like nearly all popular measures which emanate from the other side of the House, it bristles with precautions and securities, I felt certain that at no distant date these precautions and securities will disappear. For upwards of 10 years I sat upon a School Attendance Committee in the Borough of Marylebone. In many cases of non-attendance which came before the Committee the fault rested with improvident or drunken parents, but in the majority of instances it was the absolute poverty of the family which kept the children from school, and rendered the payment of school fees impossible. The pinched features and half-starved condition of many of the parents and children were heartrending, and, poor as I was, I occasionally helped them to obtain a meal, other members of the Committee did the same, and it frequently happened that instead of enforcing the law the Committee winked at its violation by adjourning cases, so as to afford the parents an opportunity of obtaining the means of sending their children to school. Magistrates were also known to be influenced by the same humane considerations, and I am satisfied that the Bill will remove one great difficulty by rendering the task of school committees and Magistrates, when cases with regard to school attendance come before them, very much easier, and will remove a great deal of the friction which has existed in working the machinery of the Education Act. I hope that before many years we shall see an absolutely free system of education throughout the United Kingdom. I am glad to see the zeal for education which now exists on both sides of the House: it was not always so, and, as far as I can see, the general conversion dates from the time when household suffrage was enacted by the British Parliament. This measure has been described as a triumph of Party, out of which Party capital is to be made. It is not, however, a triumph of Party, but a triumph of Democracy, and a sign that we are now entering upon an era, not of destruction, but of construction, when more will be expended upon education, science, and art, and less upon ironclads and armies. In this spirit I cordially support the Third Reading of the Bill.

*(4.28.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): My right hon. Friend has been unduly severe upon my hon. Friend the Member for North Islington. My right hon. Friend is himself not correct as regards the facts. If he will refer to the Notice Paper on going into Committee upon this Bill, he will see there were a host of Amendments to reduce the age from five to three, and from all quarters. I am entitled to say this, because my notice headed the long list. I think that it is hardly right for the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council to claim the credit of reducing the age from five to three as a concession to this side of the House, because both sides deserve the credit of that Amendment.

(4.30.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury): I join in the hope entertained by Members generally on this side of the House that the Bill will be read a third time unanimously, because we have long advocated and waited for free education and are glad we have got an instalment of it at last. My only regret is that the Bill does not go further than it does. I wish to add my voice to the protest which has been made by many hon. Members during the Debates on the Bill, that so large an amount of money as the measure proposes should be granted to the voluntary schools without local control being given at the same time.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

COINAGE BILL.—(No. 375.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(4.38.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): While I do not wish to make any protracted observations in introducing this Bill, it is desirable that I should state briefly the amount of light sovereigns to be dealt with under it and the reasons which have actuated me in limiting the Bill to its present proportions. The Bill, as it stands, is a very simple one of only one or two clauses, and does not carry out the scheme which I hoped at one time to lay before the House—a complete scheme not only for withdrawing the light sovereigns in circulation, but for making provision for the future to put the currency in proper order. That is a task which must remain over for another year. It may be asked, however, why, if I cannot make a complete job of the matter, I should proceed with it at all. In answer to that I will only say that it is wise, at all events, that we should make some progress. The experience we have gained in the withdrawal of the pre-Victorian sovereigns was a valuable source of guidance, and if we can make a still further withdrawal of light sovereigns we shall gain yet additional experience for bringing in a complete measure by and by. The House will remember that on one occasion I proposed that £600,000—part of the surplus of the year 1889-90—should be set aside for this purpose. But owing to Parliamentary exigencies we were unable at that time to bring in a complete measure. The time has come, however, when we can no longer delay a further distinct and substantial effort to deal with those evils in the coinage, the existence of which is generally acknowledged. Therefore the Government have come to the conclusion to proceed with the present Bill, reserving the larger reforms to be dealt with on a future occasion. It may be asked why I propose a smaller amount than that which originally seemed to be the proper calculation for the withdrawal of the light sovereigns. I cannot attempt to lay down all the reasons, but I think that £400,000 will be sufficient to withdraw and to recoin a very large proportion of the light gold in existence. There are no means of showing conclusively that that sum will not be enough for the whole, because it has been borne in upon us by evidence from various quarters that the amount of coin in circulation is probably much smaller than the estimates which have been submitted. The first substantial estimate I am acquainted with is that made by Jevons in 1868, which puts the then circulation of gold coin in the country at £80,000,000. Twenty years after this I find, on inquiry at the Bank of England, that the estimate is very considerably higher—something like £120,000,000—and from this it might be argued that during that period an amount of £40,000,000 had been added to the circulation. But these and subsequent estimates have, I think, not taken into sufficient account the sovereigns in the pockets of travellers and others leaving the country. This Mr. Giffen puts at £1,000,000 a year. Mr. Martin, the banker, Mr. Palgrave, and others who have looked into this matter with very great care, have estimated that the amount of sovereigns in circulation is about £80,000,000, and that the amount of half-sovereigns is about £20,000,000, making a total of £100,000,000. Others put it at £110,000,000. All these figures are, of course, extremely shadowy. There are no means of ascertaining the facts. The figures are based on speculation only—ingenious, industrious, but still only speculation. The estimate of the pre-Victorian sovereigns, which were included in the total of £80,000,000, was £4,300,000. It was estimated that it would cost £95,000 to re-coin those £4,300,000. All the light sovereigns of the pre-Victorian period that could be found have now been withdrawn and demonetized, and it turns out that the total was not £4,300,000, but £2,300,000, or not much more than half the estimate, and that the cost was £50,000 instead of £95,000. It seems clear, then, that if practical experiment shows the pre-Victorian sovereigns to have been so much less than was estimated, it is probable also that the estimate in other directions will be too large. I have had some interesting figures given me by Mr. Giffen which I will read to the House. The amount of gold, as stated by Jevons in 1868, was £80,000,000. The gold coined from 1868 to 1889 was £72,000,000. The import of British gold coin in the same period was £90,000,000—giving a total of £242,000,000 to be accounted for. The amount of light gold coin withdrawn between 1868 and 1889 to be re-coined was £22,000,000. In the same period the exports of British gold coin amounted to £120,500,000. It is estimated that £200,000 is used every year in the Arts, which in 22 years gives a sum of £4,400,000. These sums, deducted from £242,000,000, leave a balance of £95,000,000. The leakage in the shape of gold taken out of the country by tourists and travellers is estimated at £1,000,000 yearly, so that for 22 years the amount would be £22,000,000. This reduces the £95,000,000 to £73,000,000—a sum which may be taken as perhaps the least uncertain calculation of the amount of gold in circulation. Two of these items are speculative—the amount of gold used in the Arts and the amount of the leakage. I have figures, but it would take too long to give them, with reference to gold bullion, which confirm, on the whole, the figures I have given to the House. I do not base any action upon the figures, except so far that I think it is unnecessary to ask the House to vote so large a sum as was first proposed—a sum which might ultimately prove unnecessary for the work to be done. It is perfectly possible there are less than £73,000,000 in the country; and it is perfectly possible there are more. We are still continuing our inquiries to see how far these figures ought to be modified. The next question arises—What proportion of the £73,000,000 ought to be taken as light coin? Very elaborate calculations have been made by various persons, and I do not think their estimates differ very much. The most elaborate examination was one which was undertaken by the Mint, when it had samples of coins brought simultaneously from 300 post offices. Every coin was weighed and tested, and this conclusion was arrived at: that the life of a sovereign before it is below legal weight is $19\frac{1}{2}$ years, while the life of the half-sovereign before it is below legal weight is only 9 years. The last calculation was that of sovereigns 46 per cent. were light, and of half-sovereigns 70 per cent. were light; but those proportions are reduced by the fact that we have already dealt with the pre-Victorian coins, thus bringing the proportion of light sovereigns down to 43 per cent. instead of 46. If you take 43 per cent. instead of 46 per cent., you arrive at a figure of about £32,000,000 out of £75,000,000. If you take the total at £73,000,000, about £31,000,000 would be the light gold coin in circulation. The experiment made by the Mint was carried out with very great care; but can you judge the ordinary lightness of a sovereign by taking those paid into post offices? I am not sure whether there is not more wear and tear amongst sovereigns so circulating than there is amongst coins which flow into and remain in the coffers of the banks, and which have been till-money for many years, thereby not being exposed to any friction. I submit that it is impossible to arrive at any definite conclusion on the subject, and we must content ourselves with going forward by degrees, and accordingly I ask the House for £400,000, which would have the following effect: We find that the degree of lightness per sovereign of the Victorian reign is 2.57 pence, which gives a loss of £10,700 per £1,000,000. On half-sovereigns the average deficiency is 2.65 pence—that is to say, the half-sovereign loses as much as, or rather more than, the sovereign, not in proportion, but actually; and, therefore, the loss on half-sovereigns is equal to £22,000 per £1,000,000 worth of half-sovereigns. At this rate, £400,000 would re-coin 20,000,000 of sovereigns and £8,500,000 worth of half-sovereigns, or, putting it in another way, 20,000,000 sovereign pieces and 17,000,000 half-sovereign pieces. This operation would take two or three years. Supposing there are £32,000,000 of light coins in existence, are they likely to be presented in that time? There opinions differ.

We had the greatest difficulty in getting the pre-Victorian coins in, and it was only by declaring that they should be demonetized that we could get bankers and others to bring them in. My fear is that it will take a very long time before the whole light coin which actually exists is presented to us. I hope I have made it clear, though the matter is somewhat technical, that on the one hand we cannot have any definite idea of the amount of gold in circulation, but that it may be taken at £73,000,000 or £80,000,000, or at a figure ranging in that direction. The proportion of the light coin I calculate at about 43 per cent. of sovereigns and 70 per cent. of half-sovereigns, and the cost of dealing with £30,000,000 would be about £400,000. That shows the general extent of the scheme which I submit to the House. With regard to the method, we have considered carefully how we should proceed, and we have come to the conclusion that we could not proceed by dates; at all events to do so would be extremely awkward. The dates are frequently difficult to recognise, and great trouble would be caused in examining coin by coin and sorting them. The Bank of England are of opinion, and I think bankers generally will be of opinion, that, if we have got the money and can proceed on a large scale, the Mint should be given every facility for recoinage the light coins as fast as possible, irrespective of dates. I trust that, as in the case of the light coins of the pre-Victorian reign, the House will give the Treasury a wide discretion with regard to the manner of withdrawal of the light coins now to be dealt with. Another point arises in relation to how the cost should be defrayed. Some time ago I shadowed forth that it might be necessary to tax private issues for the purpose, but since then, as the House is aware, we have had a great windfall in the profit upon silver, amounting to £600,000 in one year beyond the ordinary profit, and to £200,000 in another year, and it appears to me that this gain of £800,000 in relation to silver may provide the means. It is also a favourite idea in many quarters that there should be a charge made on the coinage of bullion. When a person brings bullion for coinage he does practically pay 1½d. an ounce, the difference between £3 17s. 9d., the price given by the Bank for bullion, and £3 17s. 10½d., the rate at which bullion is coined by the Mint. The House will be surprised to learn how comparatively small would be the amount we should raise by a Mint-charge to cover the cost of coinage, while it would involve considerable trouble to make new regulations. In recent years the coinage has been comparatively small. In the 10 years, 1881-90, the total was £26,000,000, or about £2,600,000 a year. In the years 1871-80 it was £42,000,000, or £4,200,000 a year. In 1861-70 it was £51,000,000, or about £5,000,000 a year. So there has been a continued decrease in the amount of coinage in these decennial periods, leaving out of account the sovereigns which have been supplied from Australia. As the cost of coinage for £5,000,000 is about £8,000, the cost for the average of £2,500,000 during the past 10 years has been about £4,000. The amount to be raised, therefore, by a charge equal to the cost of coinage is very small. There are other matters I might deal with, but I am anxious to get the Second Reading of the Bill to-day, leaving such matters for discussion at the next stage. I think I have given an adequate statement of the motives which have induced us to introduce the Bill, to which I hope the House will give a Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, 'That the Bill be now read a second time.'—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer).

(5.6.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman has made a very clear and important statement upon a matter which really lies deeply at the root of the commercial interests of the country, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer can scarcely expect that a measure such as this can be adequately considered and discussed at the fag-end of a Wednesday afternoon. It certainly cannot be disposed of in the remaining half-hour of this sitting, however we may compress what we have to say, and in the absence of Gentlemen well entitled to express opinions which the country will be glad to hear on a matter of this kind. This work of setting our coinage right is undertaken much too seldom. The right hon. Gentleman has said the life of a sovereign is about 18 years before it becomes light, and it is nearly 50 years since an undertaking of this kind was carried out by Sir Robert Peel in 1843; so that we have gone far beyond two such periods. The previous occasions were in 1774 and 1696. Now, these matters go a great deal beyond the question of light gold; they include a great many other questions, and I must say, with all respect to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that this is a disappointing Bill. We have had the promise of a measure for the redemption of light gold for years. A Bill of this kind might have been introduced and passed at almost any time if it is supposed that we shall pass the Second Reading at the end of a Wednesday afternoon. This question of the coinage is connected with a number of other matters besides that of the actual withdrawal of light coinage, and has been so connected by the right hon. Gentleman himself in speeches which he has delivered. The right hon. Gentleman connected it, for instance, with the question of the issue of £1 notes—an important and far-reaching question. He has connected it still more with what I must call an alarmist policy on his part, and which, in my opinion, requires a thorough examination, without which it is calculated to produce a most injurious effect on the credit of the country. The right hon. Gentleman said—not in this House, which I regret, for I think it is a question that should have been discussed here—

“The present condition of the currency of the country requires a solution, and is essential to a sound condition of our commercial position.”

After the Baring catastrophe, when I should have thought what was required was something like a re-assurance to the country, and not a further alarm, he connecting this with the question of currency—

*MR. GOSCHEN: Not coinage.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes, he referred to this specially as bearing upon the withdrawal of light gold. He led the public to believe by his speech that the gold reserves of the Bank of England and of the private banks were insufficient, and stated that he was engaged in devising some scheme by which to strengthen the permanent gold reserves of the country. A more important and alarming statement for the commercial interests of the country it was impossible to make, and I must say I feel it my duty in this House to question the right of the Finance Minister in this country to hold language of this kind and not be prepared to come before the House of Commons with a remedy necessary in such a state of things to save the credit of the commerce of this country. It is now more than six months since he used that language. He stated at the time that the remedy he proposed for the creation of a new reserve of gold should be connected with a light coinage measure; but he introduces his Light Coinage Bill now without any remedy for the state of things he described. The right hon. Gentleman said at Leeds he was hopefully engaged, with the assistance of the Bank of England, in devising a means for strengthening our permanent gold reserves by which greater help would be given in an emergency, and by which he hoped panics of coming catastrophe might be avoided, and that he was preparing the draft of a Bill to effect this object. Well, but that was six months ago! Are you going on for 12 months after making these alarming statements, having told the country its commercial system is unsound and its bank reserves insufficient, before making any proposal to the House of Commons? This condition of vague and vacillating finance is not to the advantage of the commerce of the country. It is impossible to exaggerate the language in which the right hon. Gentleman indicated the commercial danger and if there is such a danger, then it is the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come forward with proposals for the defence of the commerce of England from the danger threatening it. The issue of £1 notes was indicated to protect the reserves of gold, the larger basis of currency on which the credit of the country was to rely. How are we to go on with the absence of a provision to meet the danger threatening us? What is the nature of the reserve, when these alarms are being, as I venture to think, from the best information I can obtain, most unnecessarily raised? When Sir R. Peel passed the Bank Charter Act in 1840, it was estimated that £7,000,000 might be the amount of the active circulation which might not be covered by gold. Since then the gold basis has been very much strengthened, and in recent years the balance in the Bank has on several occasions exceeded the active circulation. Upon the average of late years the circulation not covered by gold has not reached one-half the figure contemplated by Sir R. Peel.
Sir W. Harcourt

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to give a wrong impression. I never wished to throw a single word of doubt or discredit on the absolute security of the circulation of the country. All my observations were directed to the reserve.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am glad the right hon. Gentleman has given that explanation. I was directing my remarks against the mischievous and, as I believe, unwarranted gold scare which is abroad, to the effect that there is too little gold in the country and the world to carry on its business transactions. I agree that the experts have been entirely wrong. Gentlemen who have tried to solve an equation with half-a-dozen unknown quantities have naturally failed to arrive at any solid result. In an interesting and instructive paper written by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, seven or eight years ago, he attributed some of the difficulties of commerce to the enormous demands of the Continent for gold coin. He put it then at £200,000,000, and he said, speaking of the English coinage, that it had enormously increased in proportion to the growth of population. The conclusions he then arrived at were drawn upon an erroneous basis. So far from there being more coin required in this country, there is now less coin than formerly. Why? Because everybody knows that coin forms an infinitesimally small part of the transactions of the people. In London it forms, I suppose, not more than 1 per cent., and in the provinces very little more. Since the Chancellor of the Exchequer attributed so large a demand to the Continent, it is estimated that £20,000,000 in gold have been produced every year, and though estimates differ as to the amount which goes to art and the amount which goes to the Mint, the lowest estimate gives half the quantity to the production of coin. These are very serious matters. There never was a time when it was more important to satisfy the commercial community that there is no foundation for the opinion that there has been an enormous demand for gold for the Continent which has disturbed the relation of values, and it is necessary that something should be done. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has said nothing as to the regular drain of gold to the East, which is unquestionably very large, and sovereigns are melted up for that purpose. Although replacing the coin on full weight has its advantages—the full-weight coin unquestionably invites bankers and others to send the money into the Bank of England—it operates in another direction, for it is a gratuitous assay to the world; when gold is wanted the coin is melted down. In Jersey they used to ask for light sovereigns and half-sovereigns, because they would not go to France, whereas if they were of full weight they would be exported. Now, there are a great many aspects of this question which it is extremely desirable should be discussed in this House, as I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will recognise. I had reason to hope that this Bill would have been the first order to-day. Not only am I disappointed that the Bill comes before us as a simple Coinage Bill; I am also disappointed that the Bill contains no sort of scheme for keeping the gold coinage in good order after it has once been set right. Although it is the theory that the last holder must bear the loss on light gold, that is impracticable, and cannot be acted upon. I remember, as a boy, the time when a shopkeeper produced a pair of scales and weighed the coin you tendered; but that would be intolerable, and cannot be carried out. I do not adopt the view that the cost should be paid from the fiduciary issue; I agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer it should come from Imperial taxation, or that the cost of re-coining should be paid out of the profit on the silver and bronze coinage; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised that he would establish a fund to keep the coinage in order. What has become of that fund? Why is no plan of that kind laid before the House? I cannot understand why it should not be possible by a single clause in this Bill to establish a system by which the coinage should not again be allowed to fall into the condition in which we now find it. If the opportunity offered, I could show by the calculations made in 1881, that the loss on the gold coinage is about £50,000 a year, and for years have we been promised a system for dealing with this.

It being half an hour after Five of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

CRIMEAN AND INDIAN MUTINY
VETERANS.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can now state what steps he proposes to take this Session with reference to the relief of Crimean and Indian Mutiny veterans?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Yes, Sir; I propose to make a commencement this year on the lines I have already stated to the House.
No legislation will be necessary.

THE THIRD PRESIDENCY MAGISTRACY OF BOMBAY.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether a Memorandum has been received from the Bombay Presidency Association strongly protesting against Lord Harris's intended appointment of
Mr. Webb to be Third Presidency Magistrate of Bombay; and whether the Government can now state their decision?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE
FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham):
The Memorandum has been received at the India Office, and is under the consideration of the Secretary of State. No decision has yet been arrived at.

ST. AUGUSTINE'S BOYS' SCHOOL,
KILBURN.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Vice President of Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the statement of accounts of the St. Augustine's Boys' School, Kilburn, published in the annual statement of the work and funds of the parish for the year ending December, 1889, in which appear the following items to the debit of the schools, namely, Sunday school expenses and deficit on treats, £26 12s. 9d.; half expenses of parish house, £16 8s. 8d.; whether these items appear in the school accounts for the corresponding period which were sent to the Department; and whether these sums are a legal expenditure from the school fund under Article 90 of the Code; if not, what steps will the Department take in the matter.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The statement from which the hon. Member has quoted includes, according to my information, the accounts of both day and Sunday schools, which are thrown together for convenience sake in a communication made by the vicar to his own people. From the accounts furnished to this Department every item connected with the Sunday school is rigidly excluded, and only such part of the expenses of the parish rooms as covers the application of one of them to the purposes of a public elementary school is recognised by the Department.

MR. PICTON: Is there an audit of the accounts on behalf of the Paymaster?

SIR W. HART DYKE: Certainly. The accounts are subjected to a rigid audit.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): What does the right hon. Gentleman mean by a rigid audit?

SIR W. HART DYKE: Every item in the accounts is challenged, and vouchers are asked for.

MR. MORTON: That is not done in some cases that I am acquainted with.

LOCAL CARRIERS.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a person residing in a country village, who gives a note to the local carrier containing orders to a tradesman to supply him through such carrier with certain articles, is liable himself or renders the carrier liable to a legal penalty; whether such note, if carried as a parcel, would render either of them liable to such penalty; and what is the official definition, in such cases, of a letter and a parcel respectively?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): A note sent in the manner described by the Hon. Member would be an infringement of the Act of Parliament, 1 Vic. c. 33 Sec. 2, and the person sending it, and also the carrier conveying it, whether as a parcel or otherwise, would be liable to penalties. A common carrier is expressly forbidden to carry a letter by the Act. The reply to the second paragraph is in the affirmative. A letter made up into a parcel would come under the definition of a letter.

MILITARY OFFICERS AS DIRECTORS OF COMPANIES.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the War Office order forbidding officers on full pay to act as directors of Companies without special permission applies to officers who were acting as directors before the issue of the order; if he can say how many officers on full pay are now acting as directors of Public Companies; and, whether it was or was not by permission that an officer, holding a high position as head of a Military Department of special importance at the present time, was recently advertised as the director of one gold mining company and vendor to another?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The Order in question applies to all officers now on full pay, but I am not able to say how many officers on full pay were acting as directors of companies at the time the Order was issued. Before that time there was nothing to prevent an officer on full pay from serving as a director of a public company, but on hearing of this Order the officer alluded to in the question of my hon. Friend at once withdrew from the directorate.

THE COMMITTEE ON RECRUITING.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what witnesses specially representing the non-commissioned officers and privates of the Regular Forces have been examined by the War Office Committee on Recruiting; whether it is intended to take the evidence of several such witnesses on a subject specially affecting those ranks; and what are the terms of the reference to the Committee generally?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The War Office Committee on Recruiting are now engaged in considering the soldier's pay, promotion, and prospects, and other inducements to enter the Service. They have already taken the evidence of some officers who have served in the ranks, and they have other witnesses on their list who in due course will be called before the Committee, who may be considered to specially represent the opinions of the warrant and non-commissioned officers and rank and file of the Army.

THE DUBLIN POSTMEN.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will state the nature of the proposals lately made by him to the Treasury with reference to the Dublin postmen; and whether the Treasury has agreed to his recommendations?

*MR. RAIKES: The Treasury has not yet decided upon my recommendations, and until it has done so, it would not be in accordance with usage to make the nature of them known.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): This matter has been so long pending that I think it will be necessary to raise it upon the Treasury Vote, and ask for an explanation.

*MR. RAIKES: I think the hon. Gentleman will get the answer before then.

THE NORFOLK COUNTY COUNCIL.

MR. GURDON (Norfolk, Mid): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the expenses incurred by the Norfolk County Council in connection with the Provisional Order made by them for the purchase of lands in the parish of St. Faith's, including the costs before the Committee of this House, ought to be borne by the parish of St. Faith's or by the Sanitary Authority?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Lower Hamlets, St. George's): The County Council in this case have proceeded under the Allotments Act of 1890 on the default of the Rural Sanitary Authority of the St. Faith's Union. Having regard to the provisions of Section 6 of that Act it appears to me that the expenses incurred by the County Council in connection with the Provisional Order for the compulsory purchase of lands are to be paid in the first instance out of the county fund, and are to be repaid to the County Council by the Rural Sanitary Authority, and borne as general expenses by the whole Rural Sanitary District and not by the parish of St. Faith's only.

MAIL STEAMERS IN COLONIAL PORTS.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been drawn to the practice which obtains in some Colonial ports of granting special permission to mail steamers to load and unload their cargoes on Sunday, thereby setting a precedent for the owners of ordinary cargo boats to seek the same facilities; and whether he will take into consideration the possibility of reducing the number of Sundays on which the working of coals and cargoes on board mail steamers is made a necessity?

*MR. RAIKES: My attention has been drawn to the subject referred to by the hon. Member. I may say that, so far as the Post Office is concerned, every effort is made to arrange the itineraries of British Contract Mail Packets so as to avoid Sunday calls at Foreign and Colonial ports, and I am glad to be able to state that such calls are rare under present arrangements. Without serious detriment to the mail service, however, it would be impossible altogether to avoid Sunday calls in certain isolated cases. I think I may, therefore, say that the suggestion conveyed in the hon. Member's second question has already been complied with.

QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will inform the House why the annual account of the Commissioners of Queen Anne's Bounty has not yet been presented; and whether the account will give information as to the situation, value, and acreage of the ground rents and reversions which have been purchased by the said Commissioners?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The account of the Commissioners of Queen Anne's Bounty is in course of preparation, and will be laid before Parliament during the present Session. The Act of Parliament does not require it to be presented until next Session. The situation of the ground rents which the Board have purchased will be generally quoted in the account, but the acreage will not be shown, and no estimate of the value of reversions will be given.

BALBRIGGAN HARBOUR.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.) (for Mr. CLANCY, Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the present condition of Balbriggan Harbour; and whether he is aware that a considerable sum of money has been lent by the Board of Works for harbour works in that port on the security of the port dues, and that, owing to the fact that the Dublin Port and Docks Board has allowed the harbour to be filled up, especially at its entrance, with mud and sand, very few vessels or boats now visit the port, and the harbour dues are consequently diminishing year by year; and, if so, whether any steps will be taken to clean out the harbour, and so preserve the security for the repayment of the loan made by the Board of Works?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): A loan of £1,700 for Balbriggan Harbour was made in 1868, and there are arrears upon it of over £1,200. The harbour is controlled by the Dublin Ports and Docks Board through a Local Harbour Committee, with whom must rest the responsibility for the state of the harbour.

MR. SEXTON: Is there no means of obliging the Dublin Port and Docks Board to keep the harbour in a proper condition?

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid we have no power in the matter at all.

MR. CAREW: I beg also to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that the repayments of the loans made under the Sea Fisheries Act of 1883 amount this year to nearly £4,000, he will consider the practicability of employing that sum of money this year in the improvement of the harbours of Rush and Balbriggan?

MR. JACKSON: The repayments of loans made under the Sea Fisheries Act of 1883 have been already hypothecated for other works than those referred to by the hon. Member.

Mr. Stuart Wortley

WHITEABBEY (BELFAST) INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has yet determined to grant a certificate in the case of the Whiteabbey (Belfast) Industrial School, which has been under consideration during the past two years?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): This question appears to relate to the St. Patrick's Female Industrial School, Belfast, the managers of which have also, it seems, erected premises at Whiteabbey. The school is certified for 110 inmates. Applications have been received for an extension in the number so certified for and have had careful consideration, but, in view of the stronger claims of other industrial schools and the existing heavy and growing expenditure in connection with the industrial school system in Ireland, my right hon. Friend has with regret felt himself unable to comply with the request, a decision which was duly communicated to those interested.

VIVISECTION.

MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to Report of the Inspector of Vivisection, that he only knows of one case in which the operation of inoculation in the eye has been practised in this country. In that case he reports that the change in the eye was microscopic, and that the animal was quite free from pain, whether his attention has since been called to the Supplement to the 19th Annual Report of the Local Government Board containing a report by Dr. Klein, showing that both last year and the year before he inoculated the eyes of many cats, and that in many cases the whole centre of the cat's cornea was transformed into a deep crater-like ulcer, and that these cats lived for about three weeks suffering from the disease; whether he will ask the Inspector why he reported that there was only one such case of inoculation in this country, that it was microscopic, and whether, in view of Dr. Klein's report, he still adheres to that statement; and whether he will take any steps to prevent these experiments being continued?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The Inspector reported to me that he had himself seen only one case of what is technically called "inoculation of the interior chamber of the eye" since he had been Inspector. This operation is quite distinct from the application of injective material to the surface of the eye, which was the procedure in Dr. Klein's experiments. Moreover, those experiments were made before Dr. Poore was appointed Inspector, and were performed not in this country, but in Hungary. The Inspector adheres absolutely to the statement made by him, which was a correct reply to the specific question addressed to me on June 15. I am informed that Dr. Klein's experiments, as tending to prove that diphtheria may be communicated from cats to human beings, are of first-rate importance for the prevention of a disease which is on the increase. As I before stated, it is a condition of the licence under which they are performed that if severe pain be induced the animal shall be immediately killed under anæsthetics. I have no reason to believe that this condition is disregarded, and I do not propose to interfere with the lawful exercise by scientific men of methods of experimentation which may result in great benefit to the human race.

MR. M'LAREN: Am I to understand that the experiments in this case were performed in Hungary?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes; that is so.

URBAN SANITARY DISTRICTS.

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state the number of urban sanitary districts in England and Wales with a population under 2,000, and how many of these have a population under 1,300?

*MR. RITCHIE: There are 117 urban sanitary districts which, according to the Census of 1881, had a population under 2,000. Of these, 43 had a population of less than 1,300. In the great majority of these cases the districts were constituted at a time when the owners and ratepayers were empowered to form a district without the consent of any Central Authority.

PORTLAND CONVICT PRISON.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton):

I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that in the E quarters of Portland Convict Prison there are 60 sets of rooms for the use of assistant and other warders and their families, each set consisting of three rooms, namely, a general living room, without scullery accommodation, measuring 15 feet by 13 feet, and two bedrooms, each measuring 11 feet by 8 feet; whether he is aware that none of these sets of rooms exceed 8 feet 4 inches in height; whether he is aware that the assistant warders are obliged to pay £9 2s. yearly for each set of rooms in these quarters, and are compelled to live in them; whether he is aware that some of the assistant warders living in these sets of rooms have as many as six, eight, and even nine children in their families; whether he is aware that the Medical Officer of Health for Portland has condemned the overcrowding of these quarters, as being most dangerous to health; and whether he will take such steps as may be necessary to remedy this state of things?

MR. MATTHEWS: The statement as to the E quarters and the size of the rooms is correct. The assistant warders pay no rent for these quarters. There are at present 50 of them who are obliged by the necessities of the service to occupy them. Some of the warders have large families. In the case of three whose families amounted to 10 persons they were offered double quarters and refused them. The report of the local Officer of Health refers, not to the E quarters, but to a hired block of buildings some 100 yards distant, called Clifton Cottages, now no longer leased by the Government. The lease was relinquished on account of the unsatisfactory condition of this block. The E quarters were built 37 years ago, and are certainly not up to modern requirements. I will direct the Surveyor General of Prisons to make a special Report on the best mode of improving them. The health of the warders in the E quarters has, however, been satisfactory, and the Prison Medical Officer inspects them once a quarter.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

MR. STERN (Suffolk, Stowmarket): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Government will advance loans to the Rural Sanitary Authorities for the purpose of building cottages under "The Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890;" and, if such loans can be obtained, upon what terms; and what is the rate of interest and period for repayment on loans to Municipal Corporations?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Public Works Loan Commissioners are empowered to make advances for the purpose of the erection of labourers' dwellings, and by Section 83 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, it is provided that any loan advanced by the Commissioners under that Act or for labourers' dwellings under the Public Works Loans Act, 1875, shall bear such rate of interest, not less than $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, as the Treasury may from time to time authorise as being in their opinion sufficient to enable such loan to be made without loss to the Exchequer. The period for which a loan would be sanctioned by the Local Government Board would be determined with reference to the buildings which it was proposed to erect and after a local inquiry as to the scheme, and the period for repayment in the case of loans to Municipal Corporations, under the Municipal Corporations Act or the Public Health Act, would depend upon the nature of the works for which a loan was required. If the loan was advanced by the Public Works Loan Commissioners upon the recommendation of the Board the rate of interest would vary according to the period allowed for the repayment of the loan, the minimum rate of interest being at present $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

In reply to a question by Sir J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield),

*MR. RITCHIE said: The rate of interest increases with the length of time for which the advance is required.

IMPORTATION OF DYNAMITE INTO THE TRANSVAAL.

MR. BAIRD (Glasgow, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether representations have been made to the Secretary of State by certain manufacturers of explosives in this country that dynamite in bulk, manufactured in France, is admitted into the South African Republic duty free, while all applications to the Government of that Republic for permission to import dynamite of British manufacture, when acceded to at all, were only granted subject to the payment of duty, and that since January last all such applications have been peremptorily refused; and whether, in view of the provisions in the Convention of 1881 and 1884 between Her Majesty's Government and the South African Republic, the Secretary of State will undertake to communicate with the President of that Republic with a view to obtain for British manufacturers of explosives the same rights of importation of dynamite into the South African Republic as are now being accorded to the dynamite manufactured in France?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): A representation of the nature described by my hon. Friend has been received; and a communication on the subject will be addressed to Sir H. Loch by to-morrow's mail.

DOCKYARD EMPLOYÉS.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, if the Labour Commission should desire the evidence of any of the employés in the Royal Dockyards, the Admiralty will offer any objection to their attendance before the Commission?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. FORWOOD, Lancashire, S.W., Ormskirk): The Admiralty will offer no objection.

GRIEVANCES OF PRISON OFFICERS.

MR. E. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Rochester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Committee appointed to inquire into the grievances of prison officers has yet finished its work; and, if so, when the Report of the inquiry will be made known?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Committee on the grievances of prison officers has not yet reported. It is not usual to publish the Reports of Departmental Committees, which are of a confidential nature ; but I shall in due course be prepared to state what my decision may be upon that Report.

SCHOOL EXAMINATION.

MR. HERMON-HODGE (Lancashire, Accrington): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether some of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools occasionally exempt schools from examination on account of successful results in former years ; and whether it has been brought to his notice that this has proved to be a hardship in the case of some children who have thus been deprived of an opportunity of obtaining the labour certificate necessary to enable them to get half-time or full-time employment?

SIR W. HART DYKE: The practice to which my hon. Friend refers is not uncommon, and has operated to the advantage of all concerned, for the case of any number of children who require labour certificates can always be met by a special examination, which the Inspector is authorised to hold at the request of the Local Authority.

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any and what difficulties have been experienced with regard to forwarding articles to analysts through the post office as registered letters, in accordance with Section 16 of "The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875;" whether any and, if so, what controversy has arisen as to the construction of that section ; and whether the Law Officers of the Crown or the Home Secretary have been consulted as to the advisability of altering the said section in the manner proposed in the Post Office Acts Amendment Bill?

MR. RAIKES: The difficulty hitherto experienced has been in regard to liquids and other things ordinarily excluded from the Letter Post, the view of the Department being that Section 16 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, does not override the ordinary law prohibiting the transmission of such things by Letter Post. Some difference of opinion arose with the Local Government Board on the subject, but all difficulties have now been overcome, and it has been arranged that the articles in question shall be sent by "Registered Parcel Post" in future. I have placed an Amendment on the Paper to make this clear, and my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board concurs in the arrangement now proposed.

MAINTENANCE OF HIGHWAYS.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if any further decisions have been given by the Department on appeals from Quarter Session boroughs from County Councils as to the maintaining of highways in addition to those of Dover, Carlisle, Grantham, Scarborough, and Banbury ; and if the place and particulars of such decisions are accessible to Members whose constituencies are concerned in this matter?

MR. RITCHIE: There is only one case besides those mentioned in the question in which a decision has been given by the Local Government Board on an application from a Quarter Sessions borough that roads within the borough may be declared main roads. The Borough of Abingdon is the case to which I allude. The Board were unable there to comply with the application of the Town Council. If the hon. Member will inform me of the particulars as regards that case with which he desires to be furnished, I will see whether they can be supplied.

SWAZILAND.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies how many of the Swaziland concessions have been ratified by the Court ; and whether they have refused to ratify any of them ; and, if so, what are the concessions for that have been refused ratification?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Court appears to have confirmed in whole or in part, absolutely or on terms, 344 concessions. They refused to confirm seven ; of which four related to land or mineral right, the three others being respectively, for the exclusive right to apply for concessions ; the exclusive right of instituting lotteries and sweepstakes ; and the exclusive right of laying out townships.

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helens): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether, in view of the fact that the Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill has been reported against by the Government Inspectors, the Government intend to oppose the said Bill?

MR. MADDEN: As the Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill referred to is opposed, there appears to be little prospect of its being proceeded further with this Session.

IMPERIAL INSTITUTE—TRADE DISPUTES.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the contractors of the Imperial Institute are being allowed to pass the men they have engaged to take the place of their carpenters now on strike through the buildings of the South Kensington Museum, with the object of preventing the pickets from having access to them; and, if so, whether he will at once give instructions that public buildings shall not be utilised for the purpose of advantaging one side in a private labour dispute?

SIR W. HART DYKE: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer this question. I find that some of the men referred to did pass two or three times through the Museum buildings. They are not doing so now. The hon. Member is quite mistaken if he supposes, as is suggested by his question, that the Museum authorities have sided with one party or the other in the dispute.

MARRIAGES OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what regulations have been made for carrying out the provisions of "The Marriage Act, 1890"; whether any decision has been arrived at in regard to the issuing of Orders in Council determining the conditions under which, and the mode in which, marriages solemnised in accordance with the law of a foreign country may be registered by British Consuls; and, in the event of any amendment of the Act of 1890 being necessary, when is it proposed that a Bill for that purpose will be introduced?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FRUGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Two Orders in Council have been issued to give effect to certain portions of the Marriage Act, 1890; but as doubts have arisen as to how far Her Majesty would be justified in issuing an Order in Council regulating the mode and conditions of registering by British Consuls marriages celebrated in accordance with the laws of foreign countries, no such Order has yet been issued. Moreover, other difficulties have presented themselves with respect to marriages under the Consular Marriage Act, 1849, and in Embassies and on board Her Majesty's ships. Some, but not all, of these difficulties were removed by the Act of 1890, and by the Order in Council made under it on the 22nd of November, 1890. But that Order in Council is not sufficient to bring the Act into full operation, and further legislation is required to remove difficulties either not removed by the Act of 1890, or arising out of that Act. Some of the provisions required for these objects have been the subject of consultations which have delayed a decision till the present advanced period of the Session, but a Bill has now been drafted for the purpose. The First Lord of the Treasury has informed the House that he will not introduce further measures of any controversial nature. The hardships involved by uncertainty of the law in regard to marriage are so serious that it is undesirable that any delay should take place in remedying them, and it has therefore been resolved to introduce the Bill, notice of which will be given to-night; but it must be understood that it can only be passed if it meets with no opposition.

SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is prepared to assent to the Return on the Order Paper for to-day in regard to the consideration of Spirituous Liquors?

MR. JACKSON: The information asked for has already appeared in Parliamentary Papers. I shall be glad to give the hon. Gentleman any further information he may desire.

POWERS OF COURTS OF QUARTER SESSIONS.

MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, under Section 9, Sub-section 3, of the Local Government Act of 1888, a Court of Quarter Sessions has power, as such, to give orders to the chief constable of a county on general matters relating to the preservation of the peace within the county, or to require a Report from him; or whether the reservation made by such sub-section merely preserves to the Local Justices their previous powers to give such orders as to the preservation of the peace in their respective districts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The question of the hon. and learned Member is of so abstract a character that it is difficult to give any answer that will be of any value to him; but, in my judgment, Justices of the Peace have the same powers as they had before the passing of the Act in the matter of the preservation of the peace, for the prevention of offences, and the apprehension of offenders.

In reply to a further question by Mr. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS, SIR R. WEBSTER said: I understand the question to be directed to the duty of Justices of Quarter Sessions. I do not understand that the Local Government Act gives the Joint Committee any part of the jurisdiction of the Local Justices, either at Quarter or Petty Sessions.

CYPRUS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to the falling off of trade between Cyprus and the United Kingdom since direct postal communication between the two countries has been abandoned, and to the offer of Bell's Asia Minor Steamship Company to provide such communication for a small subsidy; and whether, in view of the importance, for purposes of defence and trade, of maintaining direct steamboat communication between Great Britain and all her Colonies, Her Majesty's Government will consider the expediency of taking steps to revive the contract?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Government are not prepared to accept the offer made to them by Bell's Asia Minor Steamship Company for a subsidised mail service to Cyprus. The hon. Member is under a misapprehension in supposing that the trade between England and Cyprus has fallen off since the Company in question ceased to receive a subsidy. It has, in fact, risen from an average of £100,000 a year to an average of £127,000 a year.

MOTION.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (MONEY) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Jackson, Bill to further amend the Acts relating to the raising of money by the London County Council; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jackson and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 407.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES 1891-2.

Considered in Committee.

CLASS II.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £33,592, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for the salaries and expenses in the offices of the House of Commons.

(3.55.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) on a previous occasion called attention to the item of £1,000 for the Servants and Refreshment Rooms, and made a charge of sweating in the method of hiring the servants. The Chairman of the Refreshment Committee, in reply, said that it was not in the province of the House of Commons to interfere in the matter. Now, if sweating had been going on, I thought it was the duty of the House to interfere in the matter; and not being able to get a satisfactory reply in that quarter, I obtained from the manager the information that the men were employed about three hours a day, and were really better paid than any men of the same class in London. They receive 3s. for an average work of about three hours a day, and they get their dinner as well. The impression has gone abroad that there is sweating here the same as at the docks; but as far as I have been able to procure any evidence, the statement that sweating goes on is not accurate. It is necessary in this House as well as in the docks to employ occasional labour, but I do not find that sweating has ever gone on. At the same time, I think that we ought to have some control over the Refreshment Committee. As we give the Committee £1,000 we ought to have a Report telling us what is done with the money. I do not propose to raise the question this year, but unless I receive a satisfactory explanation I will certainly raise it again another year.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £100, although I do not desire to take that amount from the Refreshment Committee or the servants. We get very good attendance in the Dining Room, but hon. Members have a strong objection to the waiters congregating in the Court-yard early in the evening, like the dock labourers do when they are seeking work. I should like to see an arrangement made which would prevent the waiters from hanging about looking after work. I wish also to know—first, whether tea and coffee cannot be served to Members at the bar in the Inner Lobby; and, secondly, whether the sale of spirituous liquors at that bar cannot be done away with altogether. I think we ought to begin by setting a good example to the country. I do not go so far as to propose that we should do away with the sale of intoxicating liquors in all parts of the House, but I think we might make a good beginning by doing away with the sale of them in the Inner Lobby. Last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to spend a large sum to compensate publicans whose interest might be affected by the closing of public houses; but if we close this bar, I am not aware that any compensation will be necessary. If at the bar we could have tea and coffee instead of intoxicating liquors, I believe they would be much preferred by most Members, and we should set a good example to the country. It is all very well to advise the working man to give up intoxicating liquors, but he naturally makes the reply that while we propose to get rid of the poor man's pint of beer, we take no step in the same direction on our own account. If we get rid of our own bar the charge can no longer be made against us; and with a view of bringing about such a change, I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Item F, of £10,338, Department of Sergeant at Arms, be reduced by the sum of £100.—(Mr. Morton.)

*(4.0.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): It strike me that this is bringing local option pretty well home, and I hope the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton) will have the courage of his opinions and divide the Committee. A great many hon. Members are local optionists abroad, and I shall be glad to see what steps they will take now that the question has been brought to the door of the House of Commons itself. I heartily thank the hon. Member for giving in a fair and square manner the opportunity of testing these local option professions which I have always held to be worth nothing at all.

*A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT, Croydon): I am certainly not prepared to take part in a Debate on the temperance question raised upon this Vote. I may point out, however, that a great many Members of the House would be rather unwilling to sacrifice their arrangements and comforts for the sake of providing an argument in the country for the hon. Member for Peterborough. No doubt the Committee is aware that a considerable number of hon. Members prefer the less stimulating drinks of tea and coffee; but the conveniences for obtaining those beverages are very facile at the present time, and I do not think it is desirable that these things should be sold exclusively at the bar in the Inner Lobby. I am not prepared to take the position of saying that intoxicating liquors should be altogether abolished from the bar. If the hon. Member will reflect, and look back upon the history of the past, I think he will find that a great many illustrious Members of the House have taken considerable advantage of the proximity of this bar when, having to undertake important Parliamentary business, they have been unable to go away to dine. Under these circumstances, I think it would be inconvenient to entirely abolish the sale of intoxicating liquors at the bar in favour of tea and coffee and lemon squash, of which there is, I am told, a very considerable sale already. In reply to the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark), I may say that the subject of the waiters is engaging the attention of the Kitchen Committee, but I think it is not a question which ought to be discussed across the floor of the House. It is a question of the economic working of the Department; and if the suggestion of the hon. Member is carried out, not only would it involve higher payment and the granting of a larger sum to the Kitchen Committee, but it would also throw out of employment the men who come now in the evening and would result in engaging a different class of men.

(4.5.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): Although I do not agree in all respects with all the views expressed by the hon. Member for Peterborough, yet I have considerable sympathy with them. It has long seemed to me that the present position of the bar is, I would not say a scandal, but, at all events, an eyesore. If a stranger is introduced into the Inner Lobby to see the House of Commons, the first things he is saluted with are the popping of corks, the clinking of tumblers, and the drinking of liquids on the part of Members of the House. It is quite necessary that some provision should be made for supplying Members with refreshments in close proximity to the House; but it would, I think, be better in every respect if the accommodation were placed in some position equally accessible as at present, and yet not so openly obtruded upon public observation, and I hope this point will be borne in mind in any re-arrangement. In the meantime, there is one question I would like to ask, and I do so in complete ignorance upon the subject. I would like to know whether the House of Commons has a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors? Those liquors are sold not only to Members of the House, but also to strangers, and I am under the impression that no one has obtained a licence for sale in the House.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): As a teetotaler, I will not follow in the protestations which have been made about local option, but I will merely join with the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) in expressing the hope that the hon. Member for Peterborough will press his Motion to a Division. I hold that on the part of many Members the protestations of local option are not only illusory, but are absolutely mendacious, and are merely intended to catch votes.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): The practical view of the matter is this: that if a Member wants a "pick-me-up" in a hurry, he can go at once to the bar and get a glass of sherry or whisky, or even a lemon squash, whereas if he wants tea or coffee he has to go three chambers off for it, and to wait a long time and go through various ceremonies before he gets it. I think that the consumption of all these liquids should be put on a more equal footing.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: The Refreshment Committee will consider the question of introducing tea and coffee at the bar at their next meeting.

(4.10.) MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Isle of Thanet): I quite agree with the manifest inconsistency of denouncing other persons for having the privilege of obtaining intoxicating liquors and obtaining it oneself, and I hope the hon. Member for Peterborough will divide the House on the question. I shall not, however, vote with him myself, because I have uniformly denounced the system of depriving others of privileges which I have no intention of surrendering myself, but I hope the Division List will show who are sincere in their belief that the deprivation of personal liberty is a step in the right direction, or, if hon. Members like it better, that it is wise for the House to get rid of a so-called monopoly. In order that the House may show an example of obedience to the law, I would be glad if the Secretary to the Treasury will inform us whether a licence has been duly obtained for the sale of intoxicating liquors in this building, and in whose name it stands?

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I accept the challenge which has been thrown out to local optionists in this matter. I shall vote against the Motion, and I shall do so as a local optionist. The question is purely one of local option, and surely hon. Members are able to judge for themselves whether they require intoxicating liquors for refreshment or not, in the House or out of it. I think it should be in the power of every district in the country to say whether they will have the sale of intoxicating liquors or not. It would be an unreasonable thing to prevent persons of grown age, like hon. Members, from getting a glass of sherry or claret at the bar of the House. Personally, I believe I have only had three glasses of intoxicating liquors at the bar since I have been a Member of the House, but I wish to preserve for others that liberty which, to a moderate degree, I have exercised for myself.

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I believe the time will come when the House will not permit any intoxicating liquors to be sold within its precincts, and I hope the Motion will be pressed to a Division in order to test the present state of feeling among hon. Members on the question.

MR. COWLEY LAMBERT (Islington, E.): I cannot help fearing that if tea and coffee are introduced the clatter of tea spoons and cups and saucers at the bar may lead strangers who come to visit the House to think that hon. Members are a parcel of old women rather than men who are well able to take care of themselves.

MR. MORTON: I shall certainly, after what has been said by the hon. Member for South Tyrone, divide the Committee. I do not move the Motion in any sense from personal considerations. The Chairman of the Kitchen Committee has told us about eminent Members of the House who have taken advantage of a lull in the Debates to rush into the Lobby, owing to the close proximity of the bar. The hon. Gentleman did not state for what object, but I suppose it was for a "pick-me-up." What I want is to remove that temptation from those who cannot resist it, and to do away with the unfortunate privilege we now enjoy of being able readily to obtain intoxicating liquors. Above all, I want the Members of this House to set a good example to the people of this country, and, therefore, I desire to do away with the sale of intoxicating liquors in the precincts of the House. All I ask is that we should make a good beginning in regard to ourselves, and leave others to do as they like.

(4.15.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I am inclined to think that persons outside, when they read this Debate, will be induced to think that the House of Commons is very much addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors. My hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough has referred to his own convictions upon the subject, and he seeks to remove what he calls "the temptation." Now, I regard the remarks of the hon. Member as an extremely unjust attack on the character of the House of Commons. It is certainly unjust to convey to the outside public the impression that the accommodation of the bar in the Inner Lobby is very much abused, and that this Assembly includes a number of men who are given to the excessive use of intoxicating liquors.

MR. MORTON: I never intended to make any such charge or insinuation.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I am glad to have drawn that disclaimer from the hon. Member, because the inference to be logically drawn from his remarks was that a certain number of Members of this House are so weak that the proximity of the bar is a great temptation to them, and that, therefore, the bar ought to be removed. Such an inference is most unjust, and although we all know the history of the younger Pitt, yet the present House of Commons is as free from reproach in this respect as any Assembly in the world. My right hon. Friend who spoke from the Front Bench (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) complained that the bar is at present in too public a place, and he suggested that it should be removed to a less conspicuous position. I do not know how far such an arrangement may be practicable. I know quite well that the use of tonics between meals is dangerous, but if I felt that I wanted them I certainly should not be ashamed to take them. But where there is no choice there cannot be much merit, and I shall vote against the Motion with a light heart, believing that the refreshment bar ought to be retained.

(4.20.) MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM: I wish to protest against Members catching votes on the hustings with a plea whether in favour of the doctrines of local option or of an Eight Hours Bill, on account of advocating which the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Roby) owes his seat in this House—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is now entering into debateable matter which is not relevant to the question before the Committee. He must be aware that, in pursuing such a course, he is committing a gross offence against the Rules of the House.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM: For the gross offence I will apologise, but I must protest against hon. Members, when the question is brought home to themselves, running away from it, raising specious arguments, and acting entirely contrary to the professions to which many hon. Members on the Benches around me owe their seats.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I am going to vote for this Motion just in the same way that I should vote if local option were the law of the land. I shall vote for the exclusion of intoxicating liquors from the precincts of this building just as I would vote for the same proposition in regard to the street or ward in which I live. I am not taking away any choice from people, but, on the contrary, I am giving a choice to hon. Members to say whether they desire the sale of intoxicating liquors or not. I cannot say that I approve of the unfortunate phrase "local option" in connection with the temperance question. It was introduced some 15 years ago and was never heard of before. I am glad, however, that the matter has been brought to the doors of the House, and that hon. Members are asked to put their opinions to the test.

MR. MORTON: All I ask is that we in this House should set a good example to the people of this country.

(4.23.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 127.—(Div. List, No. 339.)

(4.35.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to stating whether three type writers can be placed in one or two of the rooms for the use of hon. Members?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I will inquire whether that can be done.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Of course, I mean that the Government should provide them.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): May I ask who is the officer responsible for checking these accounts?

MR. JACKSON: I believe they are audited by the Speaker.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: It is impossible that hon. Members can ascertain how this sum of money is expended, and I think we should have some Return showing how this amount is arrived at. That would be a great deal more satisfactory. At present we are in the dark.

MR. JACKSON: I think the information is already given.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay a Return on the Table of the House giving the details?

MR. JACKSON: I will do so.

Vote agreed to.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £61,394, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for the Salaries and Expenses in the Department of Her Majesty's Treasury and Subordinate Departments."

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Irish and Scotch Votes are mixed up in this Vote, and what I wish to know is whether there are any means of getting rid of the special office for teachers' pensions in Dublin?

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): It is exceedingly desirable that there should be some explanation of the delay in dealing with the representations as to their pay made by provincial postmen, whose brethren in London are receiving a much higher rate of pay than they get.

MR. JACKSON: I have no special explanation to offer the hon. Member, but I deny that there has been any delay as far as the Treasury is concerned. The question is one of a large character, and will necessarily occupy a long time. I believe, however, an answer has been sent by the Postmaster General, and if that is so the question is practically settled. As to the question of the hon. Member for Caithness, the Teachers' Pension Office has always been a separate Department; and I do not think it desirable to alter the arrangement. Difficult and complicated questions arise from time to time, and it is necessary to maintain the office.

(4.43.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The Treasury has for some time past been a direct clog on the Postmaster General in dealing with postal reforms in Ireland. There is nothing to which my attention is more constantly drawn by persons connected with the Postal Department in Ireland than the difficulty of inducing the Postmaster General to take effective action in regard to reforms involving any financial question. This is due not to the Postmaster General, but to the cheeseparing, niggardly, and contemptuous policy which the Treasury has pursued towards postal reforms in Ireland. I might refer to the difficulties we have experienced in obtaining satisfactory answers with regard to the service of Cross Channel Mail Boats. The Postmaster General made up his mind in the course of the winter on the subject, and the matter came before the Treasury, and only a few days ago we succeeded, by repeated questions and efforts more numerous than ought to have been required, in inducing the Treasury to take satisfactory action in the matter. In County Leitrim the delivery of letters is delayed by 24 hours. The Postmaster General offers for a journey of 28 miles the sum of £20 a year for a mail service during 12 months. I do not think payment should be limited in such a manner, especially considering Ireland's contribution to the Imperial Revenue. The Treasury could well afford to be a little more liberal. There is another matter on which I have lately asked questions, but have been unable to obtain any information. It is as to the revision of the Teachers' Pension Scheme. I asked the First Lord of the Treasury when the revision was likely to be completed. As to the pensions themselves it is a grievous hardship to the teachers that in order to earn the supplemental pension they have to work four years longer than for the ordinary pension. Even if it meant larger payments from their salaries, they would be better satisfied if they could get the whole pension at the end of forty years instead of serving four years more in order to get an additional fraction. I am not aware that the system pursued in Ireland is adopted in any other part of the country. Then there is the question of hospitals. The sum of £17,000 was allocated to the City of Dublin twenty years ago on a basis which does not now obtain, and I ask, in the public interest, that this allocation should be made on a new basis. Why do the Treasury delay it? It is delayed because certain individuals claim to be entitled to compensation, and the Treasury allow personal interests to overbear the public interest, because these individuals will not consent to an arrangement.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is the subject of a special Vote.

MR. SEXTON: I will not pursue that part of the question. I thought it might come within the scope of the Vote. I am sorry the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not present, because I find it my duty to move a reduction of his salary in respect of the financial relations between England, Scotland, and Ireland. The House is generally familiar with the state of things. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made a specific promise last year. I brought forward in the Debate on that occasion what I considered the scandalous and intolerable grievance which existed in regard to the contributions from Ireland to the Imperial Revenue. If you judge Ireland by any fair test ordinarily taken of the capacity of a country in respect of its taxation, you will find that Ireland is paying double her share to the Imperial Revenue. It is a serious matter when a representative of the Irish people in this House, on a specific argument, lays before the House the fact that Ireland now pays £8,000,000 every year, or, after readjustment, will pay £6,500,000 to the Imperial Treasury, or one-eleventh of the whole—it is scandalous, I say, that such a representative should be told, when his country is paying double what she should do, that a Committee has been promised. But here, at the end of the second Session after that promise, no step forward has been made. Ireland is not in a condition to go on year after year bearing this unjust burden, without any attempt being made to inquire whether the burden is just or unjust. The proposal to appoint the Committee to inquire into the finances of Ireland in relation to England was put down to come on after midnight, when the objection of a single Member could stop any progress being made with the proposal. A Welsh Member did object, and the result of it was that the Committee was not appointed, and an important question like the finances of Ireland is left in the background. It was only once that the Committee met last season—that was only for half-an-hour—when the Committee directed that certain Returns should be prepared. That is all that was done last year. One would have thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have put down the proposal for the appointment of the Committee at a time when there would have been a chance of discussing the proposal. But excuses have been made that some Members of last year's Committee were absent through illness, while one or two of the Irish Members serving on it were in prison. Here we are at the end of the second Session without anything whatever being done. I am prepared to advance proofs to the Committee that Ireland is paying £3,000,000 more to the Imperial Revenue than she ought to pay, and yet the Committee which should inquire into such an important question is allowed to run on from year to year without doing anything in a matter that is both pressing and urgent. The Finance Minister, whose duty it is, has never submitted a Motion for the re-appointment of the Committee at a time when the matter could be fully and fairly discussed. This is a peculiar and strange state of affairs after 90 years of Union, that when a question about Irish finances is asked the Finance Minister has to go and consult some clerk up the street as to what proportion Ireland is contributing to the Imperial Revenue. It is in this way that we have procrastination and delay in reference to all Irish questions, and by way of protest against the injury and insult offered to Irish interests, I shall move that the salary of the Chancellor of the Exchequer be reduced by £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Item A, of £51,174, Salaries, &c., be reduced by £1,000, part of the Salary of the Chancellor of the Exchequer."—(Mr. Sexton.)

(4.55.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The hon. Member for West Belfast has called attention to a very great grievance, namely, the manner in which the appointment of this Committee has been put off. I find that it has not been appointed this year, and that is an act of negligence on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The manner in which he is treating Ireland is extremely harsh. This is a substantial grievance. Two sums of money are being allotted to Ireland on a financial basis which is most detrimental to Ireland. One has reference to assistance under the Poor Law, and £30,000 or £40,000 a year is being kept off Ireland because the clerks at the Treasury have taken a totally erroneous view of the financial relations of Ireland and England, which erroneous view the appointment of the Committee would dispel. The other is the grant under the Education Bill, and we are to get £30,000 less than we would get if it were known that we contribute equally in proportion with England to the Imperial Revenue. Now, until the Chancellor of the Exchequer is able to get this Committee appointed, I think he ought to adopt the rough-and-ready guide in allotting this money of the amount of revenue collected in each country. That is a request based on simple practice, and one which we would accept pending the thorough examination of the whole question. I believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has proceeded in his calculation upon a totally wrong basis. Clerks or subordinates, it is well known, can, if they think their superiors desire that the Return should be in a certain direction, give it the leaning required. I do not say that they falsify the figures; but they can give it a leaning. The first Return on this matter was favourable to Ireland; but every Return issued since has been more and more against that country. I maintain that until the Committee has sat and reported, the only fair principle to adopt is to take the amount of revenue collected in each country.

*MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I support the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast, because it is a question which affects Scotland as well as Ireland. The principle of 11 per cent. to Scotland, 9 per cent. to Ireland, and the remainder to England was adopted three years ago by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a basis which he has never yet explained to us. We contend that it is not a reasonable basis, yet the precedent is allowed to grow in the allocation of these moneys from year to year. And we shall find it more and more difficult year after year to urge our case upon the House for a re-consideration of the method of allocation of the shares of Ireland and Scotland. Undoubtedly, there was only one substantial question raised in connection with the appointment of the Committee, namely, whether Wales should be separately treated, and if half an evening had been devoted to the subject, the Government might have got the Committee elected three months ago. I shall support the Motion of the hon. Member for West Belfast.

(5.1.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I think my hon. Friend is entirely justified in all he has said on this subject. The question is one of fundamental importance to Ireland; it is whether she is paying an undue proportion of the Imperial taxation, and I cannot understand how the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary to the Treasury can reconcile their neglect of this subject with their duties to Ireland. The question is essentially urgent in its character. My hon. Friend believes that Ireland is paying £3,000,000 more every year towards the Imperial taxation than she ought to pay, and the dispute should be investigated promptly. No doubt we shall be told that the failure to appoint the Committee is due to the action of hon. Members from Wales, but my reply to that is that the Government are under a pledge to appoint the Committee and ought to have done so. Does not the Secretary to the Treasury think the question whether Ireland is being made to pay an excessive amount of taxation is worth two or three hours of the time of this House? Right hon. Gentlemen opposite are apt to paint the condition of Ireland in very rosy colours, but the last Census Returns tell a tale of a very different nature, for alone among the dominions of this Empire has its population seriously diminished. That is not surprising, seeing how unfairly Ireland is taxed, and unless a change is soon brought about we shall lose another million of the population in the next decade. I hope we shall get a distinct and definite pledge from the Government that this Committee will be appointed very early next year. They have often protested their desire to benefit the Irish people, and though I have no wish to call in question their sincerity, I say they can now prove whether or not they intend to act fairly towards Ireland in this matter of taxation.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I quite agree that this is a matter of very great importance, and I regret very much that the Committee has not been appointed. I think the subject is of equal importance to Scotland. But the question arises as to whether the delay that has occurred is due to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I do not think it is. In my opinion it is due to the action of certain hon. Members from Wales in seeking to have the inquiry extended to the case of Wales. I will, however, join with hon. Gentlemen who have already spoken in urging that the matter shall be taken up at the earliest opportunity next Session.

(5.10.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid.): The hon. Member who has just spoken seems to think that the United Kingdom is only composed of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and to forget that Wales may have a desire to see this Committee appointed. He complains that owing to our opposition the Committee has not been elected. But we have told the Chancellor of the Exchequer over and over again that we will not oppose the appointment if the Committee is made complete, and if its investigation is allowed to extend to all parts of the United Kingdom. I think it would be very easy to show that Wales is contributing more to Imperial taxation than her resources justify. The Chancellor of the Exchequer offered to bring on the Motion for the appointment of the Committee one evening if we would content ourselves with merely dividing the House. But what we want is a reasonable discussion, and the right hon. Gentleman is very much mistaken if he thinks we will agree simply to be voted down. A mere Division would be perfectly useless. I do not think we ought to be accused of obstructive tactics simply because we desire to have a discussion on the advisability of including Wales in this inquiry. When the Committee was first proposed, there was not a single Welsh Member among the hon. Gentlemen nominated, and it was not until we raised a protest that the name of the hon. Member for Montgomery appeared in the list. We shall continue to object to the appointment of this Committee until our reasonable desires are met by the Government.

(5.13.) MR. JACKSON: I do not think that the hon. Member for West Belfast has treated either the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Treasury with justice. He has complained seriously of the action of the Treasury in connection with the delay in the completion of the arrangements for a mail service via Stranraer. I am quite prepared to defend the action of the Treasury in that matter. It would have been a monstrous waste of public money if the Treasury had not resisted the exorbitant demands that were made for such a service. The result of the resistance of the Treasury has been that a contract has been made for about half the money that was at first demanded. That alone affords ample justification for the action of the Treasury. I may further point out that this is a question for the Post Office. The Treasury can only deal with such matters on the recommendation of the Post Office. The hon. Member for West Belfast has spoken of the cheeseparing policy of the Government with regard to Ireland. For my own part all I can say is that I am quite sure that the hon. Member cannot carry his mind back to a period in the history of this country when any Government or Chancellor of the Exchequer or Treasury has endeavoured to do more for Ireland than has been done by the present Government, and I think that the charge hardly comes with a good grace.

MR. SEXTON: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will excuse my interruption. My contention is that Ireland is obliged to pay £3,000,000 too much, and as long as that is done I decline to be thankful for doles of an infinitely less amount.

MR. JACKSON: Gratitude from the hon. Member is more than I either anticipate or desire, but I must say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been most anxious to have this Committee appointed. I believe that the hon. Member, who contends that Ireland pays too much, will be convinced when he sees the figures that she is doing nothing of the kind. It was understood that it is rather for the convenience of hon. Members from Ireland that the Committee should not meet early in the Session. With regard to the complaint of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire that there was no Welsh Member proposed, that was not the fault of the Government, who were anxious that every part of the House should be represented. With regard to treating Wales separately, I may point out that there are no figures available for this purpose, and the proposal is impracticable. The information collected will be at once circulated, and I hope that the earliest opportunity will be taken next Session for moving the appointment of the Committee.

(5.21.) DR. CLARK: When the Committee was proposed last year five of the Members nominated were representatives of London constituencies, and I opposed the Motion because the Principality of Wales was unrepresented. The Committee sat once last year, and it was understood that it would meet again early this Session, but when the Chancellor of the Exchequer was questioned about it he pleaded that he was too busy with his Budget. Since then the Committee has not been appointed, simply because the Government by not bringing it on before midnight refused to allow the question of the inclusion of Wales in the inquiry to be threshed out. That is not the way to disabuse our minds of the impression that in the matter of taxation we are being defrauded, and if the Government wish to convince us of their desire to treat all parts of the United Kingdom fairly they will move the appointment of this Committee early to-morrow, and allow it to get to work this Session. Seeing that the Scotch as well as the Irish Members are dissatisfied, something ought quickly to be done to clear up any doubts that exist. If Ireland has cause for complaint I think that Scotland has still greater reason, for a Return published some years ago showed that the Scotch people paid 2s. more per head of taxation than the English, and 12s. more than the Irish.

*(5.27.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): This is a statistical question, which ought to be taken into consideration altogether outside Party politics. While no one can dispute the importance of the question with which this Committee will have to deal, it is a most difficult and perplexing one, upon which there must be a large mass of evidence to consider which has never been fully considered by a Committee of the House. It once fell to my lot to have to consider the financial relations of the different parts of the United Kingdom. I will ask hon. Members to reserve their opinions on both sides of the question until they see the figures. It seems to me that there has been a great misunderstanding about the Committee this year; the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to have got the impression that there is no anxiety on this side of the House with regard to it. For my own part, I have always been most anxious for its appointment. With regard to what has been said about the claim of Wales, on that point also I will reserve my opinion. I have not seen the documents which have been circulated, but they will require a great deal of consideration, and, therefore, even if the Committee were appointed to-morrow, it would be impossible to deal with the question before the end of the Session. Therefore, I suggest that my hon. Friends below the Gangway should rest content with the promise—first, that the information shall be at once circulated to hon. Members; and, secondly, that the Committee shall be appointed at the commencement of next Session.

MR. SEXTON: Did the right hon. Gentleman notice that the right hon. Gentleman opposite carefully abstained from saying he would put the Motion down as the first Order, and thus prevent the operation of the 12 o'clock Rule in respect of it?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I understood the First Lord to say that the Committee will be appointed at the commencement of next Session. It is quite evident the Government will take the Motion before 12 o'clock.

*(5.31.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I should like to repeat that we will take the earliest opportunity next Session of moving the appointment of this Committee. The right hon. Gentleman has very fairly observed that a misunderstanding has existed as to the desire for the appointment of the Committee at an early period of this Session. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was of opinion that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway did not desire the Committee to be appointed early in the Session. He perhaps failed to gather the real opinion of hon. Members, but that was his belief; and, as the right hon. Gentleman has stated, circumstances intervened which made it difficult to proceed with the Motion which had been placed on the Paper. It is the intention of the Government to circulate the Papers with the least possible delay. The Secretary to the Treasury will move to-night for the Papers. The most recent information has been incorporated in the Papers. So that when hon. Gentlemen come at the earliest part of next Session to the consideration of this difficult question they will find themselves possessed of the latest and most authentic information. I trust the Papers will completely set at rest those doubts and difficulties which I believe are honestly entertained by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway.

MR. SEXTON: We have our own opinions, and they are sufficient for us for the present. I hope the pledges given will be kept. My experience, I confess, makes me rather sceptical. Meanwhile, I think it is necessary, as a measure of precaution, to put on record by a Division our sense of the treatment we have received.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I think Her Majesty's Government have failed to make even a decent excuse for the non-appointment of this Committee. After what passed last year we had every reason to suppose that the Committee would be one of the first appointed this Session. I do not know how Ireland and Wales will come out of the inquiry, but I am confident Scotland will come out well. As to the Papers, I fear they will not present a fair view of the question. Unless they show the receipts of the common Metropolis they will not afford material for a fair investigation.

(5.35.) COLONEL NOLAN: We are told to possess our souls in patience, but we in Ireland are paying £60,000 for putting the question off until next year. £30,000 at the least is to be stopped for poors rates, and I am told that £30,000 is to be stopped for free education. I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer is allotting this money unfairly. The question I am anxious to put to the Secretary to the Treasury is whether, with the allotment of this money, Ireland receives credit for the whole of the taxation collected in Ireland? Are the taxes collected in Ireland credited to Ireland when the grants from the Exchequer are allotted for education and in relief of the poors rates?

MR. JACKSON: The greatest pains have been taken to obtain accurate information as to what the contribution of each country is. The contribution from spirits, for example, is ascertained by ascertaining the consumption.

COLONEL NOLAN: Then are we to understand that Ireland gets a less share than she would if all the taxation collected in Ireland were credited to her?

MR. JACKSON: No; I cannot say that.

COLONEL NOLAN: I want a clear answer. Would Ireland get a large share if all the taxation collected in Ireland were credited to her?

MR. JACKSON: I think if Ireland were credited with all the taxation on all the whisky drunk by Englishmen she would certainly get a larger share.

COLONEL NOLAN: I cannot get a straightforward answer. I do not want Ireland to be credited with the taxation on all the whisky drunk by Englishmen, but I do want her to be credited with the taxation on whisky which is collected in Ireland. I want the Secretary to the Treasury to tell us whether she would get a larger sum if she got credited with all that taxation.

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid I cannot answer that.

*(5.43.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I think that on examination the hon. and gallant Gentleman must see that his proposition is a most extraordinary one. The people who pay the taxation on Guinness's stout or on Irish whisky are the people who drink it, and many of them live in England and Scotland. The taxation is collected in Ireland, but surely Ireland is not entitled to be credited with it? With reference to his proposition to divide the Committee, I beg the hon. Member for West Belfast to look at the difficulty in which we are now placed by the statement of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway. The hon. and gallant Gentleman says he means by his vote to record his dissatisfaction at the present allocation of taxation between the three countries. That is the very question into which the Committee is to inquire.

MR. SEXTON: This is not a trivial matter; it is not a question of any error of judgment or of misapprehension. Months ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer knew we wanted the Committee. As to the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, I presume he will vote with me in order to express his discontent that he has not been afforded any opportunity of ascertaining whether his dissatisfaction is well founded.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Will the Secretary to the Treasury promise that the Papers shall be in the hands of Members before the Prorogation, so that if we think they are not sufficiently full and distinct we may have an opportunity of asking for more?

COLONEL NOLAN: I desire to say that I have no wish to disturb the hon. Member's (Mr. Sexton's) idea as to the object of my vote.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): The right hon. Gentleman has blamed the Welsh Members for the non-appointment of the Committee, but why should he refuse to admit Wales within the province of the inquiry? If he would do that then the Resolution for the re-appointment of the Committee might be carried without any discussion at all. The Secretary to the Treasury says there are no figures at hand from which the contribution of Wales to the Exchequer could be ascertained; but could not the Treasury ascertain through the Revenue Officers the contribution of each particular county to the Imperial Revenue?

MR. JACKSON: It is quite impossible. The question has been asked more than once, and the Inland Revenue have always pointed out it is quite impossible.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: If there is a difficulty, amounting to an impossibility, in ascertaining the exact amount of the contributions of Wales to the Exchequer, then it would be demonstrated to the Committee, and the Committee would report the impossibility.

(5.50.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 94; Noes 154. — (Div. List, No. 340.)

Original Question again proposed.

(5.57.) MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I desire to call attention to the item for the Statute Law Committee, and the answer given by the First Lord of the Treasury a night or two ago. It will be recollected there is a Bill before the House for Statute Law revision, and this Bill has been through the House of Lords. This Bill has been drawn on the lines of previous Bills dealing with the same subject passed during the past 25 years, except that on the present occasion the Bill is drawn in accordance with the view expressed in the Report of the Select Committee of last Session. But the First Lord of the Treasury has resolved that only part of the Bill shall be relegated to the Select Committee, under circumstances which I think are not respectful to the House, considering what transpired last Session in regard to Statute Law revision —

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not a subject for consideration upon this Vote. The Committee itself has nothing to do with it.

MR. HOWELL: I shall move a reduction of the Vote by the sum of £200, which is the amount in excess of the Vote of last year, as a protest against the way in which the Government have dealt with the matter.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Item G, of £1,115, revision of the statute law, be reduced by £200."—(Mr. Howell.)

*(6.0.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not know whether I should be in order in replying to the speech with which the hon. Member prefaced his Motion for the reduction of the Vote. I see you shake your head, Sir, so I am placed in a little difficulty. But perhaps, by the indulgence of the Committee, I may be allowed to say that the action which I took in this matter was taken upon my responsibility in the position which I occupy, bound as I am to consider any objection raised. I referred the matter to the Statute Law Revision Committee, who, I am glad to say, entered into it with impartiality, and with that sincere desire for the public interest which they have always shown, and the result is that the present arrangements were entered into at their suggestion.

MR. HOWELL: I wish it to be understood that I have no objection to urge to the Statute Law Committee, who, I believe, do their work in an admirable manner. Nobody can be more conscious of that than I am, yet I do feel that a protest should be made against the way in which the Bill has been handled.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have no doubt that as regards England very useful work is done; but Scotch Statutes are not dealt with, or at least I was under the impression that Scotch Statutes were not to be dealt with; but I find an item in the Vote (£52 for draftsmen) employed in expurgating Scotch and Irish Statutes. Are we to understand that this work of expurgating Scotch and Irish Statutes is with a view to the editing and revision of those Statutes, and how is it that only this small sum, about equal to the wages of an unskilled artizan, is spent on it?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): The Statute Law Revision Committee have been directed to deal with Imperial Statutes only, and therefore they have not dealt with the Scotch Statutes. In dealing with Imperial Statutes it has been necessary, in relation to parts of such Statutes as refer to Scotland and Ireland, to consult other Departments—the Lord Advocate's as representing Scotland, and the Attorney General for Ireland's as representing Ireland; but we only deal with Imperial Statutes.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Have the pre-Union Statutes been revised at all?

SIR E. CLARKE: Pre-Union Statutes have been revised at a time now long passed, and we are dealing with much later Statutes.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: But the Scotch Statutes have not been dealt with.

MR. HOWELL: It is not my intention to press my protest to a Division, and, with the permission of the Committee, I will withdraw my Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): To emphasise my complaint against the Treasury, I beg to move a reduction in the Vote for the salary of the Secretary by £100—

THE CHAIRMAN: That item has been passed over.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: The complaint I have is, that the dilatory action of the Treasury hinders the work of other Departments.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Under this Vote are included—and this was not the case formerly—the expenses of the Suez Canal Company Directors, and questions in relation to the Suez Canal must be raised now or not at all. I have been in the habit of moving a reduction in the amount in respect of the payments to Sir Rivers Wilson, to whom more than any other man I attribute our troubles in Egypt. But I take the opportunity now of asking for some information in respect of the Canal. We at one time heard a great deal about widening and improving the Canal, though we have not heard much in this direction in recent years. There has been improvement, I believe, in lighting. But I should like to hear what is being done, or is in contemplation. I do not know if the Secretary to the Treasury is able to give us any information.

(6.6.) MR. MORTON: At the same time, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman can give us some explanation of the entries for British Directors. I notice there is an entry "Resident Director," and no salary is attached; but there is a note to the effect that the Resident Director is allowed to retain his fees and emoluments in lieu of salary and pension on condition that if his fees and emoluments fall below £1,000 during any one year then Parliament shall be asked to vote the deficiency. What is meant by "fees and emoluments"? what does he get these fees for?

MR. JACKSON: Well, I should have thought the hon. Member would have understood that when a man is Director of a company he does sometimes get fees and emoluments for attending to the business of the company. This is what is meant: There are fees and emoluments, and the arrangement made is an economical one. I believe we pay a certain fixed salary to the Directors (non-resident), and the fees and emoluments are paid into the Exchequer. The result is, we receive a good deal more than we pay, and the directorate does not cost us anything.

MR. MORTON: Then the two non-Resident Directors at £450 and £500 do not receive any fees and emoluments?

MR. JACKSON: No.

MR. MORTON: But the Resident Director does, and why, if in the one case it is a wise and an economical course to pay salary, is that course not followed in the other case?

MR. JACKSON: For the simple reason that the Director is allowed to take the fees and emoluments. The excess of these over salary is paid into the Exchequer.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Is the right hon. Gentleman right in this? Does the excess go into the Exchequer? The note says—

“The Resident Director is allowed to retain his fees and emoluments in lieu of salary and pension on condition that if his fees and emoluments fell below £1,000 during any one year Parliament shall be asked to vote the deficiency.”

There is not a word about the excess over £1,000 being paid into the Exchequer.

MR. MORTON: Am I to understand that the fees and emoluments amounted to exactly £1,000 last year?

MR. JACKSON: I cannot say.

(6.10.) MR. MORTON: Well, but somebody has the information. The right hon. Gentleman says if the fees exceed £1,000 the balance goes to the Treasury, and I should like to know if the amount has been paid into the Treasury. If the right hon. Gentleman cannot give the information now perhaps he will allow the Vote to be postponed. [Laughter.] It is very well for hon. Gentlemen opposite to laugh, but right hon. Gentlemen hold their position on that Bench for the purpose of giving us information to enable us to consider these Estimates, and, failing such information, it is not unreasonable to ask for the postponement of a Vote.

MR. JACKSON: There is some misunderstanding about the question and answer. I was referring to the Directors who received a fixed salary, and whose fees and emoluments go into the Exchequer. The Resident Director has no salary, and receives the fees whatever they may be.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Who is the Resident Director, and can the right hon. Gentleman say what is doing in reference to widening and improving the Canal?

MR. JACKSON: I think—but I am not quite sure—that at present the Director is Mr. Austin Lee.

MR. MORTON: Then we are to understand that if the fees and emoluments exceed £1,000 the excess is not paid into the Treasury by the Resident Director?

MR. JACKSON: Quite so; but he does not get any salary.

MR. MORTON: Then there is an item of £385 for travelling and incidental expenses. Does that money go to the Directors? It is not quite clear who gets it. Also I would ask what the “Receiver of Hereditary Revenue” does for his £300. There is also an allowance to the same official of £145 for office expenses. It is admitted that it is a bad practice to make such payments without any statement as to how the money is used. Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any information upon these points?

MR. JACKSON: I believe the travelling and incidental expenses were actually payments out of pocket. As to the Receiver of Hereditary Revenue it is an office which, in all probability on the next vacancy occurring, will be abolished.

Question put, and agreed to.

3. Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £65,335 be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1892, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department and Subordinate Offices.”

*(6.14.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): In putting down my notice of Motion to reduce the Vote by £100, of course I have no intention of making an onslaught upon the salary of the right hon. Gentleman. I adopt the usual form for the purpose of bringing before the Committee a matter of vital interest to many of my constituents, and which is of general importance, namely, whether the right hon. Gentleman has not violated the provisions of his own Act of Parliament by appointing as an Assistant Inspector of Welsh coal mines a gentleman who cannot speak a word of the Welsh language. The district to which this appointment is made comprises, I may say, the whole of the North Wales coal fields. It takes in also part of Lancashire, and is called the West Liverpool District. Taking the figures from the Report of Inspector Hall, I find the total number of miners in the district is 50,796, of whom more than 12,000 are in the Welsh part of the district. There are no official statistics which show what proportion of these 12,000 Welsh miners speak Welsh; but, speaking from my own intimate knowledge of the country, I should say you would not be above the mark in putting it down at 10,000, and in estimating that several thousands, at least, among them speak nothing but Welsh. The 39th section of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, places the appointment of Inspectors in the hands of the Home Secretary, but provides that in Wales and Monmouthshire, among candidates, equally qualified persons having knowledge of the Welsh language shall be preferred. I take that to mean that where you have a first-rate man who can speak Welsh he should be preferred to a man who cannot. Amongst his duties the Inspector has to examine into and make inquiry respecting the state and condition of any mine, the ventilation, and all matters relating to the conduct of the mine. When an Inspector goes down a mine he meets, perhaps, 20 or 30 persons whom he has to examine, and the only person, as far as I can discover, who acts as interpreter between him and the colliers is the very man whose conduct is in question—that is to say, the manager. I have received several letters from men speaking of the extremely unsatisfactory condition of affairs to which this leads on. I am not astonished to find from the able Report of Mr. Hall that that gentleman complains of the extreme paucity of convictions. It is not surprising that there should be few convictions if the evidence has to filter through the lips of the man who would be liable if the accusation were made good. I have, unfortunately, mislaid a letter from Mr. Richard Jones, the Secretary of the North Wales Miners' Federation; but I may say that Mr. Jones specially traversed the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that when the office of Inspector was filled by a gentleman who did not understand Welsh the work of inspection proceeded in a satisfactory manner. The new Inspector, Mr. Stokes, is a man against whom I have no complaint, except that he does not speak a single word of Welsh. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would have availed himself of the opportunity afforded by the vacancy in this district to appoint one person who was conversant with the Welsh language. I know, as a matter of fact, that there were among the candidates properly qualified gentlemen who speak Welsh. In particular, there was one who is the manager of one of the largest and most successful mines in North Wales. Yet the right hon. Gentleman appointed a gentleman from Leicester who is unable to speak a word of Welsh. The appointment is in direct contravention of the assurances given to us by the right hon. Gentleman with reference to South Wales on the 21st April. The right hon. Gentleman stated on the 1st of June, in reply to a question I put to him, that Mr. Stokes had the best qualifications of 28 selected candidates, among whom were several who could speak Welsh, including one whom he has since appointed to the South Wales district. That is a distinct admission that there were applicants eminently qualified in other respects who also knew Welsh. The appointment has given rise to a great amount of irritation in the district. The right hon. Gentleman said the district was only partly in Wales. I cannot conceive that that is put forward as a serious argument, because, if so, the effect would be to deprive North Wales entirely of the benefit of the proviso. I think the right hon. Gentleman said, also, that the duties of Inspector had been satisfactorily discharged by gentlemen who could not speak any Welsh. I join issue with the right hon. Gentleman on that point. I am told, as I have already said, that the reverse is the case. The duties cannot be satisfactorily carried out if the Inspector derives all his knowledge of the facts from a man who is himself liable to a penalty if anything wrong has occurred. I have brought the question forward as a matter of public duty; and I cannot help thinking that, apart from its great importance to my own constituency, it also raises a grave constitutional question. Unless the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to give some more satisfactory explanation of the course he has adopted, I shall feel it my duty to divide on the question.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, of £28,587, Salaries, be reduced by £100 (part of the Salary of the Secretary of State.)"—(Mr. G. Osborne Morgan.)

*(6.31.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The right hon. Gentleman challenges my exercise of my patronage; but when he says I have violated the Act of Parliament, I must point out that he studiously refrained from stating the real point of all my answers to him. The substance of those answers has been that I regarded Mr. Stokes, who was appointed, as far and away the best qualified candidate. I explained to the right hon. Gentleman the enormous pains I took, as I do in every case of the kind, to get the best man. There were, in the first instance, more than 300 candidates, amongst whom was a protégé of the right hon. Gentleman himself. The chief recommendation of that gentleman was that he spoke Welsh, but his name could not be included in the list of those who were selected.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN*: What testimonials had he?

MR. MATTHEWS*: If the right hon. Gentleman saw as many testimonials as I do, he would be astonished to find how many admirable qualities are attributed to candidates. In this case I laboured through the long list of names, and made inquiries from those best able to judge, until the candidates were ultimately winnowed down to 28. But Mr. Stokes, who shortly before had been placed second in an examination which was held on the occasion of another vacancy which had occurred, appeared to me to possess superior claims. I should have preferred even for this Liverpool appointment a man who spoke Welsh, but the qualifications of Mr. Stokes seemed to me to be so much superior to those of the other candidates that the section did not seem to me to apply at all. I thought that Mr. Stokes, having distinguished himself so much in the examination and having subjected himself to all the trouble and expense of the examination, was entitled to the appointment. The Liverpool district has always been regarded as an English district. The tonnage produced in the Welsh portion of the district is 12,000 out of 60,000, or one-fifth of the whole, and the number of colliers is about one-fifth. The district has always been administered by English-speaking Inspectors. Neither Mr. Hall nor Mr. Hedley had any tincture of Welsh upon them, and I am bound to say that no report has ever reached me to the effect that any inconvenience ever arose in the district from the want of a knowledge of Welsh on the part of the Inspectors. I am given to understand that they generally found some foreman or superior workman who knew sufficient English to state the grievances of his fellow-workmen. Mr. Stokes has quite ability enough to acquire the Welsh language, which I should certainly encourage him to do, if he gives his mind to it.

Mr. G. Osborne Morgan

(6.38.) MR. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): I am rather sorry that it is necessary to call in question the appointment of such an able man as Mr. Stokes. Still, it is not a question of tonnage with us, but a question of men. We have in this part of Wales 12,000 men, at least 50 per cent. of whom are Welshmen, and—I am sorry to have to admit it—Welshmen that understand no other language than the Welsh language. Inspection, so far as its reality is concerned, is consequently lost in the district if you send there an Inspector, however able he may be technically, who cannot converse with the workmen in their own language.

No one can be more grateful to the right hon. Gentleman than I for the clause he put into the Act relating to the appointment in South Wales—which clause he has most faithfully carried out. I only wish I could have said the same thing with regard to the appointment we are now discussing. As a practical miner, I have seen Inspectors making inquiries in mines where accidents have occurred. I have known them obliged to go for information to men who did not understand a word they said to them. They had to fall back upon the officials of the mine, and I solemnly declare here that such an examination into the facts of an accident might just as well never be made. The Inspector in such cases is quite in the hands of the persons whose character and conduct he is inquiring into. I am sure there is no one in the House more anxious to see the work of inspection done thoroughly than the right hon. Gentleman himself, otherwise he would not have done so much as he has done for us already. I should like to hear from him whether he does not think there is a call for something to be done to remedy the present condition of affairs. We know that amongst the candidates for the appointment of Inspector there were several colliery managers who have obtained certificates of competency for the management of mines. If they can obtain such certificates and can do their work to the satisfaction of their employers, surely they can do the work of inspection, and do it well. I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman two ways out of the present difficulty. In the first place, I would suggest that North Wales should be attached to South Wales, so that the same Inspectors should be employed for both parts of the Principality. That would be the best thing to do, but if there are great difficulties in the way, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman directly a vacancy takes place in England to remove Mr. Stokes there and appoint in his place the best Welsh-speaking candidate, so that in Wales we may have inspection carried out in reality. If the right hon. Gentleman assents to either of these courses I do not think we can ask him to do more.

(6.46.) MR. ABEL THOMAS (Carmarthen, E.): I join with my hon. Friend in his suggestion to the Home

Secretary that those parts of Flintshire and Denbighshire where there are miners should be added to the South Wales District and taken from the English District. I know a good deal about the work in collieries, and I have come to the conclusion that it is of vital importance to the Inspectors where the colliers speak Welsh that they should be Welshmen having a knowledge of the language themselves. The men are unable to make complaints in any other than their own language, and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that it is absurd to suppose that the men can go to an overman or foreman, and ask him to make complaints to an Inspector, for the reason that it is very frequently in consequence of the negligence of these officials that complaints have to be made at all. However able an Inspector may be, and whatever competitive examination he may have passed, it is impossible for him to find out defects in a mine if he does not understand the language of the miners. The Home Secretary told us that he had passed the candidates through a competitive examination. Well, he must have known from the very moment that the examination was entered into that if it was conducted in English it was ten thousand chances to one that an Englishman would win. If it had been conducted in Welsh, I have no hesitation in saying that a Welshman would have been at the head of it. I venture to say that you do not want as an Inspector a man who can distinguish himself at a competitive examination, but a man who has been in a mine and who has had experience underground. The Act of Parliament says that in making the appointments in Wales and Monmouthshire amongst candidates equally qualified, the person having a knowledge of the Welsh language shall be preferred. Well, I do not say anything against Mr. Stokes, whom I have heard on all hands is an exceedingly able man, and well fitted to be an Inspector, where he understands the language of the people amongst whom he goes; but clearly he is an Inspector of mines "in Wales and Monmouthshire." The Act says "otherwise equally qualified," and the intention of the Legislature must have been this—that where you have two men both of them fit to be Inspectors, one able to speak Welsh and the other unable to do so, even though the latter may be the better qualified—the Welsh-speaking man is the one to be appointed. The Home Secretary has not said that there was not a properly qualified Welsh-speaking person amongst the 28 candidates from whom the selection was made. If there was, I submit that under the circumstances he ought to have been appointed, and not Mr. Stokes, however able that gentleman may be. That is a matter of importance, not to Welshmen especially, but to the whole of this country, because the lives of the colliers are endangered if they cannot make complaints to the man who has charge of their safety. I trust that what has been suggested by my hon. Friend will be acceded to, and that in future we shall have Welsh-speaking Inspectors taking care of the lives of all Welshmen engaged in collieries.

(6.53.) MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I would urge on the Home Secretary the vast importance of this question. I am perfectly convinced that if it be true that 50 per cent. of the men engaged in North Wales speak only the Welsh tongue, and if the Inspector is required to find out from them what the real facts of any particular accident are, it is necessary that he should speak the Welsh language. I cannot help thinking that if the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had had any experience in mining he would see the immense importance of this question. I, myself, have occasionally found very great difficulty in ascertaining the actual facts of a case, because I have not understood the particular dialect of an English miner. The miners sometimes use expressions which, unless you have lived your life amongst them, are very difficult to understand. If we find that to be the case in England, how much more must an Englishman find it to be the case amongst the Welsh miners, who do not speak English. I do, therefore, most sincerely trust that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary will consider the propriety of adopting the suggestion of the hon. Member below the Gangway, and, without putting any slur upon Mr. Stokes, whom I know to be one of the ablest gentlemen in the public service in connection with mining, will take some opportunity which may present itself before long of removing that gentleman to another district, and replacing him by a gentleman who is fully conversant with the Welsh tongue.

*(6.56.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): As a Member for a Welsh county containing a large number of miners, I wish to heartily support all that has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan). A very strong feeling exists on this subject, and grave dissatisfaction will prevail unless means are taken to remedy what is a real grievance. I think the suggestion thrown out by the Member for Rhondda is a good one, namely, that North and South Wales should be formed into one district. We all see that the present system of dealing with the matter is unsatisfactory, and I cannot see why Wales should not be dealt with separately. If we can get an assurance that as soon as an opportunity occurs steps will be taken in that direction on this side of the House, we shall receive the proposition with satisfaction.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyne): I think it must be patent to every one that the duty of the Home Secretary in appointing an Inspector was to select the best man, and this he did, although he had to pass over a protégé of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Denbighshire. We have been told that in the Liverpool district there are 38,000 English miners and 12,000 Welsh miners, half of whom are entirely Welsh-speaking. I fail to see why an inferior man should be appointed for the sake of the few Welsh-speaking miners, it might be to the serious detriment of all the rest. It seems to me that the best course was that adopted by the Home Secretary, namely, to give the appointment to the best man, especially as the protégé of the right hon. Gentleman below me was not in the 28 selected candidates.

*(6.59.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The man to whom the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary referred was no protégé of mine. I know this of him, that he is the manager of one of the largest mines in North Wales, and has under him 600 or 700 men. I, of course, know nothing about the competitive examination—whether or not this gentleman was amongst the 28 selected candidates. But on the 4th of June the right hon. Gentleman said that 28 candidates were selected, and that of those several were acquainted with the Welsh language, including a gentleman whom he had nominated to a vacancy that had occurred at the same time in South Wales. I would point out that if you appoint an Inspector who does not understand the language he has to collect the evidence from the workmen, and he is the very man whose conduct is impugned. I ask if that is a fair state of things? I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will undertake to consider the question?

MR. MATTHEWS: Certainly. Mr. Courtney, I will undertake to consider the question, but I may say that I am informed that an Inspector in South Wales would be of no use in North Wales. ["Oh!"] I am not sure of that; but I am told that a Welsh-speaking Inspector in South Wales would be of no use in North Wales. ["No!"] At all events, I undertake to consider the question.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that nearly the whole of the clergy in North Wales are South Wales men.

(7.3.) MR. S. T. EVANS: We are very glad that the right hon. Gentleman has undertaken to consider the question, and I hope he will give it early consideration. I represent a constituency which comprises a large number of miners who do not speak English, and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that they feel this matter as a real grievance. I hope the right hon. Gentleman's answer is not a convenient one to shelve the question in order to get through the other Votes of Supply, but that he will really give the matter his early consideration. As to the other question, it is a pity we have to enter into questions of this kind; still I venture to say that it would have been better had the right hon. Gentleman paid less attention to competitive examinations, and chosen one of those 58 men who were perfectly competent to discharge the duties. It is very difficult to carry measures of justice to our countrymen in this House. An hon. Member on this side said the Welsh people do not appreciate the nice distinctions of the English language, but he spoke in ignorance of the fact that the Welsh people are as great linguists as even the Anglo-Saxons themselves. There is no difficulty about being understood in either North or South Wales, which might easily be made one district under one Inspector. If there be any difficulty, it is experienced by Englishmen in endeavouring to acquire the Welsh language. I am told that the Bishop of St. David's preaches in Welsh, but that it is difficult to understand a word he says. The right hon. Gentleman should either re-arrange the districts, or make another appointment.

MR. PICKARD (York, W.R., Northampton): I wish simply to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, if Mr. Stokes were removed, he would take into consideration the applications of managers who hold first-class certificates, and who can speak both English and Welsh?

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I desire to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the promise he has given us, and I hope that of the two alternatives he will adopt the former, namely, that of making Wales one district by joining North and South Wales. I am quite sure that with his sense of fairness he will concede that it is much better that Wales should have Welsh-speaking Inspectors. An hon. Member on this side has spoken superciliously of the Welsh people, but I would ask him how he would like a monoglot Welshman or Russian to inspect the mines in the English district which he represents? One of the first requisites of a competent Inspector is that he should know the language of the district in which his duties lie.

(7.12.) MR. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): I hope we may accept the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman, that this question will be attended to in either of the said two ways which have been suggested.

MR. MATTHEWS: May I just say this, that under the Act I am bound to consider the claims of the candidate—even if he only speak English—whose superiority is marked. However I may desire to meet the wishes of hon. Members, I have a duty also to the candidates.

MR. ABRAHAM: Let it be understood that we do not desire for a moment to have incompetent men as Inspectors. But a manager, before he receives a certificate of competency, has to be examined, and the examination is confined to the English language. They are not examined in Welsh. I hope that the Home Secretary will not for a moment withdraw from the promise he has made.

MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): It seems to me somewhat strange that it does not appear to be desirable in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary in the question of competition for the appointment of Inspectors in Wales to take into view the necessity of speaking the Welsh language. An Inspector in many parts of Wales can hardly perform his duties in a competent manner unless he understands the language of the people. That, at least, is my opinion.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I wish to say that I do not know the person whom the right hon. Gentleman has called my protégé even by sight.

MR. J. POWELL WILLIAMS: It appears to me that under the circumstances all the Welsh people have to do is to send up Welsh-speaking candidates who will distance all the others.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I think the right hon. Gentleman ought to give some answer to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire before leave is given to withdraw this Amendment. It is exceedingly important that Welsh Inspectors should be appointed for the Welsh collieries. We have, no doubt, excellent Inspectors in Wales, but it is very desirable that they should be able to speak the Welsh language. They are desirous of doing their duty, but they are unable to collect the necessary evidence in cases of breaches of the law because they do not understand Welsh.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

(7.18.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I wish to call attention to a matter of some importance in Scotland. I have frequently during the Session called the attention of the Home Secretary to accidents occurring in Scotland, involving serious loss of life, and have asked whether he would follow the precedent set by previous Home Secretaries, and order a public investigation. I can quite understand that the right hon. Gentleman does not like to do anything which would appear to run counter to the duties of the Secretary for Scotland, but unfortunately the Scotch Secretary is not intrusted with the powers which are vested in the Home Secretary. At the beginning of this year three serious explosions occurred in steel and iron works in Scotland—two in Glasgow and one in Gartsherrie. The inquiry in those cases was made by the Procurator Fiscal, but the results of such inquiry are always kept secret. It is traditional in Scotch investigations of this kind, made for the purpose of bringing home criminality to those guilty of culpable carelessness, that the proceedings are not divulged even to the relatives of those who are injured or killed. With regard to the Gartsherrie explosion, a similar accident had occurred at the same works two or three months before; and had a special inquiry been made into that accident the cause would probably have been discovered, and the subsequent accident, by which a number of persons were seriously injured, would, in all likelihood, have been prevented. The power residing in the Home Secretary is of great importance, because by means of public investigation, and a consequent publication of all the facts, not only would many serious accidents be prevented, but where they did occur the relatives or representatives of the persons killed or injured would be supplied with information enabling them to take proceedings for the recovery of damages. In England there is in all such cases a public inquiry before a coroner, and all the facts are open to every one interested. All I ask for is an open inquiry in Scotland, such as is held by coroners in England—an inquiry of the same kind as has been granted by the predecessor of the present Home Secretary, and which he alone at the present moment has power to grant.

(7.27.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I desire to bring under the attention of the Home Secretary a grievance which is felt by the check weighmen and miners in the district I represent, and ask the right hon. Gentleman to give an assurance that he will receive a deputation of the representatives of those men on the subject.

MR. MATTHEWS: I regret that the hon. Member has not given notice of his intention to bring forward the subject he has mentioned, so that I might have had the opportunity of referring to the papers relating to the question. In regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow, I may say it is true I have not thought it my duty to interfere in such cases as have been referred to by him, except in those which, in my opinion, expressly demand such intervention. I never hesitate, however, to hold inquiries in cases of mines, or to exercise such limited powers as I possess under the old Factories Act. I do not know whether the hon. Member has made inquiry into the old factory law, but I may inform him that there is now in a Factory Bill before the other House a special clause enabling a public inquiry to be held before the Sheriff in every case where a serious accident happens in any factory or workshop in Scotland. I have done my best to remedy the defect pointed out in the new Factory Bill, and I invite the hon. Member to look at the particular clause in order to see whether it satisfies his view. I have been looking carefully into the grievances of certain Scotch miners, whose case has been brought forward by the hon. Member for Lanarkshire. I am informed that the Scotch Department held that the action of the mineowners in question was not contrary to the Mines Act. If the particular person comes within the terms of the Act, and has violated any of the conditions laid down, of course the owners have a perfect right to dismiss him. However, I am not yet fully possessed of the facts.

(7.33.) DR. CAMERON: What I wish to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman is that this power of special public inquiry should not be altogether lost sight of, and dropped between the Scotch Office and the Home Office, for it is most necessary that such inquiries should be held. I sincerely trust, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman will look further into the matter.

MR. PHILIPPS: If the decision of the Scotch Office is as the right hon. Gentleman has suggested, it is evident that employers will be able to evade the Act of Parliament. If they are to be enabled to do that by a side wind everybody will, I think, admit it is a dirty trick. If the right hon. Gentleman would bring in a Bill of one clause making such conduct illegal, I believe it would meet with unanimous support. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consent to receive a deputation on this important matter. If a check weighman's position is to be an independent one, the employer ought not to be in a position to dismiss him. I again appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to receive a deputation of miners on the question, and in order to raise the point I beg to move a reduction of his salary by £500.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I would suggest to the hon. Member that it is not necessary to move a reduction.

MR. PHILIPPS: I should have preferred to take a vote, but, under the circumstances, I will not press the Amendment to a Division.

Motion made, and Question, "That Item A, of £28,587, Salaries, be reduced by £500,"—(Mr. Philipps)—put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

(7.38.) MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I wish to take this opportunity of drawing the attention of the House to the necessity for increasing the number of Factory and Workshop Inspectors, a necessity which I have repeatedly urged upon the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. On the occasion of the Second Reading of the Factories and Workshops Bill the Home Secretary promised to give the matter his immediate attention, but afterwards, when the Report stage of the Bill was reached, he withdrew from this, and consented only to consider the question after he had had some experience of the working of the Bill. This is eminently unsatisfactory. A complete and indisputable case has for a long time past been made out for a substantial increase in the number of Factory Inspectors, and it is most undesirable that the subject should be again shelved in the manner proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. The present staff is not lacking in either industry or ability, but is simply utterly inadequate in strength to inspect thoroughly the number of factories and workshops which ought to be inspected. It is not necessary in order to meet the difficulty to appoint a large number of additional first-class Inspectors. A plan worth consideration would be to appoint a number of younger men at smaller salaries—say, of £150 a year—who could be promoted to the higher class in due course. In this way a large increase in the number of Inspectors could be effected at a comparatively small cost. Probably, £10,000 or £15,000 would suffice to produce a substantial improvement. It is intolerable that the Department which is entrusted with the protection of the lives of hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children throughout the country should be so scandalously undermanned, and if the right hon. Gentleman will consent to bring about a change in this respect he will be heartily supported by all sections of the House. The proposal made is not a new one. It has been urged again and again for years, and it is exceedingly to be regretted that the right hon. Gentleman has recognised the need for immediate inquiry into the question early in the Session, should, at a later date, when the Factories and Workshops Bill had been placed practically out of danger, go back upon his words and postpone taking action in the matter until the Act has been in operation for some years. It is impossible to say what may happen during that time. It is even possible that the right hon. Gentleman may not, at the end of it, find himself in a position to give effect to his pledge. For my own part I have no wish to proceed to the unpleasant extremity of dividing the Committee against the salary of the right hon. Gentleman, and I trust that he will obviate this by consenting to reconsider the question during the Recess, so that he may be able next Session to make a statement regarding it which will prove satisfactory to all sections of the House. If the right hon. Gentleman should find that the Treasury put obstacles in the way, the House will help him to overcome the Treasury's resistance.

(7.47.) MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): I concur with the hon. Member who has just spoken as to the disappointment which will be caused in the country by the attitude of the Home Secretary upon this question, and I should have greatly regretted if advantage had not been taken of this opportunity to raise a discussion upon it. I do not propose to repeat the arguments of the hon. Member opposite, but I wish to support what he has said. The representatives of the textile industry in the district which I represent have frequently explained to me that the number of the Inspectors is very insufficient. There is little use in passing Acts for the more efficient control of factories and workshops if there are not enough Inspectors to see that the provisions of those Acts are carried out. No one complains of the manner in which the existing Inspectors perform their duties. It is not their fault if there are too few of them. The Factories and Workshops Bill which has passed through this House has considerably increased the duties of the Inspectors, and it is quite impossible for the work to be done efficiently unless we largely augment the staff. No doubt the Treasury would consent to the necessary outlay if a little pressure were brought to bear upon it.

*(7.52.) MR. LENG (Dundee): I wish to ask the Home Secretary not only to consider the propriety of making a large addition to the Inspectors' staff, but also to appoint sub-Inspectresses to guard the interests of the women and children employed in textile manufactories and in workshops, and whose lives and limbs are endangered just as much as those of the men. There is all the more need of inspection nowadays by reason of the rapid speed at which machinery is worked. I do urge the right hon. Gentleman to try this experiment, and not to condemn it without trial. A number of women engaged in the flax and jute industry waited upon me recently, and represented that they hardly ever saw an Inspector, and that when they did see one they were restrained by motives of delicacy from making statements regarding sanitary and other matters which they would not hesitate to make to persons of their own sex. There are many matters, such as those connected with sanitation, which female Inspectors might overlook, and intelligent and well qualified women could not be better employed. I fear that in some Trades Unionist quarters this is not a very acceptable proposal, but, on the other hand, women are entitled to just as much consideration as men, and this is one of the matters in which concessions should be made to them.

(7.56.) MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I am convinced that all over the country there is a strong demand for more inspection, for it is known that it is physically impossible for the existing number of Inspectors to do the work which ought to be done. We are not asking the right hon. Gentleman to undertake an unnecessary expenditure. I do not believe that the country will grudge the money that would be required in order that the staff might be increased. Inspectors' visits are much needed in workshops where no machinery is used. There are, for example, tailors' workshops, where the conditions are most insanitary, and where no Inspector sets foot from one year's end to another. No means of dealing with the sweating system would be so effective as the means which would be provided by having a large number of Inspectors who could visit workshops at unexpected moments. I am in favour of the appointment of female Inspectors, and I should like to correct the statement of the hon. Member for Dundee that Trades Unionists are averse to it, for the Trade Union Congress has repeatedly passed resolutions in support of that proposal. At Dundee, in fact, a resolution was carried by a very large majority. I believe that the Trades Unions are too anxious for the work of inspection to be well done to object to such appointments; and bearing in mind the large number of workshops in which women only are employed, I am convinced of the desirability of having female Inspectors. I therefore join in the appeals which have been made to the right hon. Gentleman so to re-arrange the districts as to increase the number of Inspectors, and to at least try the experiment of having one female Inspector.

(8.3.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I should like to place a few facts before the right hon. Gentleman. It seems to me that the number of accidents taking place in the factories and workshops is altogether disproportionate.

At the same time, I do not suggest that that is due to any neglect on the part of Her Majesty's Inspectors. I agree with all that has been said as to the excellent way in which they discharge their duties. But the fact remains that there is not a sufficient number of them. In a Return recently granted the total number of accidents reported last year was 8,211. It must be borne in mind that these figures do not include slight accidents, for the instructions are that no accident is to be reported unless the person injured is kept away from work for 48 hours. Surely there ought not to be so many accidents as that. With regard to the appointment of female Inspectors, I know objection has been taken to their being appointed in cases where there is a large amount of machinery. No doubt it would be difficult to overcome that objection. But there are many cases in which female Inspectors might well be utilised, as, for instance, amongst the tailoresses, and in trades in which women and girls alone are employed. I believe that in Liverpool there are no fewer than 50 tailoring establishments in which women work. As to the cost of increasing the staff, that is a secondary consideration. Hon. Members are ready enough to vote money for the purpose of destroying life, and surely a little of that money might be devoted to the useful task of saving life.

(8.9.) MR. MATTHEWS: In the speeches we have had to-night on this question I think we have heard some very extreme views as to the possibilities of inspection. It seems to be suggested there should be an Inspector standing in every factory looking after every workman. I entirely agree that we have not got Inspectors enough for that; but if we are to meet that demand, we must increase the staff of Inspectors, not by tens, but by hundreds. We never undertook to superintend factories. Of course not. That some increase of Inspectors may be necessary in consequence of the Bill which this House has passed I do not dispute, but that we should deal with the responsibility of employers would be most unwise. As to female Inspectors, there would be great difficulty in arranging anything like a district in which the time of a female Inspector would be anything like occupied. I can assure the Committee that I am the last man who desires that the Act shall not be efficiently worked, but I cannot undertake the inspectorship suggested by the Member for Leicester. Nor did my predecessor make any increase of Inspectors. The hon. Member for West Nottingham has endeavoured to extort a pledge that working men Inspectors shall be appointed, and has suggested that they might have lower salaries than the present Inspectors.

*MR. BROADHURST: I suggested that there might be two classes of Inspectors, the new Inspectors to have a lower salary at the commencement.

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not think the House would allow any such distinction to be drawn. I hope that some day we may get a good Employers' Liability Act. As I have said, I think it would be embarking on an unwise course to change our system of inspection into superintendence. If we do we destroy the responsibility of the owner and the manager, and that, in my opinion, would be a great misfortune.

*(8.22.) MR. BUCHANAN: I think that the answer of the Home Secretary is far from a satisfactory one. An excellent opportunity is now afforded of making our system of factory inspection much more efficient. We know that the working classes have long advocated the appointment of working men Inspectors, and ever since I have had a seat in this House that has been pressed upon the Government. I do urge the Government, now that it has passed an excellent Factories Bill, to ensure its effectual working by strengthening the staff of Inspectors. Mr. Redgrave told the Sweating Committee that there was an insufficient staff, and such an authoritative opinion ought not to be disregarded. We have been told that the Home Secretary has increased the Inspectors by two. [An hon. MEMBER: Three.] But what are the facts? There are 57 in the Estimates of this year. Last year there were 57. In 1885-86 the number was 56. In 1880-81 there were 55. That is the increase that has taken place in 10 years. The evidence given before the Sweating Committee showed that the inspection was insufficient, and that more inspection would check much evil, and the Report states that—

"We are all of opinion that an adequate number of Inspectors should be appointed to enforce a due observance of the law."

That is a strong expression of opinion, and we urge it on the Government in the hope that they will take the matter up and settle it. I hope also that the Government will bear in mind the recommendation of the Berlin Conference, which was that the carrying out of its proposals should be superintended by specially qualified Inspectors, nominated by the Government, and independent alike of employer and employed. That Resolution was supported by all the Powers but two—France and Sweden—and France abstained because she considered that she had an adequate staff already. Great Britain supported the Resolution, and it was carried without any dissent at the Berlin Conference. Therefore, we can appeal to the Government, in the present condition of affairs in the country, because of the credit attached to the successful working of the Bill which is about to pass into law, and also because of the pledges given to the labouring classes of this country and of Europe, to see that the administration of the Act in this country is brought to the utmost point of efficiency to be an example to labour administration in other countries of Europe. (8.30.)

(9.5.) MR. MORTON: I desire to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary—whom I do not at this moment see in his place—to the case of Lydia Cook, of Southend. I have taken some trouble to inquire into the case, and I find at the last moment, from a telegram which has been placed in my hands, that the costs and fines were not remitted, as the Home Secretary promised in his answer on the 26th June.

MR. JACKSON: He did not promise.

MR. MORTON: I will read his answer if you like. He said he proposed to call the attention of the Bench to the matter, and to recommend that they should remit and repay the costs. Well, such a recommendation as that, coming from the Home Secretary means, to a large extent, an order that these costs should be refunded. The Magistrates have not refunded them, and apparently they are breaking the law. I take it to be the duty of the Home Secretary to see that the law is obeyed. I therefore want to call attention to the Act of Parliament alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman in his answer—Section 8 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act—which he himself said was sometimes overlooked by Magistrates. In that section it is laid down that no costs are to be imposed unless the fine exceeds 5s., or unless an express order is made by the Magistrates as to costs. In this particular case, so far as I know, there was no express order made. In fact, from the Home Secretary's statement, one sees that there could not have been such order, for he said that in the Report he had received from the Magistrates it was stated that they had made the fine low because they took into account the amount of the costs. Therefore, there was no express order such as is set out in the Act of Parliament.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member says the Magistrates have done something illegal, beyond the Statute. The matter is clearly one which should be brought before a Court of Law. It is not within the competence of the Home Secretary to deal with it.

MR. MORTON: I am going on to urge that there should be an alteration made in the law as to the payment of Magistrates clerks.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. MORTON: Do I understand that there are no means of calling attention to this case except by moving the adjournment of the House, which I should be very sorry to do, particularly at this time of the Session. I wish, also, to call attention to the constitution of the Bench in this particular case.

THE CHAIRMAN: According to the hon. Member's own statement, the case has nothing to do with the administrative acts of the Home Secretary as an officer of the Crown, and is, therefore, irrelevant to the Vote before the Committee.

(9.10.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I must apologise for varying the subject, but the Home Secretary's functions are so varied that it is necessary that discussions dealing with his office should range over a considerable number of subjects. I wish to call attention to the action of the Home Secretary in connection with the Salvation Army at Eastbourne, a subject on which I put a question some weeks ago. The point where it touches on the Home

Secretary's action and on this Vote is this: I wish to urge the Home Secretary to exercise the prerogative of mercy of which he is the dispenser, and to liberate those members of the Salvation Army who are now undergoing a sentence of some severity for taking part in processions in Eastbourne. I should not urge this just now if it were not for the peculiar circumstances of the case—the peculiar position of the town of Eastbourne, which I contend justifies my request to the Home Secretary. Under the general law of this country such processions are not illegal so long as they do not lead to disturbances; but Eastbourne, Hastings (and, in 1888, Torquay) have clauses in their private Acts which impose a penalty on persons taking part in those proceedings on Sundays. So far as I know, no question has arisen in respect of Hastings; but in 1888 the matter came before the House in connection with Torquay, and an attempt was made to bring in a Bill to repeal the clause in the private Act, which clause constituted an offence in that town, acts which were not an offence elsewhere. The Home Secretary at that time gave the view of the Home Office on the matter, and it is because of the exceptional character of the view expressed by the Home Office that I urge the right hon. Gentleman to exercise the prerogative of mercy in this matter, and that I complain that he has not hitherto done so. In 1888 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton and myself, and one or two others, were unable to proceed by way of a Bill for the rectification—from our point of view—of the position of the law. To have brought in a Bill for repealing a certain clause in the Torquay Harbour Act, as we endeavoured to do, we found it would be necessary to give all the notices required in the case of a Private Bill, which was practically impossible. The same thing happened this year with regard to Eastbourne. Hence it is that I now make this appeal to the Home Secretary. The fact that we were not able to proceed with our proposals is itself one of the strongest arguments against the introduction of this particular clause in a Private Act of Parliament, because, practically, the House—or private Members of the House—are prevented from dealing with the Act as they would with a general Act. That, I believe, itself is one of the arguments which the Home Office, so far as I can gather, were cognisant of and felt when they took the steps I will presently refer to. But before I come to the action of the Home Office, I would just conclude the matter of the Torquay Harbour Act, because it is a point in the case. We were very lucky that year, because, fortunately, the Local Authority of Torquay had to come to Parliament for a Private Bill, and that gave the opportunity for making terms with them and securing the withdrawal of the clause, the repeal of which was assented to unanimously by the House, while it must have been a satisfaction to the Home Office, which was so far relieved of a difficulty. This was in 1886; but in 1885 Acts were passed for Eastbourne and Hastings which contained the same clause as the Torquay Act. The Eastbourne Act is a voluminous one—one containing 200 clauses. It refers to borrowing powers, to Stocks, and to a large number of improvements connected with the town. It contains, also, a little group of one or two clauses, of which this clause to which I am now directing special attention is one, and which says that no procession shall take place on a Sunday in any street or public place in the borough accompanied by any instrumental music, fireworks, or the discharge of cannon, firearms, or other disturbing noise. In the Eastbourne case the clause as proposed referred to every day of the week, but it was restricted to Sunday by the Committee on the Bill. Those who promoted the Bill at that time obviously had in view considerably wider powers than those which the Bill as ultimately passed conferred. I ought to say that the Committee to which these Bills were referred was a Committee first created, I believe, at the instance of the late Member for Stockport—Mr. Charles Hopwood, Recorder of Liverpool, who was extremely strong for individual liberty, and who was very jealous of clauses introduced in connection with police matters in Private Bills. In this way we secured from the Government of the day that there should be such a Committee, so that there should be a special Report on any clause in the Bill which altered the Common Law of the country. But the Committee in the present case seems to have been rather the offender than the defender, and to have sinned against the advice and, indeed, the warning—if I may so say—of the Home Office—and this strengthens the argument I am putting with regard to the Home Office. We brought forward this matter in 1888, and the Home Secretary frankly placed before us the fact that the Home Office over which he presided had brought before the Committee their objection to such a clause, because they felt that such a law ought to be a general law, or ought not to be adopted at all. That is a view with which I entirely coincide. The Committee did not accept that view. They acted differently from the way that I am sure Mr. Hopwood would have desired them to act. They introduced new police legislation in a Private Bill, contrary to the view of the Home Office.

(9.21.) THE CHAIRMAN: I think I am now possessed of the hon. Member's argument. He apparently urges that it is the duty of the Home Secretary to recommend the exercise of the clemency of the Crown in the case of all offenders under this special clause of the Act, because this clause is the same as one which was repealed by Parliament.

MR. J. STUART: That is scarcely my argument, Sir. My argument is that the Home Secretary ought to exercise clemency under the circumstances of the case, but I say that the fact that it is an extraordinary Act of Parliament greatly enhances the force of the argument.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must deal with something that is specially connected with the case. Otherwise we shall have a most formidable extension of the power of discussion in Committee.

MR. J. STUART: Well, Sir, I shall not pursue that line of argument. I will refer to the special circumstances in the case that call for the exercise of clemency in connection with the persons put in prison in Eastbourne. A number of processions took place in the street, and the processionists were attacked by a number of roughs at different times. The Magistrates inflicted sentences of a month's imprisonment—which I submit is very severe—and alternatively a fine of £5. The roughs who attacked them were, on the other hand, let off with a warning, and told not to do it again. I submit that, under the circumstances, the members of the Salvation Army have been very inequitably treated, and the more so because the proceedings were taken under an exceptional local Act. It is evidently the intention of the authorities to stop processions of the Salvation Army, whose members are laid open to the attacks of roughs, and are not protected from them as they ought to be, and as they would be in any town except the two towns which have got this clause in local Acts. Considering that the Salvation Army is not a body to be condemned generally, that its members do a great deal of good in their own way among the neglected classes, and that the clause in the local Act has been applied, I believe, only to the Salvation Army, I think a very fair case has been made out for asking the Home Secretary to mitigate the severe sentences which have been passed upon a number of law-abiding citizens, and to put a stop to a state of things in Eastbourne which is far from creditable.

THE CHAIRMAN: The speech of the hon. Gentleman has no application to the Vote. The speech of the hon. Member is a condemnation of the clause in the local Act, but the policy of that clause does not constitute a ground for appealing to the Home Secretary for the exercise of clemency.

(9.30.) MR. S. SMITH: I wish to ask the attention of the Committee to what I consider to be violations of the intention of the Vivisection Act, and in connection with the subject I propose to move a reduction of the Vote. It is very desirable that this House should from time to time review the whole question of vivisection, and the working of the Act should be kept jealously under the control of the House, the subject should be carefully watched, for the practice of vivisection has a tendency to develop into the greatest cruelty to animals. I am sure I am giving expression to a strong feeling in the country that the practice, if tolerated at all, should be subject to the most rigid supervision. There can be no doubt that of recent years vivisection has been spreading rapidly in this country, and that a great portion of it is unauthorised, and takes place without the inspection required by the Act. The Act has been largely evaded, and will be evaded still more if Parliament does not keep a vigilant watch over these experiments. I wish to call particular attention to a class of experiments upon living animals that have been conducted by a Dr. Klein, who holds some official appointment under the Local Government Board. I ask the Committee for a moment or two to listen to some of the statements made by Dr. Klein and published in the 19th Annual Report of the Local Government Board. It seems that Dr. Klein has been experimenting upon the eyes of cats by injecting diphtheric and cancerous elements, producing in the eyes of these unfortunate animals the most horrible diseases, and I will make one or two quotations from the Report he makes to the Department of what he has done presumably with the sanction of the Local Government Board. In his further Report on the Etiology of Diphtheria Dr. Klein says—

“During the year just passed a number of additional experiments on the cat's cornea and conjunctiva have been instituted with cultivations of this diphtheria bacillus. I subjoin a few instances of successful inoculation of cats.”

I give the results in the words of the Report, and the Committee will judge whether the most horrible treatment was not inflicted on these unfortunate animals. Here is one case—

“The cornea and conjunctiva (previously scraped) of two cats were inoculated. In both these animals the disease set in with great intensity. On the 14th day both eyes of this cat were closed, copious muco-purulent matter had collected. This animal was killed on the 17th day: the disease still progressing.”

For 17 days the animal was subjected to this horrible treatment.

“The ulcer on the cornea reached down to the descemet membrane.”

A diagram accompanies the Report. Here is another case—

“From an Agar sub-culture the corneæ of two other cats were inoculated. One of these cats was killed on the 15th day. One cornea was opaque, the other showed a deep crater-like ulcer, with raised opaque margin; conjunctiva much congested, swollen, and coated with purulent matter. The other cat had considerable suppuration from the conjunctiva of both eyes.”

The Report goes on with accounts of a great many similar experiments. It seems that 12 cats were experimented upon, though the Home Secretary, in the answer he gave to a question to-day, said there had been only one case, the answer evading on some technical or physiological ground the plain inference, as it seems to me, to be drawn from these statements. Then another series of experiments on cats were carried out by inoculating them with diseased matter in the groin. Two of the animals were found dead at the end of five days, two others after 10 days, and the last two after 11 days. Then comes a description of the intestines of the animals, so horrible that I will not inflict it upon the Committee, but it requires little scientific knowledge to know that the animals must have endured intolerable agonies while these experiments were being carried on. These are experiments carried out by Dr. Klein, who holds, I believe, some position under Government. He is Professor of the Brown Institute. He has held licences for vivisection and certificates for dispensing with the use of anæsthetics since 1884. In 1889 he conducted 96 experiments without anæsthetics. In 1887 he returned 46 pathological experiments—

MR. MATTHEWS: May I ask what the hon. Gentleman is quoting from?

*MR. S. SMITH: From a paper which I shall be happy to put into the hands of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. MATTHEWS: The statements the hon. Member is making are almost all inaccurate, and I ask upon whose authority he is making them?

*MR. S. SMITH: The statements are published under the authority of the Victoria Street Society. ["Oh!"] This is a Society which I think is not deserving of contempt. It is a valuable Society, which has done a vast deal of good. Of course, if the statements are incorrect, I shall be happy to have them corrected. Dr. Klein, as I have said, is superintendent of the Brown Animal Sanatory Institute, founded by a gentleman who laid down as a condition in his will—

"Kindness to animals committed to the Professor's charge shall be a general principle of the institution."

Now, I ask the Committee whether experiments such as I have been describing illustrate the kindness which was to be the characteristic of the Brown Institute?

Mr. S. Smith

This Dr. Klein made several very remarkable statements before the Royal Commission. Among other things he stated that he "had no regard at all to the sufferings of the animals." Again and again he stated he disregarded entirely the sufferings of the animals. Then again he said, "A man who conducts an experiment has no time to think what the animal will feel or suffer." I commend these quotations to the attention of the Home Secretary, who asks me for my authority for what I quote, and I ask him are these proper qualifications for a public servant entrusted with this extremely delicate duty?

MR. MATTHEWS: He is not a Government official.

*MR. S. SMITH: He makes his Report to the Local Government Board, and, at all events, he is under the supervision of this House in relation to the operation of a law of the land. He has publicly stated that he is a man who does not care what an animal may feel or suffer. I say you cannot expect anything but cruelty from a man who expresses such a view. I have quoted from one paper; I might have quoted from many more to give specimens of the atrocities committed under the name of vivisection; and I say unless the House is very zealous in watching the administration of this Act, it will be discovered, when too late, that the practice of vivisection has spread all over the country to the hardening of heart and petrifying of all feelings of tenderness, as it has done in many countries on the Continent. The Committee, perhaps, is not aware that in some continental countries it is not unknown to boil live animals to death and roast them to death, and to watch their sufferings, taking notes for what is called a scientific purpose. The fact is, when men abandon themselves to a mania for experiments on live animals there is no degree of cruelty to which, under the name of science, they may not ultimately be led. Nothing hardens the natural feelings more than the continual infliction of cruelty upon helpless animals. As an illustration, I may mention what occurred last week in Berlin, where it has been discovered that the practice of vivisection has been carried to such an extent that living human beings have been vivisected. It has been acknowledged that in the hospitals doctors have actually gone so far as to inject cancerous matter into patients to observe the effect. I say if we allow the practice to proceed unchecked we may have that done in hospitals here. If we allow the system at all we must keep a tight rein upon it. I should like to see it entirely abolished, but I suppose that is more than we can expect in these days. If there must be such experiments let them be conducted upon animals with a low order of vitality—upon frogs or living things of less sentient nature than domestic animals capable of most acute sufferings. It is demoralising to subject the dog, the friend of man, to such cruel, horrible treatment. I am the more impelled to mention this because on all sides there are arising schools of medicine where vivisection is practised under various names. “Institute of Preventive Medicine” is one name used. They adopt deceptive names to hide the real object from the public. Where you find such ambiguous names you may suspect there is something wrong. The specious titles adopted by such bodies throughout the country convey the impression that they are ashamed to state their direct object. Only by investigation and probing do you find that “Pasteur Institute” and “School of Preventive Medicine” are names that hide these cruel practices. I know what the feeling of the country is, and I appeal to the Committee to give an expression of opinion to-night which will have a restraining effect upon the strong bias which has set in in favour of vivisection all over the country.

*(9.45.) MR. McLAREN: I desire to support the appeal which my hon. Friend has made. There can be no doubt that during the right hon. Gentleman's tenure of office these experiments and licences have increased in number. It is useless to protest against the practice of vivisection altogether; but I believe that under the present operation of the Act there are a number of cases in which experiments are performed, not for the purpose of making new discoveries, but for the purpose of demonstrating over and over again discoveries already made. That is the sort of vivisection which the right hon. Gentleman ought to discourage. I will not attempt to dispute that scientific discoveries have been made by means of vivisection; but when the scientific fact is once established, it is not surely necessary to continue painful experiments. There are a large number of vivisectors in medical schools who perform experiments over and over again simply with the object of demonstrating to students medical truths which are perfectly well known, and ought to be taken for granted on the evidence supplied in previous years. As to experiments for making fresh discoveries, really conducted for purposes of scientific research, I presume we cannot prevent them, but they should be stringently limited, and carried out with the utmost regard to suffering, the animals being under anæsthetics. With regard to Dr. Klein's experiments on cats' eyes it has been stated by the Home Secretary that they were not performed in this country, but I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman has been misinformed on this point. The Report on the subject was made to the English Government, and there is nothing in that Report to show that the experiments were made out of England. The Report gives the results in great detail, and there may have been reasons for performing them, but surely now they may cease. My hon. Friend has read some extracts, which the Home Secretary said were inaccurate, but many of the statements published by the Victoria Street Society were copied from Dr. Klein's Report, and there my hon. Friend is not open to a charge of inaccuracy. But the point I wish to press is that the Inspector allowed these experiments to be carried on to the extent described in this Report to the Government Department. As I have said, there is no trace in the Report of the experiments having been made out of England. The right hon. Gentleman says they were made abroad. I cannot help thinking the Inspector has been misinformed, or there has been some misunderstanding by which the Home Secretary has not been put in full possession of the facts. The answer of the Home Secretary to my hon. Friend the Member for Flint on June 15 was very different from the answer given to-day. The right hon. Gentleman then said—

“I am informed by the Inspector that he only knows of one case in which the operation of inoculation in the eye has been practised in this country. In that case he reports that the charge in the eye was microscopic, and that the animal appeared quite free from pain."

But to-day the Home Secretary has given us a different version, for he said in answer to my question that the Inspector informed him that he had "seen" only one case of inoculation of the interior chamber of the eye. Now, that is a very different thing to knowing of only one. I was struck by the phrase had seen only one case. I do not think that the Inspector is bound to be present at the experiments, but I cannot help thinking, though I do not wish to put an unfair construction upon the words used, that the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was rather misleading. It should be observed, too, that throughout his Report Dr. Klein again and again refers to these cases as "inoculation." In the face of all that is contained in the Report, the Inspector tells the Home Secretary that he only knows of one case; and, again, that he has only seen one case, entirely ignoring all those other experiments. I shall be glad, for the credit of English administration, if these experiments were performed out of England. I hope they will be prevented here. The Home Secretary may revoke any licence issued if it is abused, and I think there is ground for such revocation in this instance. I do trust the right hon. Gentleman will impress upon the Inspectors the greatest diligence in preventing abuses under the Act, and that we shall have the number of licences reduced.

*(9.58.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I have the highest respect for the motives of the hon. Members who have brought this question of vivisection before the House, but I must protest against the morbid suspicion with which they view all the proceedings of scientific men. The charges brought against men of the highest scientific position give a great deal more pain to them than is given to the animals experimented upon in a way which is required for the sake of science and for the sake of the advance of medicine and the diminution of suffering both to man and to the lower animals. It is a good thing that the House should, from time to time, review this question, and see whether the provisions of the Act are properly carried out, as an opportunity is thus given to dispel many illusions and to explain away many difficulties which are stumbling blocks in the way of hon. Members who cannot thoroughly study the subject. The hon. Member for Flintshire asserts that the practice of vivisection is spreading throughout the country. There is little evidence of that, but whether that is so or not, there is no evidence for his further statement that there is a great deal of unauthorised vivisection going on in total contravention of the law of the land. Reference has been made to the practice of students making experiments on animals, but it should be remembered that such experiments cannot be carried out without elaborate apparatus and proper accommodation. Experiments on living animals are only made for the purpose of testing some new point in science, and of making some research, the result of which is made public afterwards. It has been urged also that the Home Secretary ought to exercise greater stringency in granting licences. The objection I have to offer is rather that the stringency is felt to be so great as to hamper the progress of scientific research, and to prevent this country from keeping pace in science with other countries. I think that it is unnecessary in these days to be called upon to defend the success and utility of experiments on animals. Some of the experiments which have been denounced in Parliament in bygone days as being cruel and without a scientific object have been proved to be of the utmost value—as, for instance, the experiments of Ferrier's on the brains of monkeys. Those and kindred other experiments have been of the greatest service to surgery in this country; they have saved many lives, and have alleviated a great deal of terrible suffering. It is too late to defend scientific experiments. All we have to consider is whether the law is properly carried out under the present system of administration. Though undoubtedly some suffering must necessarily be caused to the animals in making experiments of this kind, still I maintain that the ultimate results are of such a nature and of such high value as to override all considerations on that head.

They have been productive of great good, not only for the practical purposes of medicine, but towards preventing disease in the future. Reference has been made to the Institute of Preventive Medicine. I should like to point out that that Institute is a private enterprise in which the operations of Pasteur are to be carried out in this country. There is no reason why such an Institution should not exist here, so that life may be saved and suffering alleviated by obviating the necessity of losing time and money in a journey to Paris. If such an Institution is really established vivisection experiments can only be carried on by licence. I trust that the Home Secretary will stand firm and enable scientific pursuits to be carried out, even under the extremely restrictive conditions under which they can be carried out in this country.

MR. MATTHEWS: I need say very few words in answer to what has been advanced by hon. Gentlemen on this subject. I do not know why the hon. Member for Crewe (Mr. McLaren) has taken it upon himself to contradict the statement of fact I made earlier this evening. At question time I stated that—

"The Inspector reported to me that he had himself seen only one case of what is technically called 'inoculation of the interior chamber of the eye' since he had been Inspector. This operation is quite distinct from the application of injective material to the surface of the eye, which was the procedure in Dr. Klein's experiments. Moreover, those experiments were made before Dr. Poore was appointed Inspector, and were performed not in this country, but in Hungary."

I do not know what authority the hon. Member has for contradicting that statement.

*MR. McLAREN: I said the whole framework of the Report gave one a very strong impression that the experiment had been carried out in this country.

MR. MATTHEWS: That is now distinct information: the Inspector informs me that Dr. Klein's experiments were performed at his own home in South Hungary. I have no reason to doubt the information. I gather that Dr. Klein does not hold the necessary certificate for experimenting on cats in this country. He holds certificate "A," which enables him to make inoculation experiments on rabbits, guinea pigs, and animals of that class. There is, therefore, nothing to answer. I would rather not discuss Dr. Klein's experiments. I am informed that the experiments are of great value for the purpose of preventive medicine and in alleviating the torture of children suffering from diphtheria. They are also useful in showing that children ought to be guarded against contact with domestic animals, because contagion might be communicated. My function is not to follow my own sympathies in this matter, but to administer this Vivisection Act strictly and fairly. I have given no licences for experiments in private houses. I have only given licences and certificates for vivisection experiments in some public institution where a scientific audience can surround the experimenter and see what is being done.

(10.15.) MR. MORTON: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the meaning of the item on page 90, sub-head (a), "Allowances to Purveyor of Luncheons, £25." I have also to ask for information as to an omission in the accounts. On page 88 there is a note as to fees received under various heads. They amount to £2,575; but I do not find any account of the fees which are said to be received on the making of Bishops, and, I presume also, Archbishops. I want to know for what these fees are paid, and what becomes of them. In a letter which has been written on this subject I find it stated that after his installation a Bishop preached a sermon from the text that "a certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell amongst thieves." That text has not much to do with this particular matter except that I do not find any account of these fees on page 88. Perhaps the Home Secretary will give us some information in regard to these fees.

MR. STUART WORTLEY: The fees appear in the total but not in detail. If the hon. Gentleman wishes for information about any particular item I shall be most happy to give it.

MR. MORTON: Where are these fees to be found?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: They are duly accounted for and go into the Exchequer for the benefit of the general taxpayer. As to the item for the Purveyor of Luncheons, the gentlemen who serve the State in the Home Department like those in other Departments have to live, and arrangement has to be made for them to be supplied with food inside the office.

MR. MORTON: In many mercantile houses food is prepared for the officers, but I have always understood that the cost has been defrayed out of the profit on the provisions. As to the fees, it is all very well to say they are included in a general statement, but——

MR. STUART WORTLEY: I beg the hon. Member's pardon; this is the first year they do not appear in this Vote.

MR. MORTON: Then I shall find them under another Vote. I will have a turn at that, Sir.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £46,015, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1892, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs."

(10.22.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I desire to move a nominal reduction of the salary of the Secretary for Foreign Affairs by £100. I have before stated my admiration of the way in which foreign affairs have been conducted by the present Foreign Secretary, but there is one matter with regard to which I think a cloud has arisen, namely, the situation in the Mediterranean, and the understanding we are told Her Majesty's Government have come to with Italy, and the bearing of the Triple Alliance upon our position in the Mediterranean. The declaration as to the understanding is in somewhat vague terms. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has admitted that there is an understanding in some terms, the object being to maintain the present status quo in the Mediterranean. I hope nothing has been done to bind this country, but it is somewhat unfortunate that there is any understanding which implies more or less that Her Majesty's Ministers express some intention of maintaining the status quo in the Mediterranean in concert with the Triple Alliance. It has been asserted in some quarters that this amounts to a quadruple alliance. I hope it does not mean anything of the kind. I think there could be no greater misfortune than that we should do anything which touches the sensitive feelings of the French, who are our nearest neighbours, and with whom we come in contact in almost every part of the world. I hope we may have some reassuring statement that the state of things is not one which will give just cause of grievance to France. I think an understanding confined to the Mediterranean only is altogether disadvantageous to this country. It is an understanding with regard to the other Powers of "heads I win, tails you lose." We shall have to give Italy in case of need the assistance of our fleet without any corresponding requirement on their part to give us assistance on land in the event of our possessions being threatened or attacked. We have seen in the French newspapers that the maintenance of the status quo in the Mediterranean means the permanent possession of Egypt by this country. It does seem to me to imply a long continuance of our occupation of Egypt, an occupation which I consider a source of weakness to this country. I dislike to learn that there have been vague understandings which in any degree pledge Her Majesty's Government to interfere in behalf of the Triple Alliance, and in the hope that we may have some reassuring words from the representative of the Foreign Office I beg to move the reduction of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, of £47,460, Salaries, be reduced by £100, part of the Salary of the Secretary of State."—(Sir George Campbell.)

(10.30.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I have very often addressed the House on the subject of Egypt, and therefore I do not propose to say anything on the subject this evening. It seems to me the most important matter at the present time is this understanding, whatever it may be, with Italy. What has led to it? As the Committee know, in 1870, after the Franco-German War, Alsace and Lorraine were taken from France by Germany against the desire of Prince Bismarck, who was entirely overruled by the military party. Prince Bismarck knew that his country, situated in the middle of Europe, was without any real frontiers, with Russia, Austria, and France adjacent, and that if there were a coalition of either of the other two Powers with France against Germany the result to Germany would not be satisfactory. He therefore sought for allies. The first alliance was the alliance of the three Emperors, those of Austria, Russia, and Germany. That alliance very soon broke down. Jealousies occurred between those potentates, and the alliance came to an end. It was succeeded in 1879 by what may be termed the alliance of the Emperors of Austria and Germany, and this alliance was entered into against their former ally, Russia, and the French Republic. If Russia or France attacked either Germany or Austria it became a casus belli with the Power not directly attacked. It was a defensive alliance. When this alliance was announced Lord Salisbury showed his animus. He said he had to announce to his countrymen "good tidings of great joy." Even accepting Lord Salisbury's view of the desirability of this alliance, in my opinion it was a very great mistake to suppose that this alliance could be of advantage to the British Empire, because it kept Russia from interfering in Europe, and she was thrown back upon Asia. In 1883 Italy joined the two allies, Austria and Germany. I believe there were separate alliances between Italy and each of those other Powers. This was a defensive alliance in which Italy joined against France and Russia. In 1887 these separate alliances were merged in the Triple Alliance. M.

Depretis was then Premier of Italy, but was shortly afterwards succeeded by M. Crispi, who took up his policy. When it was proposed to Italy to join in this Triple Alliance she hesitated, and Lord Salisbury—whether urged by Prince Bismarck or not I do not know—came forward and explained to Italy that she might do this without any great risk to her coasts or Fleet from the Fleet of France, because of certain assurances he gave to Italy at that time. What those assurances were we are not told. I called attention to the matter in 1888, and got a reply stating rather what Lord Salisbury had not done than what he had done. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary showed himself an excellent diplomatist of the old school. I have on many occasions asked questions of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the assurances that were given by Lord Salisbury, and I never acquired very much knowledge from the answers given me by the right hon. Gentleman. About ten days ago the right hon. Gentleman, in reply to a question, spoke of something as an existing understanding with Italy. I asked the right hon. Gentleman next day what the existing understanding was, and I was told that it was with the common object of maintaining the status quo in the Mediterranean, a principle which Her Majesty's Government in Parliament had frankly avowed. I asked whether I was to understand that France had been informed of what this understanding was. In reply, the right hon. Gentleman told me that I was not to understand that France had been informed, which practically meant that France had not been.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): I said the hon. Member was not to understand more than I said.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Quite so; but the right hon. Gentleman is not prepared to say positively that France was not informed. The answer he gave was a diplomatic answer, and I do not suppose the right hon. Gentleman will now get up and say that France has been informed. Now, it appears to me that Italy has misunderstood what the understanding is. Italy is under the delusion that there is an understanding between her and this country. In point of fact, there can only have been an expression of opinion on the part of Lord Salisbury as to what he and his Party would do if he were in power under certain contingencies. We have it in evidence what Italy considers the understanding to be. M. Crispi lately published in an English review an article upon our relations with Italy, and he took it for granted that if Italy found herself at war with France, owing to having joined the Triple Alliance, the English fleet would ally itself with the Italian fleet to defend the Italian coasts. But another statement was made in reference to this matter on the 14th of May in the Italian Parliament by Signor Chiara, a deputy of some importance on the Conservative side, and a supporter of the present Italian Ministry—a statement made in a Debate on the renewal of the Triple Alliance, and in no way contradicted by the Italian Ministers in whose presence it was made. The speech was made with the object of inducing Radicals to consent to the renewal of the Triple Alliance. The deputy spoke of the negotiations entered into between England and Italy for the maintenance of Italian interests, which are recognised as identical with British interests, and said that never had any Government attempted to obtain what Count Robilant had obtained; that the position of Italy was now secure on land and sea; and that so long as Italy and England remained allied with the Central Powers of Europe it would be too risky an enterprise for France to attempt reconquest, even if that Power could count on Russia. When I asked the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he could throw any light on those statements, the right hon. Gentleman did not deny them. He again made a diplomatic answer. He explained that we were not bound to go to war for Italy, and said that our hands were free, but he did not state whether Lord Salisbury had made such statements as to justify what was said in the Italian Parliament—that the position of Italy was now secure by land and sea. Unless the House realises what the Triple Alliance is it cannot appreciate the full meaning of the understanding referred to. Italy, as I have said, has joined the alliance, which is a defensive alliance against France and Russia. Consequently, if France were to seek to reconquer Alsace and Lorraine, Italy would be forced to send an army to the frontier and declare war against that Power. The attempt at reconquest would become a casus belli and Italy would be at war with France. If France were then to attack Italy, presuming the statements made in the Italian Chamber to be correct, that our object is to maintain the status quo in the Mediterranean, and that Lord Salisbury has entered into any engagements, we should be forced to defend the Italian coast, and to prevent any evil consequences in the cession of territory if France got the upper hand. It amounts to this, then—that if France were to seek to regain the provinces lost by her in 1870, it would practically be a casus belli against her not only for the Triple Alliance, but for us, unless France were to consent to the absurdity that the Italian Army might attack her, and she might not attack the coast of Italy with her fleet. France is a great naval Power, far stronger on the sea than Italy, and naturally and rightly she would in such circumstances make use of her fleet. Lord Salisbury's notion seems to be that just as these three allies are making themselves a police force to maintain the Continental peace, so we with our Navy should make ourselves a sort of police force to maintain the status quo in the Mediterranean. It might, of course, be to our interest that an English Minister should express a wish to maintain the status quo, but it is a very different thing to say that under all contingencies we ought to make war in order to do so. Still more is it a different matter for a Minister to give assurances as to the action of the British Government to one particular State in the Mediterranean in order to induce that particular State to join in an alliance against another State in the Mediterranean. I contend that this action on the part of Lord Salisbury is absolutely improper. Of course, we all know perfectly well that Lord Salisbury cannot bind this country. But it must be remembered that Lord Salisbury cannot separate his position as Foreign Minister from his position as the head of a Party, and thus, speaking as Foreign Minister, he also speaks as head of a Party, and simply says what he would do under certain circumstances. Italy is under the delusion, as I have said, that Lord Salisbury has pledged the country to a particular line of action, when, of course, he has no power to do so. I say that the action of Lord Salisbury was not only improper, but was unwise. A real statesman never anticipates action under possible future contingencies; he waits for the contingencies to occur. Lord Salisbury hardly denies that he has acted throughout this matter, I will not say in collusion, but in accord with the three great Powers, and he almost justifies their alliance against France. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary has often said that this is an alliance of peace. I never knew an alliance that was not so called. But peace has never been maintained in Europe by secret alliances, still less by two or three Governments entering into secret understandings against other Great Powers. Such alliances are naturally met by counter-alliances on the part of the countries which are threatened; thus great distrust is caused, and large standing armies are maintained, and inevitably these alliances and counter-alliances end in war. For my own part, I have always been a strong advocate of non-intervention; our insular position justifies that policy, and is an incontestable reason why we should not meddle with the Continental Powers. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) was in favour of this policy, and I should like to contrast the right hon. Gentleman's mode of treating Continental affairs with that of Lord Salisbury. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has always held that we ought to promote, as far as we can, European concert—that we should go into Congresses, but merely in order to put the general welfare of Europe under the ægis of the public opinion of Europe, and the right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that secret alliances between State and State make such concert impossible. But Lord Salisbury did precisely the reverse. He loves secret alliances. He goes in a surreptitious manner to one of the Great Powers; he begs that Power to enter into some secret understanding with himself, and what is the result? These understandings with one Power in Europe lead to misunderstandings with other Powers, and when trouble arises we find ourselves absolutely crippled in any effort to bring back Europe to a state of peace. We have prejudiced our position beforehand, and to speak of that as a statesmanlike act is a profound mistake; it is entirely contrary to what an English statesman ought to do. Take the case of France. We were for a long time the enemies of France, and ever since Waterloo the people of that country regarded us as their natural enemies. We can hardly wonder at this, because we spent a huge number of millions and the blood of many thousands of English soldiers in trying to impose upon France a particular dynasty. Having done all this, we had the pleasure of putting that mighty Monarch Louis XVIII. in the place of Napoleon. All this naturally produced a feeling of soreness which, however, has at length worn off. Having been natural enemies we afterwards became natural friends and allies, and a feeling sprang up which made these two nations—France and England—more anxious than other nations to maintain cordial relations with each other. This feeling, no doubt, was strengthened by the facilities afforded for intercourse by our railways and steamboats, and by the commercial relations which sprang up between the two countries. Our action in Egypt undoubtedly produced a considerable sense of soreness in France, and this being so, it was essential for an English Prime Minister to do nothing to increase that soreness. Lord Salisbury, however, thought differently. When the French Exhibition was opened it was met by the English Administration with a sort of Royal boycott; and when the alliance took place between Austria and Germany, Lord Salisbury came forward and told us he had to announce good tidings of great joy, as an alliance had been formed against Russia and France. When it was proposed to introduce Italy into that alliance he came forward again and actually arrived at an understanding with Italy in order to induce it to join the Triple Alliance against Russia and France. No doubt the Under Secretary will tell the Committee we are on the best terms with France. I have no doubt that technically and officially we are on perfectly good terms with France, but does anybody suppose for an instant that the French people can really feel very cordially towards us when we interfere in this way with Continental Powers with the view of promoting and aiding an alliance to prevent France getting back her provinces? God forbid that I should in any way encourage France to go to war for the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine! but if France were to do so I think it would be a legitimate war on the part of France, and I most decidedly feel that if such a war were unfortunately to occur our sympathies would be entirely on the side of France, and would not be on the side of the Triple Alliance. I feel no antipathy to Germany or Italy, but neither have I any towards France or Russia. If the huge armaments which exist on the Continent are to lead to a conflagration, as I greatly fear they will, my idea is that the first business of a British Minister will be to keep out of the quarrel as far as he possibly can. My hon. Friend behind me complimented Lord Salisbury as a Foreign Minister; for my part I never complimented Lord Salisbury, and never mean to. Lord Salisbury has to be carefully watched. Hon. Gentlemen will remember what occurred at and after the Congress of Berlin. When Lord Salisbury was charged with the Cyprus Treaty he said that the Treaty did not exist, although it was proved it did exist, and under these circumstances we must look with a little grain of salis to the statements of Lord Salisbury. And when Lord Salisbury talks about some understanding the Committee have a right to learn what the understanding really means. I presume that Austria, Germany, and Italy know of this understanding; why are we not to know of it? Either Lord Salisbury thoroughly distrusts his English fellow-countrymen; or he fears that if what he has done were made public it would injure him and his Party; or he fears that France may disapprove of his action with regard to Italy. We are, or we ought to be, on as good terms with France as with Italy. These understandings with one country lead to misunderstandings with other countries. But an understanding on the part of Lord Salisbury has no binding effect on this country. Lord Salisbury ought to communicate everything of this kind; he has not chosen to do so; and in one sense that is fortunate. The understanding was come to five years ago; we have gone on five years under it. Again and again Lord Salisbury has been asked to state what it is; but he has refused to do so; and officially the House of Commons knows nothing of it. I make these remarks not so much because I expect to get to know what the understanding was, but because it was desirable to accentuate the fact that the country is in no sort of way bound by it. If there is an understanding with Italy, it is one not between Italy and England, but between Lord Salisbury and Italy. It is desirable that France and Italy should realise this; and also that it should be known to the electors of this country what the difference is between the foreign policies of Lord Salisbury and the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. If the latter comes back to power he will do his best, as before, to promote peace in Europe. ["Oh!" and Ministerial cheers.] Yes; hon. Gentlemen opposite have said that the right hon. Gentleman has disgraced this country by loving peace too much. He has promoted peace by maintaining the European Concert, and not by entering into secret understandings with one country against another, which he is ashamed to submit to this House. It must be remembered that, if Lord Salisbury is kept in power, he is pledged in certain circumstances to drag us into a Continental war against France. ["Oh!"] Can hon. Gentlemen who cry "Oh!" get their Ministers to state what the understanding is? The Government, on coming into power, said the Navy was deficient, and they obtained Votes to augment it. This was not done for defensive purposes, but it was done to enable us to act as the police of the Mediterranean, and to put us in a position to join with military Powers. We cannot produce an Army, and so we produce a Navy on which we spend millions and millions; and if the electors ponder over this the country will rally to the old Liberal flag and to the policy of "peace, retrenchment, and reform."

(11.25.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is evident that the speech of the hon. Member is addressed to a wider audience than the House of Commons, but I venture to think that that wider audience will endorse the policy of the Government when they appreciate the grounds on which it is rested. If the results of Lord Salisbury's policy so far are to be measured by its popularity and its acceptance with the country, I believe the Government cannot wish to go to the country on a better issue. As the hon. Gentleman desires that the policy of Lord Salisbury should be contrasted with that of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, I would remind the hon. Member that, in 1888, after he had offered an explanation to the House, the right hon. Gentleman expressed his satisfaction with that explanation, and the Debate thereupon came to an end. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"I will say, however, that, without binding myself for the future or going beyond the subject immediately before us, it is a matter of lively satisfaction to find that the course taken by Lord Salisbury on more than one occasion has been entirely in accord with sound principle and with what I believe ought to be the foreign policy of this country."

MR. LABOUCHERE: Perhaps the Under Secretary will read the whole of the speech. The Member for Mid Lothian always claims that the text should be read.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Time would not admit of that, but I may refer to various declarations made by the right hon. Gentleman, and especially in his later speeches. I am sure we need not draw odious comparisons, and that we may be content that our relations with foreign Powers are such that we may be satisfied with a policy which has led to so satisfactory a state of affairs. I hope I shall not be considered disrespectful to the Member for Kirkcaldy if I do not follow him into the somewhat discursive field through which he travelled. The hon. Gentleman harped upon the string of a secret understanding, and he referred to an answer which had been given in this House. It is a remarkable thing that almost at the same time the Minister in the Italian Parliament had used nearly the same expression as myself. There is no great mystery about it. Some of the words which the Italian Minister used are equivalent to those used in this House. I think I have again and again, in answer to questions of the hon. Member, stated that there have been during several years of anxiety which have passed away an interchange of views upon the condition of things in Europe, and with regard to matters in which they are particularly interested, namely, the maintenance of the status quo and peace in the Mediterranean. It is altogether unnecessary to mix up such a question with the Triple Alliance. We are no parties to the Triple Alliance; we are not even aware of the Treaties so-called which we are informed have been renewed between the central Powers in Europe. We have entered into no agreement or understanding with any Power pledging us to the employment of Her Majesty's forces in any contingency. The hon. Member, I must say, has arrived at the most unfounded conclusions. The hon. Member seems to think it important to establish that the policy of Her Majesty's Government and its understanding with foreign Powers are such as are likely to plunge us into a European war. The result of our communications with the Powers has been to produce greater harmony, to remove from the face of the world the apprehensions which darkened over it not many years ago, and by the common consent of all Sovereigns and statesmen we have from year to year been able to breathe more freely and to rely with greater confidence in the maintenance of peace.

MR. LABOUCHERE: What Sovereigns?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: There is hardly a Sovereign in Europe who has not expressed these views. It is true, indeed, that the armaments of Europe remain in stupendous force, on a scale which no former age has seen, and which would render any war in the future of greater magnitude than any in which Europe has ever been plunged and attended with greater disaster than the history of the world can recall. That consideration ought to render any person in a responsible position most careful in using any language which is not in the interest of peace, which might arouse passion, and which might lead to war. Irresponsible persons feel themselves at liberty to use what language they please. The hon. Member for Northampton has spoken of a war for the restoration of the Rhine provinces as a small matter.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I never said it was a small matter.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Then the hon. Gentleman recognises it as a large matter. He talks of it as a legitimate object of which this country would approve.

MR. LABOUCHERE: No; I did not say that this country would approve. What I said was that if this war unfortunately took place our sympathies would be on the side of France.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That is going a long way towards what I have stated. Our sympathies would be against the Power which broke the peace. That I say in answer to the hon. Member. I repeat that it is a very rash and dangerous thing for any man who occupies a position of influence to give any encouragement to such an idea. The hon. Member has again asserted that the Triple Alliance will be offensive as against France and Russia. I say we have given no adhesion to any understanding or agreement hostile to any Power. Our sympathies will be with those Powers which keep the peace and against those who break it. Does any one suppose that well-informed statesmen such as now rule in the Kingdom of Italy are not aware of the British Constitution and the limitations on the power and policy of any British Administration? Can it be supposed that a British Government would enter into any rash undertaking for the employment of our Military and Naval Forces in any contingency? Each contingency must be dealt with according to the circumstances and the rights and the position of the Powers with which we are allied, and according to the duties which we owe under Treaty and to our fellow-subjects beyond the sea. We ought, indeed, as the hon. Member says, to avoid unnecessary intervention in European affairs, and more especially to obviate all dangers which might involve us in such conflicts as I have referred to. The hon. Member asks why the Powers are not called together in Conference. But Conferences are not lightly called together. The mere calling of such a Conference would be in itself a disturbing influence. I trust the time is not near when it will be necessary to call together another Conference to consider the affairs of Europe. We have now happily for a long period had no European war, except one confined to the Balkan Peninsula. For more than 20 years the Treaty approved after the Russo-Turkish War has been successful in maintaining the European concert, and if, after all, that is the Treaty which guards the policy of the Great Powers, it is certainly one of which we need not be ashamed. At any rate, we may hope that it will be effective in guiding the policy of Europe for many years to come. We have had questions of delicacy with France, but we have always studiously respected its rights. We have shown that respect for our engagements at the risk and cost of some friction with our colonies, and the Ministers of France have been the first to acknowledge the loyalty and fidelity of Her Majesty's Government in that particular. The hon. Member will recollect that he was not long since responsible for the statement in his paper, which was the only paper that made such a comment, that the meeting of the French Fleet and British squadron at Malta was not entirely cordial. That statement evoked the unanimous disclaimer of the officers of the British squadron. They declared that they had entertained the French Fleet with the greatest pleasure, and that their relations with them were of the most cordial character. Her Majesty's Government could not charge themselves with having done one single act during their term of Office to lessen the cordial relations between the two countries; and if the Commercial Treaties between them are not such as they were 30 years ago, the fault does not lie with Her Majesty's Government. Most certainly I shall add nothing to the answers I have given on this subject. The leaders of the Opposition have with perfect discretion abstained from pressing Her Majesty's Government in this matter, and have accepted the declarations upon the subject which I have been able to make. If the hon. Member is not satisfied with what I have said, I am sorry that I cannot satisfy him. I shall not attempt to do so, but I shall rely with confidence upon the approval of the country of what has been done, and of its result. That result has had the effect of promoting good relations between this country and the European Powers. At the same time, the strengthening of the Imperial Forces of the country, of which the hon. Member has expressed disapproval, has placed us in such a position that we can maintain, strong and united, the Empire which we inherited, and for which the Government do no more than claim its legitimate position as one of the Powers of Europe in the interest above all of the maintenance of peace.

(11.44.) MR. BRYCE: This Debate is one of those in which it is more easy to do harm than good. I think my two hon. Friends were quite justified in giving an opportunity to the Government to summarise and recapitulate the declarations that have with some difficulty been extorted from them. First of all, I wish to say that we have nothing to do in this House with the Triple Alliance. It is a matter of no concern to us, and it is a matter in which we have no business to express an opinion. Our view must be confined to the part, if any, which this country has taken in bringing about that alliance, or in giving any assurances to the members of it. As to the understanding, as the right hon. Gentleman calls it, between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Italy, I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say on a previous occasion that it was impossible to prevent an interchange of views—that it was impossible to avoid being asked as to the probable action of this country in the case of certain eventualities. No assurance, no engagement of any kind, ought to be given or entered into by a British Minister without the knowledge of Parliament, and the Minister of a constitutional country like this is, therefore, within his right in refusing to give an answer to an inconvenient question with regard to the future. I understood the Under Secretary to say that Her Majesty's Government had expressed a desire for the maintenance of the status quo in the Mediterranean. That is a very vague account of the interchange of views. It leaves very much in doubt as to how far Her Majesty's Government may have gone in stating what they think would happen in certain eventualities. Of course, it was likely that Her Majesty's Government would be asked what the action of this country would be in the event of a war between France and Italy, and it is not at all unnatural that statements made with regard to the probable action of this country should be in danger of being construed as promises. I hope that is a distinction that Her Majesty's Government will bear in mind. Although I gather that the House will hear nothing more from the Under Secretary as to what the substance of the undertaking is, I hope he will understand that if we do not press for information it is because we rely on the statement the right hon. Gentleman has just made—that Her Majesty's Government have made, and will make, no binding engagement whatever, without communicating it to the House. There ought to be no doubt as to what the true policy of this country is. Clearly that policy is to enter into no engagement that can either fetter her freedom or give offence to her allies. We have responsibilities enough, and it would be the very wantonness of folly to endeavour to increase our engagements, which are already a great tax on the strength of our Empire and its Military and Naval Force. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary said we must judge every contingency as it arises. That, after all, is the answer this country ought to give if we are asked to pledge ourselves in any future eventuality. It is perfectly impossible to foresee under what circumstances and with what moral justification a conflict might arise, and we should surely be far stronger to exert our forces on the side of peace, if a conflict should unhappily break out, if we were free from all engagements beforehand. These are commonplaces of foreign policy, and if I venture to put them forward it is only because there seem to be ideas afloat in some of the Continental newspapers which are based on the impression that a Treaty with this country has in some way been arrived at. I say we ought to be so far free that it will be possible for us, if occasion arise that involves British interests, to act in view of those interests and upon lines that are at the moment suggested by them. I do not think that, after what we have drawn from the Under Secretary of State on this occasion, it is necessary or would be profitable for us to press for any further disclosures, and after a withdrawal from some of the statements which the Under Secretary of State was understood previously to have made—I do not say that the right hon. Gentleman made those statements; I think that he has been misunderstood—the object of this discussion has been obtained. We look with satisfaction at the fact that the Under Secretary of State has said that it is impossible that Her Majesty's Government will make any engagement which they will keep from the House of Commons, and that their only object is to preserve friendly relations with all Powers, and that they remain perfectly free to deal with every emergency as it arises. I hope that, if ever the time comes when this country is asked to take any action in any foreign troubles, Her Majesty's Government or the Opposition, as the case may be, will then remember that we have to-night had a full and complete declaration of the absolute freedom of this country at this moment, and that that declaration will remain fixed in our memories.

*(11.53.) SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I wish to make a few remarks after the mischievous speech which we have heard from the hon. Member for Northampton. If anything were likely to create unpleasantness between this country and France it would be a speech such as that. I happen to know that at the present time the relations between this country and France are more cordial than they have been for many years—more cordial than they were under the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. I have frequent communications with France, and I know a good deal of what is going on in diplomatic circles there, and I can say that the hon. Member has not correctly described the state of affairs. Then as to Italy. Why the hon. Member should make such a set against that country I do not know. What I would like to say with regard to the Italians is this: that all their statesmen are proud of the sentiments that Englishmen have always entertained towards their country. No one has been stronger in his sympathy with Italy than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian himself, and the speech of the hon. Member for Northampton is the first word I have heard in disfavour of that country. I am satisfied that nothing will occur under any Ministry which will alter the present cordial relations between this country and Italy; the only thing which could do so would be mischievous language like that which we have just heard.

(11.56.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I deny that I have ever said anything in disfavour of Italy; the Italians have a right to do precisely what they like and to enter into what engagements they like; what I protest against is the idea that this country is going to take sides with Italy against France on the pretext of maintaining the status quo in the Mediterranean. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman is entirely unsatisfactory as regards Lord Salisbury. We know that Lord Salisbury can do nothing—I have no doubt he would if he could—behind the back of this House or without communicating what he does to this House and receiving its assent. But Lord Salisbury has done his best to envenom the relations between this country and France. The hon. Member talks of “diplomatic circles.” Those are not the circles in which I myself seek information. I have been in the diplomatic service, and a more ignorant set of people with regard to the public opinion in any country never existed on the face of the globe. We know that Lord Granville, on the very eve of the outbreak of the war between France and Germany, told us that peace was assured for the next 20 years. I rejoice to think that Lord Salisbury cannot pledge this country. The Republicans of France cannot look with great satisfaction at the persistent endeavour of Lord Salisbury to do his best to break up the warm and cordial alliance which has existed for many years between France and England. I believe that that attempt on the part of Lord Salisbury is made because there is a feeling that, if the Republic in France succeeds, Republicanism will spread abroad in Europe. I believe that there is a Royal and aristocratic boycott against France, and that Lord Salisbury would be delighted to see a general alliance against that country. [“Oh!”] Well, he has done his best to promote it. [“Oh!”] I hear the Attorney General opposite who, for the £12,000 a year he receives, thinks it his duty to come here and groan against everyone who says a word against his master. I shall speak against Lord Salisbury and protest against Lord Salisbury in spite of the subserviency of the Attorney General and the Liberal Unionists, who never lose an opportunity of rising to thank God that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian is no longer Prime Minister, but that the future of this country is in the hands of Lord Salisbury.

M O T I O N .

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION CODE (SCOTLAND), 1891.

(12.10.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to move the Motion which stands on the Paper in my name—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that the Minute of the Committee of Council on Education in Scotland, dated the 11th day of June, 1891, amending the terms of Article 133 of the Code of 1891, be amended by substituting the word ‘three’ for the word ‘five,’ and the word ‘fifteen’ for the word ‘fourteen.’”

The effect of my Motion is to confer upon the parent in Scotland the same right to free education for his children between the ages of 3 and 15 as have been conferred upon the parent in England by the Education Bill which has just passed the House of Commons. At the present moment, a parent in Scotland is only entitled to claim free education in the compulsory standards—that is, until his child passes the Fifth Standard, irrespective of age. On 8th June last, the Government introduced their Elementary Education (England)

Bill, which conferred upon parents in England the right to free education for their children between 5 and 14. Following the lines of the English Bill, the Scotch Education Department three days later, namely, on 11th June, laid on the Table of the House a Minute of the Department changing free education in Scotland from standards to one of age, and making education free from 5 till 14, the same as in the English Bill. As, however, is well known, the ages in the English Bill are altered from 5 to 14 to from 3 to 15. Hence, following this extension of the ages in England, my Motion proposes similarly to alter the Minute of the Department, thus conferring upon the parent in Scotland the same extent of legal right to demand free education as is conferred upon the parent in England. Obviously, uniformity is the original intention and effect of the Minute, and the subsequent extension of the age in the English Bill necessitates a corresponding alteration in the Minute of the Department. The Government intend, I understand, to oppose this Motion. It will, therefore, be a spectacle for gods and men to find the Government and English Members refusing to the parents in Scotland the same extent of right to demand free education as has just been conceded to the parent in England. It is said that my Motion comes at an inopportune time, and at a time when the financial arrangements of School Boards for the year have all been completed. It is not my Motion, however, but the Minute of the Department lying on the Table of the House which introduced the subject at an inopportune time, and which disturbed the financial arrangements of School Boards. The Minute of the Department took away the legal right to free education from 12,000 children under five years of age (1,000 of whom are under four years of age) attending school in Scotland, most of whom belong to the poorer classes, and the cost of whose education is comparatively trivial; whilst, on the other hand, the Minute extends the right to free education to 32,000 children who are presently receiving the more expensive education above the Fifth Standard, but who are under 14 years of age, and who belong to the class of society whose parents can afford to keep them at school and do not require to send them to work. When the inopportuneness of the proposed change and the consequent loss of revenue to School Boards was brought under the notice of the Department by questions in the House, the Department was equal to the emergency. Their reply was that, although the proposed change would doubtless involve some loss to the ratepayers, yet that the loss would be small compared with the extragrant of £100,000 which these same ratepayers would this year receive in aid of local rates. The extension of age proposed in the Motion from 14 to 15 could only bring in 15,000 more children, that being the total number of children on the roll of schools in Scotland over 14 years of age, whilst the reduction of the age from five to three years leaves matters in Scotland exactly as they are at present. Indeed, I will point to a typical case of what the probable general result in Scotland will be to the case of Govan Parish in the Partick Division of Lanarkshire. That School Board has a school roll of 17,500 children, but it is not the intention of that School Board to charge any school fees either for children under five or for children above 14 years of age. I should, therefore, be more than astonished if Mr. Parker Smith should deny to the rest of Scotland the same legal right to free education as has been conferred upon the parents in England, and as is likely to be enjoyed by parents in my own constituency. As regards the extension of the age from 14 to 15, I leave to the Scotch supporters of the Government to maintain the justice and expediency of the proposed alteration. I do not think there is a single one of them who does not desire the change. As already pointed out, the Minute of the Department takes away from children under five years of age (who belong chiefly to the poorer classes) the legal right to free education enjoyed by them for the past two years, and leaves them at the mercy of School Boards to charge or not to charge school fees. This change of the law takes place suddenly, and in the course of the education of 12,000 children under five years of age presently attending school. Under any circumstances it would be a strong step for a Government to take away a right to free education once granted, but it is hardly conceivable that a Government should do so without sufficient notice, and without guarding the interests of children presently attending school, and who began their education upon the footing of no school fees being charged. But that is not all. Out of monies belonging to the people of Scotland, School Boards in Scotland will this year receive 12s. per child in average attendance in respect of school fees. This fee grant is paid and will continue to be paid in respect of the attendance of children under five, the same as for children above five years of age. There will, therefore, be this extraordinary result of School Boards still receiving, in respect of school fees, 12s. per child under five years of age, whilst Parliament will have withdrawn the legal right of the parent to demand such free education, and have left it in the power of School Boards, over and above the fee grant of 12s., to exact school fees for such children. It may be said that it is an educational advantage to discourage attendance at school of children under five years of age. If so, that argument would apply to England as well as to Scotland. Why, then, was the change made in England? Was it made, not on educational grounds, but in the pecuniary interests of the denominational schools, the majority of which belong to the Conservative Party? Children under five years of age are a source of profit to School Boards in Scotland. School Boards receive a fee grant of 12s. per child in average attendance, and a further possible grant of 17s. per child in average attendance, or a total of 29s. per child under five years of age in average attendance—far more than sufficient to meet the cost of the education of such children without the imposition of school fees. The question of whether and how far education is to be free was a matter to be determined by Parliament, and not left to the will or caprice of School Boards. Hence, the right of the parent to free education for his children was freed in the case of England in the Elementary Education Bill which had just passed the House of Commons. In the case of Scotland it is freed and determined by the Minute of the Department now under review. Parliament had determined in the case of England that education shall be free between the ages of 3 and 15. He therefore simply claimed for the parent of Scotland an equal extension of the legal right to free education.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that the Minute of the Committee of Council on Education in Scotland, dated the 11th day of June, 1891, amending the terms of Article 133 of the Code of 1891, be amended by substituting the word 'three' for the word 'five,' and the word 'fifteen' for the word 'fourteen.'"—(Mr. Caldwell.)

(12.23.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I have to complain that no one has risen to express the opinion of the Government. I regret that when free education was given to Scotland it was given in this form, that the particulars were to be determined by the Education Department. If it had been given as now for England by an Act of Parliament, it would not have been in the power of any Department, by a stroke of the pen, to rob Scottish parents of the right of free education for young children. The Minute was evidently intended to bring the Scottish law into conformity with the English Bill; but when that Bill came before the House the age of five was altered to three, and although the House gave way with regard to England, the Government are still persisting in maintaining this most odious and objectionable distinction for Scotland. This provision will leave it in the power of voluntary schools in Scotland to impose a tax on all children between the ages of three and five attending school.

*(12.25.) MR. FINLAY (Inverness, &c.): We have heard a great deal about the necessity for uniformity in this matter between the two countries. I will not express a final opinion as to whether the ages of 3 and 15 should be introduced into Scotland or not, but before taking that step I think we ought to wait till we can ascertain the opinion of the School Authorities of Scotland on the subject. In the first place, the grant in England was a grant of 10s. a head for all children between the ages of 3 and 15. The extension of the age to 3 and 15 in England, therefore, would enlarge the grant in proportion. In Scotland my hon. Friends seem to have forgotten that the grant was made in a perfectly different manner. It was a share of the Probate Duty and Excise Duties, which amounts to something over £300,000. Thus a lump sum is provided for the assistance of Education in Scotland. It is not a grant in proportion to the number of children between the ages of 3 and 15, so that any reasoning of that kind absolutely falls to the ground when applied to Scotland. If we inquire how that was distributed we find it was distributed according to the provisions of the Code, while Article 129 provides that it was distributed to the schools in proportion to the average returns of attendance, which again are defined by the 25th Article. According to that Article, the average returns are taken of those who attend the schools between the ages of 3 and 18. That was a state of circumstances absolutely different from that on which the English Bill was founded. What, then, is the use of talking about the advantages of uniformity between the two countries in this matter, when we find that the circumstances of the two cases are so entirely different? I think it will be found that the number of children under five years of age at school in Scotland is very much less in proportion than it is in England, and I believe that is one great reason which has led to the change with regard to the age in the English Education Bill. I think we ought to consider that there are two sides to this question. It is very doubtful whether it is a good thing for a child under the age of five to leave its mother's care and go to school. It is a matter in which the practice of Scotland is not in harmony with that which prevails in England. What would be the effect of the Motion of my hon. Friend? At present the School Boards have a certain discretion in the matter, and if this Motion be adopted it will be compulsory that all children over the age of three years should attend school free of all charge. Have hon. Members considered what the effect on the attendance of the school will be; how far it would be necessary to provide additional buildings at the expense of the ratepayers, to increase the teaching staff, and to provide such attendants as will be required for infants between the age of three and five. All such sublunary considerations are beneath the notice of some hon. Members. This is a matter which ought to be looked at from the practical point of view. Before taking an irrevocable step of this kind we ought to point out what is the opinion of the School Boards in Scotland and of the people of Scotland in regard to this matter. The only argument which the hon. Member has adduced is that it is desirable that there should be uniformity between England and Scotland. I think it would be more prudent to pause so as to discover the views of the Scotch educational authorities. I do not desire to express any definite opinion one way or the other on this question, but I do think it would be hasty to accept at present the Motion of the hon. Member for the St. Rollox Division on such extremely general considerations as those which have been advanced in support of it.

(12.35.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I suppose we have heard the official answer to this Motion. My hon. and learned Friend says that the only argument in favour of the Motion is the desire for uniformity between England and Ireland. I do not admit it for a moment, but if it be the only argument, all that can be said of it is that it is one more that can be adduced in support of the proposal. My hon. and learned Friend has not put forward any argument of any sort or kind against the Motion. He merely urges that we ought to wait to see what Scotch opinion is on this subject. But we already know a great deal as to Scotch opinion on this subject. Experience has shown that Scotch parents are anxious that their children between three and five years should go to school. The parents, it is found, are sending them in largely increasing numbers, as stated in the Report of the Scotch Education Department, yet the Government propose that children between three and five years, who can now attend school free, should in future be liable for fees. Human nature and the circumstances with regard to parents and children are the same in Scotland as in England, and the same causes which induce parents in England to send their children to school below the age of five years will lead Scotch parents to do the same. The hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of the necessity there would be to increase the school accommodation. The average attendance is 524,000, but the number of places available is 716,000. It is idle to suggest that this excess of places will not amply suffice for a considerable time to meet any increase in the number of children who will go to school under the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I am quite satisfied that if the Motion is not carried to-night, it must eventually be forced upon the Government by Scottish public opinion and by the circumstances of the case. Sir, I consider we have got a great boon in the English Education Bill by having got rid of the long standing controversy, in which almost all the Scotch Members were on one side, namely, that there should not be a higher standard in which the fees are to be paid. We have now got the principle of age laid down, and by 15 every Scotch child will have passed all the standards which reasonably come within the circuit of elementary education. Let us complete the good work by asserting that 15 shall be the age up to which a child shall be sent to school without its being a burden to his parents, and enabling him to reap the benefit of that education which Parliament has given.

(12.40.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Sir CHARLES PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): It seems hardly possible after the speeches made to treat this question apart from comparison with the English Education Bill. The remarks of the hon. Member who moved this Motion certainly suggested that in the view of the hon. Gentleman the main reason why the alteration he proposes should be made was to be found in the fact that the limit mentioned had been reached in the Education Bill which has just passed this House. I have not much to add to the remarks which fell from the hon. and learned Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay) who has shown that the analogy between England and Scotland fails just at the very point where it becomes important if it is to be of any value that it should not fail, namely, when you come to consider the basis upon which that grant is distributed in Scotland as compared with the grant in England. The basis on which the grant is distributed in Scotland is the average [attendance, while the basis on which it is to be distributed in England is so much per child. The alteration proposed by the hon. Gentleman opposite would bring no additional grant into Scotland, but it would impose an additional burden by making that compulsory which at present is not so; that is to say, it would entail] on school authorities in Scotland the necessity of providing accommodation for children between three and five.

MR. HUNTER: As the English School Boards do.

SIR CHARLES PEARSON: Another difference suggests itself between England and Scotland. There can be no doubt that, according to the statistics of the two countries, school attendance begins at an earlier period according to the opinion and practice of the country in England than in Scotland. That has long been so, and the Report to which the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Trevelyan) referred, and which is quite in conformity with the previous recommendation of the Department, had reference to a state of affairs not in a part of the country where the children did not attend school for five years, but where the children were not sent to school until they were six or seven years old. This was what the Department always objected to, and did its best to remedy, but the recommendation did not apply to cases where children were sent to school at five. I am not aware of any foundation for the suggestion that the Department in any way laid itself out to encourage the sending children to school in Scotland at an earlier age than five. There is a remarkable omission in the arguments that have been submitted to the House by the supporters of the Motion. One would have expected that an alteration such as is now moved for would have been supported by some kind of evidence that there is a demand for it on the part of the educational authorities and those entrusted in the work of education. But from these authorities, and from those who have the work of education in their hands, there is not a single symptom of a desire to have the limit of age fixed in England imposed upon them, and no instance has been quoted by the hon. Member for St. Rollox to this effect.

MR. CALDWELL: I may say in answer to this remark of the hon. Gentleman that there are at present 12,000 children under five receiving free education in Scotland, showing that the people wish it.

SIR CHARLES PEARSON: My observation was that we should have expected some instances from school managers or Boards, or those responsible for the good management of schools, some indication of a desire that this alteration should be made. They have had time enough to consider the proposition.

MR. CALDWELL: May I explain, when I am asked for evidence? We knew that an English Bill was going to be introduced, and that Bill only passed a few days ago, and that Bill has changed the age of children in respect to whom a grant is to be made.

SIR CHARLES PEARSON: It is not a matter of a few days. My observation applies to the proposal in the hon. Member's Motion, which has been before the country for a considerable time, and I say no instance has been given of any demand whatever on the part of those interested in support of the Motion. There are, on the other hand, instances of a desire on the part of those interested to adhere to the Minute of the Education Department, and in the absence of anything to the contrary it does seem to me that this matter ought to be left where it lies in the Minute. The limit in the Minute has been fixed after careful inquiry of the Local Bodies, and School Authorities have shown no intention of dealing in a narrow and niggardly spirit with the power they have. They will not regard this as doing more than enabling them to correct abuses if need be; they will not take it by any means as a necessity laid on them to charge fees for attendance of children under five years of age. Another objection to the Motion is that the financial arrangements of the School Authorities in Scotland for the present year have been made on the footing that the Minute is to be adhered to, and it will cause an awkward dislocation of arrangements if this alteration is now made. I therefore submit that the Motion ought not to be agreed to. It is quite possible that a year's experience of the Minute as it stands may lead to some further change, but I believe it is equally possible and more probable that a year's experience will show that Scotland is perfectly satisfied with the present limit.

(12.50.) MR. J. P. SMITH (Lanark, Partick): The hon. Member who moved this Resolution has alluded to the Govan School Board, and perhaps I may be permitted to say that a few days ago I received a letter from the clerk to that Board, in which he says that although the Board have not had an opportunity of considering the subject at a meeting, he could confidently say that the members of the Board were strongly in favour of adhering to the Minute in the form in which it now lies upon the Table. From the clerk to the Glasgow School Board I also have a letter to the same effect, expressing a strong desire to have the limit remain 5 to 14. The question of raising the age is not a new one. For months it has been before the country, and every School Board has had the opportunity of considering it. As to the increase in the number of very young children, of which the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Trevelyan) has spoken. I, without going into the general question, will give the actual figures in the Govan School Board District. Of 17,500 children on the roll of the free schools, only 103 are under five years of age. That explains pretty clearly that there is an objection to extending the age. Out of the same number—17,500—there are only 188 over 14 years of age. There is not the analogy between the position in Scotland and England which the hon. Member attempted to prove, and the expression of opinion in Scotland among those interested in reduction is in favour of the Minute as it stands.

*(12.52.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): It appears to me, after the elaborate defence of the Scotch Education Department, offered by the senior Counsel behind me (Mr. Finlay) and the junior Counsel opposite (Sir C. Pearson) on the Front Bench, that the simple fact we have to remember is that children between the ages of three and five are being educated without payment of fee in Scotland. School Boards in Scotland, whatever Minute is passed, will not charge for the education of these children, and therefore all the evils which hon. Members have pictured as likely to follow a lowering of the age are already in process of realisation. All the requirements of additional accommodation and the burden on the rates of which we have heard so much will come whatever step we take. But the truth is Her Majesty's Government introduced a Bill for free education in England, and they determined, in opposition to all the arguments which were used against us last year, to extend free education beyond the compulsory standards. They adopted the limit of age 5 and 14, and then they issued this amended Minute fixing the same age in Scotland. What then becomes of the argument of the inexpediency of attempting to introduce uniformity in the two countries? It is the Government who have disturbed the waters; they introduced this deadly uniformity. I must confess to a little surprise at hearing my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay) inveigh against uniformity of administration in the two countries. I thought uniformity in the three countries was the sheet anchor of his politics. The Education Bill in its passage through the House, underwent a change, the age of free education was altered to from 3 to 15, and all we say is you having yourselves acknowledged that the age in Scotland should be the same as in England, let that be so now, that you have altered the age in England from what was intended when this Minute was issued. The whole thing lies in that. I do not believe there will be any great financial result one way or the other from the alteration proposed; but we say the standard, the limit of age which represents the proper degree of freedom which should be given to education in Scotland, should not be narrower than that which is given in England. In England the limit is laid down in what will be the actual Statute, in Scotland, on the other hand, we have adopted what I think is a somewhat better system, our Statute affects the matter merely by giving power to the Department to issue regulations from time to time. This Minute, therefore, corresponds precisely in its legal effect in Scotland to the Bill now under the consideration of Parliament. We do not wish to take this retrograde step and fly in the face of what we know to be the general opinion in Scotland. We have heard something of Govan and other School Boards having taken the view which is taken by the Education Department; but I am not so sure that the School Boards themselves, their secretaries, and their members so accurately represent the popular public opinion of the country that we should alter our view on that account. I should have thought it would have been more reasonable for Her Majesty's Government, if they could not assimilate the Minute to what will be the law in England, to have cancelled the Minute, leaving things as they stand. If the Motion is persisted in, I shall certainly support my hon. Friend, because I think it would be discreditable to Scotch Members if they deliberately placed on record, as they would by approving this Minute, their opinion that 5 to 14 is the limit within which education should be free. We know perfectly well that there would be no charge made by School Boards for the small children or for the older children; but at the same time we do not wish to have it recorded as our opinion that these are the proper limits for freedom of education, especially when wider limits have been approved for England.

(1.1.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.):

I protest at once against the statement of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down that in supporting the Government anyone will thereby be saying he maintains that the age between 5 and 14 is the only age at which free education should be given. The fact of the matter is that, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) said, a number of children who now obtain free education will be liable to be called on to pay fees. But they are liable to be called upon to pay fees now. ["No."] All children under five years are liable to pay fees, and the effect of passing this Minute is to leave matters precisely as they are at the present time.

*MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): I only wish to clear up a matter of fact. The last speaker denied that in Scotland children under five years of age are now entitled to be educated free. I do not think it right that the Lord Advocate should sit there silent and take advantage of such a misapprehension. Not only are children under five in fact educated, but they are legally entitled to be educated free of charge. The Code says, "No fees shall be exacted from scholars who have not yet passed the Third Standard." That legal right it is now proposed to take away.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 10th July, 1891.

NEW PEER.

Lord Deramore — George William Bateson de Yarburgh Baron Deramore, having succeeded to that title on the death of his brother Thomas Lord Deramore by virtue of a special limitation contained in a patent bearing date the eighteenth day of November in the forty-ninth year of the reign of Her present Majesty — Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Brought from the Commons; Read 1^a; to be printed: and to be read 2^a on Tuesday next; (Lord Hamilton of Dalzell). (No. 228.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Leave given to the Lord Tyrone (M. Waterford) to speak sitting during the remainder of the Session.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 10) BILL.

Order made on Friday last committing the Bill to a Committee of the Whole House, discharged.

LORD BASING: My Lords, in asking your Lordships to allow this Bill to be re-committed, I ought, perhaps, to offer a word of explanation. This Electric Lighting Provisional Order Bill, with several others, was referred to a Private Bill Committee of which I have the honour to be Chairman. The only opponent of the Bill was the parish of St. Luke, Chelsea, as represented by their Vestry Clerk, who appeared and objected to the provisions in the Bill under which the Board of Trade has arranged that the London County Council should be made the Electrical Authorities—for supervising the arrangements under the Bill. The Vestry Clerk contended that the Vestry should be made the Electric Authority, because they were, in fact, already constituted the authority under another and very recent Act, dealing with the electric lighting within the same parish, whereas the London County Council had no such right of interfering with the electric lighting in the parish. The London County Council did not appear either by themselves or their agents, and it was with some difficulty that the Committee found what was the reason that actuated the Board of Trade in making this arrangement, and why the London County Council adhered to it. On the other hand, the promoters of the Bill had no objection to the alteration desired by the Vestry Clerk, and the Committee, after hearing him, decided that the alteration should be made. Subsequently, the London County Council, not being aware of the intention to make this proposed alteration, thought themselves aggrieved at not having the opportunity of stating their case; but the Committee could not depart from the decision they had come to, and, as at present advised, there seems no reason to suppose that it was wrong or in any way improper. Nevertheless, having been applied to by this important body—the London County Council—they considered that they ought perhaps to have an opportunity of being heard, although, as I have said, they had not appeared either by themselves or by their agents. Not having had any authoritative communication from the Board of Trade on the subject, and as I was informed that the parties interested might, if they choose, present a Petition to your Lordships' House for a re-committal of the Bill, I would not raise any objection, but would, on the contrary, facilitate it. I am unable to say what is the practice of your Lordships' House, or whether, under the circumstances, this proposal ought to be made, or, if made, whether it ought to be entertained; but, on behalf of the Committee, I may say that I have no objection to offer.

Moved, "That the Bill be re-committed."—(The Lord Basing.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY: With regard to the Motion made by the noble Lord, I think it would be well for the House to assent to it in this instance; but I must say this: that the London County Council ought to have been aware of the character of the Petition presented by the parish of Chelsea for the alteration of the Bill, and that it was their duty to have appeared before the Committee, and to have argued their case against that Motion; but by negligence on their part—for I can call it nothing else—that course was not taken. Still, I think it would probably be convenient that the London County Council should have the opportunity of being heard before the alteration in the Bill is approved. I do not, of course, express the slightest opinion as to the merits of the case which will come before the Committee; but as the noble Lord opposite—the Chairman of the Committee—has moved that the Bill be re-committed, I think it will be well, on the whole, for the House to assent to the Motion.

On Motion, agreed to.

Bill re-committed accordingly.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 208.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to order).

Clause 4.

Verbal Amendments made.

Clause 11.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): My Lords, on page 13 I propose to amend Sub-section 3. I wish to be allowed to say that my object in moving this clause in substitution for Sub-section 3, which was moved by my noble Friend (Lord Londonderry) in Committee on this Bill, has been chiefly because, although in our opinion the drafting was fairly intelligible, and there was no extreme difficulty in understanding its meaning, yet, as a matter of fact, it appeared that hardly any of the noble Lords who spoke upon it on either side of the House were able to clearly understand what was meant by the sub-section, in spite of the very clear and able statement made by the noble and learned Lord, and, that being the case, Her Majesty's Government have thought it as well to endeavour so to re-draft the sub-section as to make it, if possible, absolutely clear and intelligible to the House. I will put Sections (a) and (b) first. I do not think I need enter upon an explanation of them at any great length on the present occasion, because I explained as well as I could on the former occasion the intention of the Government. If I may be allowed to say so, I think the difficulty arises in the minds of several noble Lords opposite, especially the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley), from the fact that they apprehended that we were dealing with the Guarantee Fund whereas in reality we are dealing with the money advanced, and for which the Guarantee Fund is the cover. If that had been understood, I think, perhaps the noble Earl would have seen the matter more clearly. I do not think there is any other difficulty to which I can call your Lordships' attention.

Moved, in Clause 11, page 13, to amend Sub-section 3, so that it will read as follows:—

“(a) One twenty-fifth of the total amount available for advances under this Act in each county shall in each financial year be deemed to be allocated according to the proportions above mentioned between the classes of holdings exceeding and not exceeding a rateable value of £50 respectively. (b) If the advances applied for (and which appear to the Land Commission likely to be sanctioned) for the purchase of holdings exceeding £50 rents fall short in any year of the amount so deemed to be allocated to the class of holdings exceeding £50 valuation, the difference shall be carried to a common fund to be available for the purchase of any holding within the county for the purchase of which advances may be made under this Act.”—(The Earl Cadogan.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I have not the least intention of raising a discussion on the merits of the clause which were discussed in Committee, but I am very glad indeed that the noble Earl has proposed this Amendment, and I think it makes quite clear what is intended. Certainly it was not made clear to me the other night, and I can assure the noble Lord it was not quite clear to many other people, both in and out of the House. I saw one noble Lord connected with Ireland only yesterday, who assured me that his intention was not that which it now appears is the true one. My noble Friend is aware that Earl Spencer thought the whole operation was limited to one year, and that there would be an alteration in the subsequent years, but the noble Lord's explanation makes it clear that this operation is to be repeated from year to year, and that entirely, I think, meets the difficulty as to the obscurity of the clause. I should like to know whether the 1-25th which this advance is limited to in the year represents what was agreed to be allotted, or how that amount is calculated, and what the amount is. Does it limit the amount to what is available out of the whole sum year by year, or is it the nominal amount which would be usually applied for?

EARL CADOGAN: In answer to the noble Earl's question, I would explain that the 1-25th does not represent the whole sum that can be allotted in each year. As he will see if he studies the Bill carefully, either class, either those above or those below £50, could claim the whole of the 25 years' purchase of that which will be allotted to them. It is not limited to the one year's allotment. Practically this apportionment each year is a matter of itself; it does not affect in any way the right of either class to apply within one year, even for the whole of the 25 years' purchase.

LORD HARLECH: It is quite evident that the noble Lords who have spoken do understand what the clause is; but I think the House in general cannot possibly know anything about it at present. It seems to require some further elucidation.

LORD HERSCHELL: I should like to ask the noble Lord one question. Is the 1-25th of the whole amount available for advances in each year, the same thing as the share of each tenant in the Guarantee Fund in each financial year?

EARL CADOGAN: I am afraid the noble and learned Lord does not quite see that what we are dealing with now is the money advanced and covered by the Guarantee Fund, 1-25th of the amount of the Guarantee Fund, not the Guarantee Fund itself. That is calculated in each year in order to arrive at the proportion; but it does not follow that application cannot be made for the whole amount. On the contrary, if it were desirable, each class, both those above and those below £50, might apply for the whole amount in one year.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: My Lords, I think it is perhaps due to the remarks I made on Thursday last that this particular complication has arisen. In dealing with the figures which I gave to your Lordships I dealt only with the Annual Guarantee Fund provided by each county, and it was the surplus of that fund which was to be devoted to this purpose and distributed among the tenants over and under £50. That was what I was dealing with. It was the surplus of that Annual Guarantee Fund that I proposed should be devoted to form a fund to be administered under the Ashbourne Acts. That was really the proposal I made, and which I think is now met by the noble Lord's Amendment.

LORD HERSCHELL: There is a verbal correction necessary I think, to which attention should be called. In Sub-section 2 it says: "and which appear to the Land Commission likely to be sanctioned," but in Sub-section 3 the words prima facie are introduced—"which appear prima facie to the Land Commission likely to be sanctioned." I think they ought to read the same in each case, as I do not suppose there is any difference intended.

EARL CADOGAN: Does the noble and learned Lord wish to have the words "prima facie" inserted in Sub-section 2?

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not wish them to be inserted for any purpose, because I do not think there is any use in them, but I think if they are retained in the other sub-section they they should be put in in order to make the two correspond. The word "appear" is really I suppose what was intended.

EARL CADOGAN: I have no objection.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

EARL CADOGAN: Then, my Lords, I will move the other two sub-sections—

"(c) If the advances applied for (and which appear prima facie to the Land Commission likely to be sanctioned) for the purchase of holdings not exceeding fifty pounds rental falls short in any year of the amount so deemed to be allocated to the class of holdings not exceeding fifty pounds valuation, the difference shall be carried to a common fund to be available for the purchase of any holding within the county for the purchase of which advances may be made under this Act.

(d) Returns shall be published by the Land Commission at the end of each financial year in at least one newspaper circulating in each county setting out the amount (if any) carried to the common fund under the provisions of this sub-section in the preceding year, and the class of holdings in respect of which such amount has been so carried."

Clause 15.

EARL CADOGAN: The next Amendments in my name are merely as regards the drafting of Sub-section 3 of this clause.

Moved in Clause 15, page 15, line 5, amend sub-section (3) so as to read as follows:—

"The trustees of any incumbrance, charge, annuity, or rent, with the consent of the persons beneficially interested, may at their discretion (notwithstanding any general prohibition of investment in securities not mentioned in the instrument creating the trust) accept in payment of such incumbrance or charge, or the capital value of such annuity or rent, a sum of guaranteed land stock equal in nominal amount to such incumbrance, charge, or capital value."—(The Earl Cadogan.)

LORD HERSCHELL: I cannot help thinking there is some misapprehension with regard to this clause. I doubt whether it will carry out the effect intended. It provides that the trustees of an encumbrance may, with the consent of any persons beneficially interested, take the Guaranteed Land Stock. Of course such trustees, with the consent of all persons beneficially interested, may do so without any statutory power at all if the persons beneficially interested are sui juris. Whatever prohibition there may be in the instrument creating the trust, if the trustees and all the persons beneficially interested, all being sui juris, agree to take a different course, of course that course can be taken without any statutory authority, but by this Amendment they would not be enabled to do so, in that case. Of course it would not do to allow persons not sui juris to give their consent without the sanction of the Court. It appears to me as at present framed this will do nothing, and I apprehend it was really intended to do something more than I have pointed out, by giving a power of this kind with the sanction of the Court. If the Court sanctioned it a provision of that sort would be effective, but I fear this would not produce any effect at all.

Earl Cadogan

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): There is also the difficulty that the persons beneficially interested may not have been persons interested in the first instance. I have no doubt the construction put upon it by the noble and learned Lord is right, but with regard to the necessity of putting in the sanction of the Court, I would venture to suggest whether it would not be sufficient to say "any persons beneficially interested" who might be "of adult age."

LORD HERSCHELL: If the noble Marquess will forgive me, that would be to do little or nothing. I merely meant to suggest whether it would not be right to enable it to be done "with the sanction of the Court."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: If it reads as I propose, "with the consent of the persons beneficially interested who may be of full age," no further consent would be necessary.

LORD HERSCHELL: I doubt whether that would do, because there might be persons of full age but of only very limited interest, and you would then bind all those who were not sui juris.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Perhaps it had better be "with the consent of the Court."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: The intention was obviously to give a wide power of investment and to include for obvious reasons the power of investment in the Guaranteed Land Stock as mentioned here. My noble Friend has, I think, pointed out very reasonably that the retention of these words practically does away with the ability to do what was intended. The original drafting was not Government drafting. There is no addition whatever to the power, as my noble Friend points out. If their consent is given, cadit questio—there is no necessity for any amendment of the law at all. The only way to do it would be to strike this out, and to give power to the trustees to invest. I should be quite satisfied with that. That I think would be the best—to strike it boldly out.

LORD HERSCHELL: It might be amended by leaving out the words "with the consent of the persons beneficially interested."

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 15.

Verbal Amendments made.

*THE EARL OF ERNE: My Lords, I think my Amendment to insert a new clause after Clause 16 comes next. With certain alterations and additions which do not really affect the main object or materially alter it, it is taken from Clause 9 of the Land Department Bill which was introduced by the Government, as your Lordships know, but has not been proceeded with this Session. The Ashbourne Act of 1885 only enacts that notice shall be given to mortgagees or encumbrancers before a sale, and the only notices provided for by this Act are under Rules 39 and 48 of December, 1887. The first rule prescribes that notice shall be given after the vesting order has been made; and the second rule prescribes that notice shall be given to claimants after the final schedule has been lodged. It will, therefore, be seen that notice to these encumbrancers need only be given after all the preliminary expenses, and the expenses of making title have been incurred, and it is then in the power of the encumbrancers to step in and stop the sale to the loss and disappointment of all parties concerned. This Amendment proposes that any objection shall be lodged at the earliest possible opportunity, and that notice shall be given to persons who may be entitled to object immediately after the advance has been sanctioned by the Land Commission. I hope that Her Majesty's Government will accept this Amendment, as it will, I think, be a great improvement in the Bill.

Moved to insert, after Clause 16, the following new clause:—

"(1) When the Land Commission have sanctioned an advance under the Land Purchase Acts to a tenant who is purchasing his holding, notice thereof shall be given to the prescribed persons and in the prescribed manner, and it shall be lawful for any encumbrancer, reversioner, or other person interested in the purchase money, other than the landlord or tenant, to apply in the prescribed manner and within the prescribed time to a Land Judge; and thereupon such Judge shall inquire into the sale and the sufficiency of the price agreed on, and if he shall decide that the sale ought not to be carried out on the ground that the agreement therefor was made at an under-value, or that under the special circumstances of the case the proposed sale would so unduly depreciate the value of the unsold property comprised in the same settlement that it ought not to be carried out, the sanction of the Land Commission to the advance shall be invalid.

(2) An appeal from a decision of a Land Judge under this section shall lie to the Court of Appeal in Ireland, whose decision shall be final and conclusive."—(The Earl of Erne.)

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, I am afraid that I shall not be able to accept this Amendment. It appears to me to be really unnecessary, because incumbrancers are "persons aggrieved," as the noble Lord will see if he looks at Clause 28, line 13. It is there enacted—

"Provided that any person aggrieved may appeal from the decision of any Commissioner acting alone in carrying the said Acts into effect."

Therefore, this Amendment is thought to be unnecessary. Notice is always given to anyone who is interested, and I really do not see the necessity of this Amendment. I hope the noble Lord will not press it.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I think this is an important Amendment in the interests of the remainder-man as well as of the mortgagee. It is quite possible that under this Act a proprietor might sell at a ridiculously low price to his tenants, ignoring the position of the remainder-man altogether. I think that ought to be guarded against, and protection given at any rate to the remainder-man, who I do not think would come under the definition given by the noble Lord of a "person aggrieved." I do not think that Clause 28 is meant to meet such an objection as this. We are all aware that in Ireland properties in some places have been sold for a perfectly ridiculous number of years' purchase. I have even heard of cases where the price has been as low as six years' purchase. Just imagine the position of the remainder-man if, against his consent, he saw his property, or what would be his property in the future, being sold for such a ridiculous price! I do not believe myself that Clause 28 will protect him, because I do not think he will have any locus standi with the Chief Commissioners if he appeals to them under the great hardship which may be inflicted upon him. I think, therefore, this is a very important clause of my noble Friend's.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: There is no doubt that the noble Lord who has moved this clause and the noble Lord who has just spoken have presented it to your Lordships as containing reasonable topics that are well entitled to consideration, and that it would be unreasonable to provide a code of law that would not apply to the circumstances which may be supposed to exist; because what the noble Lord suggests is that the case should be considered where the sale was proposed to be made at an undervalue, and where the circumstances were such as to unduly depreciate the value of the property, and the noble Lord who has just spoken indicates that there might be a thriftless or improvident owner who would recklessly enter into a bargain. I do not know of such a case myself, but it may be there have been such cases — and it might be that in such a case the person next in remainder, if young, would, against the person in possession, if old, have to be heard and allowed to present his views; but my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal has pointed out that under Clause 28 there is a power of appeal given which did not heretofore exist in reference to all these matters. I do not say at all that a person entitled in remainder would not have a right to come in and say, “I am aggrieved, because, in the ordinary course of nature, upon the death of the person now living, I should have a right to come in and show that the property has been sold too low.” I think he would come within the definition of a person aggrieved, and that those cases would come within the very mischief of the section under which the appeal was constituted for the first time under this Act. Up to this time there has been no appeal provided for; but now there is one, and a person claiming as remainder-man would have the right of being heard under the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: My Lords, the next Amendment in this clause stands in my name. It is one that I was asked to postpone by the noble Earl the Lord Privy Seal on the last occasion, and perhaps I may be allowed to ask his attention to it now. I explained my objection to this clause on the last occasion, and if it were not that a suggestion has been made to me on one point, which I will mention directly, from a very important quarter, I would again simply move this Amendment, hoping it might be accepted at once. In the first place, I would say a few preliminary words. The object of the section is to make it quite clear, in consequence of some conflicting decisions in the Irish Courts, that the purchase money of land sold under this Act may be applied to redeem certain terminable Government annuities, one of those being the tithe-rent charges instalments, and similar matters affecting tithe-rent charges, and the others being the land drainage charges. In future this clause will put the legality of that course beyond dispute. But I happen to know that with the sanction of the Court this clause has been already acted upon to a considerable extent, under the idea that it was already a legal power; and it is to hold Trustees harmless in what they have done, with the sanction of the Court, in paying over money into a public fund under the control of the Treasury that I move this Amendment to the clause. It has been suggested to me by a high legal authority that if there is a case in which the Court of Chancery has made an order that money shall be refunded by Trustees this clause would be improper. I do not know whether there is at present any such case; but if it is, I admit it is a matter of great weight, and I should be quite willing, if the noble Lord will accept the clause, to move it with any alteration he thinks it right to suggest. With that explanation I hope the noble Lord will accept my Amendment.

Moved, in page 17, line 20, after “sold,” to insert the following words:—

“Where any such instalment, mortgage, or charges have been redeemed out of the proceeds of any settled land prior to the passing of this Act, the provisions of this section shall apply in the same manner as if such redemption had been made after the passing of this Act.”—
(The Earl of Belmore.)

EARL CADOGAN: Those who understand these legal matters best appear to be very much opposed to accepting this clause, which I think the noble Earl has admitted makes the matter retrospective.

I am informed that if a Trustee had been ordered to bring up a sum of money which had been invested this makes it legal. I am afraid I have no other reasons to give the noble Earl, and as it does make the matter retrospective I am afraid I cannot accept it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Does the noble Earl press the question?

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: Yes.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: The point I think is this: The substance of what my noble Friend has moved obviously commends itself to the House and to those who have studied the matter; but, of course, great care must be taken, in dealing with a measure of this kind in a way which purports to be retrospective, not to interfere with the directions given in the Code in reference to the proceedings of Trustees. It may be the fact, and I know it has been so, that Trustees have endeavoured to get a judicial sanction to their actions, and in past states of the law they have found that the decisions have gone against them. Of course, care must be taken that past judicial decisions are safeguarded, and are not sought to be set aside, and I believe that if some such words are considered either now or at some future stage of the Bill, it might be that the matter which I have indicated might be safeguarded, and that, instead of the words of the noble Earl, some such words as these might be introduced—I believe they would carry out the view expressed—

“Anything done before the passing of this Act, which, if done after its passing, would have been valid by virtue of this section, shall be deemed to have been validly done.”
Then follow the words to safeguard the judicial proceedings—

“Without prejudice to any proceeding instituted in a court of law before the passing of this Act.”

I believe that would substantially carry out the views of my noble Friend, and will safeguard the point which I think must be looked to of not disturbing past judicial decisions. If the noble Lord sees his way to substituting those words, they can be further considered on Third Reading if necessary.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: I should be quite willing to accept that. In fact, I have intimated already that I should be willing to accept any alteration which might be thought necessary, and if the noble Lord will either suggest a clause to me, or bring up a clause himself on Third Reading, I shall be happy to accept it.

EARL CADOGAN: Has the noble Earl any objection to putting in the words now?

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: No; I will withdraw the original Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: The noble Earl the Lord Privy Seal suggests that I should move the words in substitution now, and I will therefore do so.

Moved at the end of Clause 17, to add the words—

“Anything done before the passing of this Act, which, if done after such passing, would have been valid by virtue of this section, shall be deemed to be validly done, without prejudice to any proceedings with reference thereto instituted in a court of law before the passing of this Act.”—(The Earl of Belmore.)

Clause 23.

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: My Lords, my Amendment here is to insert a new clause after Clause 23 dealing with the guarantee deposit. This clause, although it is more or less on the same lines as the Amendment I had the honour to move in Committee is not absolutely identical. I hope it will meet some of the objections which were then raised on behalf of the Government. The Amendment I proposed in Committee was, after the Land Commission had endeavoured to sell by every means in their power in the open market and the debt was then declared to be irrecoverable, the owner, if he had received notice that his guarantee deposit would be impounded, would then have the option of requiring the transfer of land stock from the guarantee deposit to the full amount of the debt, and that he should be put in possession of the holding. This clause puts it in this way: If the owner re-purchases the holding in the open market in competition with other persons, he may require the Land Commission to transfer from the deposit as much Land Stock as will cover the debt. As I pointed out before, there is this advantage to the Treasury—that the Guarantee Fund is absolutely untouched in this case. It has been pointed out to me that in cases of owners who are not absolute owners, some injustice might be done to the remainder-man; so I have inserted words which I think will safeguard that. The words are to this effect—

“The Land Commission may, at the request of such purchaser, and with the consent of the person or persons (if any) beneficially interested in the guarantee deposit, apply the guarantee deposit pro tanto in discharge of so much of the purchase money as is required to meet the amount of the annuity in default.”

I think that will meet the point which has been mentioned to me, and provide against any injury being done to the remainder-man. I have the honour to move that this clause be here inserted.

Moved, after Clause 23, to insert new Clause—

“If the Land Commission, in the exercise of any power of sale of a holding, for default in payment of a purchase annuity, which they legally may exercise, have sold such holding, and the purchaser is the owner for the time being of the guarantee deposit relating to such holding, or entitled to the income thereof, the Land Commission may, at the request of such purchaser, and with the consent of the person or persons (if any) beneficially interested in the guarantee deposit, apply the guarantee deposit pro tanto in discharge of so much of the purchase-money as is required to meet the amount of the annuity in default, and thereupon make an order declaring the purchaser's interest in the holding to be charged with such sum in favour of the person or persons entitled to the capital of the guarantee deposit, but subject, nevertheless, to the future instalments of the purchase annuity.”—(The Lord de Vesci [Viscount de Vesci].)

EARL CADOGAN: I think the words which the noble Lord has added, “and with the consent of the person or persons beneficially interested in the guarantee deposit,” certainly do take away the objections which I had previously entertained to the clause, and with those words inserted I am prepared to accept it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 24.

Verbal Amendments made.

Viscount de Vesci

*THE EARL OF ARRAN: The Amendment which stands in my name is identical with that which I had the honour to move in the Committee stage of the Bill, with the exception that I have inserted another sub-section which stands No. 3 in the present Amendment and which I shall, with your Lordships' permission, move. In the Committee stage, if I understood the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor of Ireland) aright, he approved of the object of the Amendment, but he requested me to withdraw it at that stage of the Bill and to bring it forward on Report, as Her Majesty's Government was anxious to consider it a little further, and, accordingly, I did so. In case any of your Lordships were not present when I moved the Amendment before, I think it would be well for me now to state its object. The object of the Amendment is to insert a clause on page 19, after Clause 24, to prevent the proprietor—that is, the purchasing tenant—while any of the instalments of the purchase annuity are unpaid, from doing any of the acts enumerated in the clause which might injure an adjoining owner or occupier, or which might decrease the value of the holding as security for the advance made. If after the Land Commission have in writing drawn the attention of the tenant to the contravention of the provisions of the clause, they would then be at liberty either to sell the holding, or, if they thought that too strong a measure, to bring the offending tenant before the Petty Sessions Court, and if the offence were proved, the Court would have the power to inflict a fine not exceeding £5. I trust your Lordships will think these provisions are reasonable, that they are really required for the protection of all parties concerned, and that Her Majesty's Government will be able to see their way to accept it.

Moved, after Clause 24, to insert new Clause—

“A holding, while subject to a purchase annuity under the Land Purchase Acts, shall, as between the Land Commission and the proprietor for the time being of the holding, be subject to the following conditions of purchase, that is to say, to the conditions specified in section thirty of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, and also to the following conditions:—

(a) The proprietor shall not, without the consent of the Land Commission, do any act which, if done by a tenant at will, would as between him and his landlord be waste.

(b) The proprietor shall keep all main drains and watercourses upon the holdings at the date of the agreement for sale in good order, repair, and condition.

(c) The proprietor shall permit any person authorised in that behalf by the Land Commission at all reasonable times to enter upon the holding, and ascertain how far the several conditions of purchase are being observed.

(2) Where the proprietor persistently, after written notice given by the Land Commission requiring him to observe the same, contravenes any of the conditions of purchase which are set out in this section, or where the holding is liable to be sold for a breach of any of the conditions of purchase specified in section thirty of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, then, without prejudice to any other remedy, the holding shall be liable to be sold under this Act.

(3) In addition to the remedies already existing, the Land Commission may at their discretion, upon being satisfied that the proprietor has been guilty of a breach of any of the above conditions by an officer of the Land Commission or other person duly authorised by them in that behalf, summon under the provisions of the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act such proprietor before the magistrates sitting at any petty sessions held in and for the petty sessions district in which such holding is situate, or such proprietor resides, and upon proof of such breach, the magistrates may for each breach inflict summarily on the proprietor a fine not exceeding £5, to be recovered as in other cases of summary jurisdiction.

(4) It shall be the duty of the Land Commission to enforce the observance of the conditions of purchase."—(The Earl of Arran.)

EARL CADOGAN: As the noble Lord has said, I think the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor of Ireland did state that we should be prepared to accept this Amendment on Report, and we will do so. I cannot undertake, of course, to say what may happen to it when it gets into more troubled waters, but, as far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned, we are prepared to accept it.

LORD HARLECH: I do not know in this Bill, which is very complicated, where the machinery is by which such provisions as these are to be enforced. If there is no such machinery, but only the machinery which exists at present for calculating these charges, I cannot conceive how any such conditions can possibly be enforced. Perhaps Her Majesty's Government would point our attention to any clause which gives the Land Commission the power of carrying through this and many other conditions, such as those with regard to sub-division.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I would suggest to the noble Lord that the neighbours will have every inducement to see that these provisions are enforced. They will see to that. If the drains should be stopped, of course the neighbours will suffer most acutely, and they will report to the Land Commission, and take care to see that these provisions are enforced. I think it would be much better to have a fine of £5 than to have provisions which may never be enforced. Of course, it is not necessary that the fine should be £5, but it is not to exceed £5. I think the neighbours may be trusted to see to this. I have myself seen waste carried out on holdings that have been sold and it would be a very great thing not only in the interests of the people generally, but also in the administration of this Act, that this clause should be inserted.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE: I think the provision is excellent, but still my noble Friend does not point out to the House through what machinery it is to be carried out. The Commissioners up to this time have had no staff of agents or anybody else, and I think that will be a very expensive matter; and I do not know that there is any money provision or otherwise made for that purpose in the Act.

*THE EARL OF ERNE: I hardly think the noble Lord on the Cross Benches can have read the clause, because it says distinctly it shall be adjudicated upon at Petty Sessions.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Will the result of the clause be that the drains must be kept open? Because I would point out that that is the object of the whole thing. Whether a penalty of £5 will ensure that being done I should doubt. It is a very novel thing to impose a fine, and I am afraid it will not work. What you want is some power to do the thing and to charge it to the proprietor, who is bound to do it or be responsible for it. That has always been the mode of enforcing such matters, and I have very much doubt whether this clause will answer the purpose.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am not going to say that I quite understand this matter, but I would point out that if for the first offence he is fined £5, and that does not bring him to reason, on the occurrence of the second offence he loses his property.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not know that that is so.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Yes, by the 2nd clause. It says, where the proprietor "persistently" contravenes the conditions.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I should have thought the 2nd clause says enough without the £5 fine.

Clause agreed to.

*THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS: The Amendment which I now rise to move seeks to regulate the cutting of timber under the Ashbourne Act. The Land Commission has no power in purchasing a holding to pay for the timber at a valuation. It is obvious, therefore, that the landlord will cut the timber on the property before he transfers it, and your Lordships can easily understand, even if he omits to do so, an Irish tenant, if he can get £30 or £40 for the trees, particularly if they only shelter his neighbour's holding, will get it. The only timber which is likely to be left standing on estates sold under this Bill will be the signposts. I understand, under the Ashbourne Acts, an arrangement has been come to between the landlords and the Commissioners that the landlords may reserve the timber. It is easy to reserve minerals; until they are worked no harm is done to the surface; but if the timber belongs to the landlord and the land belongs to the tenant, the tenant has the undesirable sight of seeing the landlord's trees growing at his expense. Under this clause the tenant will be in a somewhat better position no doubt; he will only have the right of lopping and thinning unnecessary timber, but anyhow he will have the satisfaction of knowing that the trees which are growing will at the end of 49 years be part of his estate. The Amendment allows the Commission, in case of trees being in the interest of the holding—and I need not point out to your Lordships how necessary it is in Ireland in certain places to have shelter for the country—to take them at a valuation. This is a matter also which touches the public interest. I would also allude to the picturesque aspect to the landscape, but especially I would allude to that public advantage which is derived from the landmarks furnished by trees, and particularly for fishermen finding their grounds. This clause, if it is passed, cannot be said to be a great or any advantage to the landlord, because he will be merely paid for the trees at a valuation, and I scarcely think it will be likely to raise animosity between parties in Ireland, because it will be simply dealing with the physical condition of the country. I need hardly say how desirable trees are for the country. If the noble Earl the Lord Privy Seal is unable to accept this Amendment now, I am certain that before long, if this Bill is passed and the present system in Ireland with regard to cutting trees is carried on, some legislation on the part of the Government will be necessary to prevent the country being disafforested. I trust the noble Lord will be able to accept the Amendment.

Moved to insert, after Clause 24, the following new Clause—

"Whenever an advance has been sanctioned and the Land Commission think it necessary or desirable in the interest of the holding or of the public, or for the security of their advance, they may include the value of any timber in the price to be paid for the purchase of such holding, and may by the vesting order or conveyance, or by an order of the Land Commission, reserve to the Land Commission during the term of the purchase annuity the exclusive right to sanction the cutting of any timber trees upon the holding of the proprietor; and any attempt to cut the trees on such holding or other infringement on the part of the proprietor or other person of the rights hereby reserved shall be considered an act of waste, and the Land Commission shall have all the rights, powers, and remedies conferred by this or any other statute for the punishment of the proprietor for such waste."
—(The Duke of St. Albans.)

EARL CADOGAN: The object which the noble Duke has in view is, as your Lordships will admit, a very important one, and it is impossible that one should not sympathise with any provision which might tend to the preservation of trees and forests in Ireland; but I must confess that, probably from my own dulness, I have not been able quite to understand the clause which my noble Friend has moved. It appears to me he proposes that the Land Commission may include the value of any timber in the price to be paid for the purchase of the holding, that price being paid, of course by the incoming tenant, and then he proceeds to enact that the Land Commission shall have control over that timber, its cutting down, and so on. If the value of the timber is included in the price of the holding, surely it would be difficult for us to limit the right of the purchaser in the timber for which, under the noble Duke's clause, he has paid. I think it is very difficult to accept any clause the principle of which enacts that an owner shall be prohibited from cutting down trees for which he has himself paid. I am not quite sure whether I thoroughly understand the noble Duke's clause or the speech he made in introducing it, but I confess I feel considerable difficulty in the matter, and I am afraid the clause as it stands cannot possibly be accepted.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI: I would venture to suggest to the noble Duke and to the Lord Privy Seal that the first part of the clause might be left out. That would remove the objections to the clause as it stands. Undoubtedly in the case of trees along the high roads, their destruction would be a very great public loss. Those trees might be cut, because the roads are measured into the holdings subject to the user of the public, and the trees are in the hedgerows actually on the holdings. I need hardly remind your Lordships how severe the loss in other countries has been, and in Germany, for instance, in forest districts no man is allowed to cut down timber without engaging to plant an equal number of trees instead. Under the operation of the Act of 1885, I am sure it must be admitted that there has been a great denudation of timber in Ireland, and if that is not provided for now there will be great difficulty hereafter. I see no difficulty in accepting the latter half of the clause.

EARL CADOGAN: If I may be allowed to explain, the objection I take to the clause is this, if I understand it aright, in the early part of the clause the Land Commission are empowered to include the value of any timber in the price to be paid, as I imagine, by any tenant purchaser of the holding; and then it proceeds to make restrictions which are to bind that purchaser in regard to what he is to do with his own trees which he has paid for under the beginning of the clause.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: There is this difficulty in regarding him as absolutely in possession of this right: that he will not have actually paid for the timber so included in the price, because the purchase money is only to be paid by instalments spread over many years.

EARL CADOGAN: No; because under or by virtue of the vesting order, immediately on the vesting order being made the purchaser becomes the owner in fee.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Undoubtedly he becomes the owner, but he is much in the position of holding a mortgaged property under the Government. He becomes, of course, the holder in fee, and I quite admit that is an argument for his having full control over the holding, but he will not, in point of fact, have paid for the timber for a considerable time; and suppose he makes default after he has cut the timber down. I think that raises a great question whether he ought to be allowed to cut the timber down.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: There is no doubt whatever—it is a matter of experience—that the cutting down of timber by the new purchasers under the recent Acts has been a great calamity. The cutting down of the timber rather recklessly and somewhat in a prodigal spirit has not been advantageous. It is not a thing that is desirable, and if it can be checked in any reasonable and fair way it would be very desirable to do it. That, as I understand, is the object of the Amendment of the noble Duke; and provided that object is secured, however it is worked out he does not, I suppose, much mind—whether by putting in the word “exclude” or the word “include.” The object, I think, is not unreasonable; but the last Amendment which has been accepted before this renders the present Amendment, I think, wholly unnecessary, because the 1st section there would safeguard the trees adequately and reasonably, if required. Therefore, I think it will be found unnecessary and undesirable to press this Amendment, because the framing of the Amendment is open to a considerable amount of criticism. It would be open to misconstruction on the tenant's part, and might be open to objection from the landlords if it was sought to deduct from the purchase money the value of the timber; and whilst thoroughly appreciating the object of the noble Lords who have moved and supported the Amendment, and fully agreeing that it is desirable to impose a check on the too prodigal cutting of timber, I think that the 1st section of the Amendment moved by my noble Friend the Earl of Arran, will be sufficient for the purpose, and I venture to think the matter might be left there.

*THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS: With the indulgence of the House I should like to point out to the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor of Ireland) that the Earl of Arran's clause does not cover the case of a landlord who will not be paid for his timber, and who will naturally cut it. The question is, if a man is not paid for his timber he will cut it down?

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I would suggest with regard to the very reasonable criticism of the Lord Privy Seal, that the noble Duke should make some arrangement before the Third Reading to put this clause in some different form. It will be obvious to your Lordships, I think, that it would not do to first make a man pay for his timber, and then to punish him for cutting it. I do not think it is fair to make a man pay for a thing and then afterwards put a penalty on him for taking whatever advantage he can get from what he has paid for. But, at the same time, I think the objection might be met if the noble Duke would put the clause in something like this form—

“That the Land Commission should purchase the timber if they so thought fit, and that the tenant's annuity should be reduced in proportion to the purchase money put upon the timber.”

I am merely suggesting this to the noble Duke. There is a very serious question in Ireland at this moment in regard to this matter; and if every tenant farmer who may purchase his holding cuts down his timber at once the whole country will be disafforested, and the very climate will be changed, a change which would deteriorate the character of the country. Then there is another point. Many holdings have trees round them for the purpose of giving shelter to cattle. Does not it reduce the value of a holding if a farm that is sheltered, or has got some shelter for the sheep and cattle in the way of trees is denuded of them, if the trees are suddenly cut down and the farm left open to some prevailing wind? That reduces the value of security, and part of the security provided by the tenant's holding, which really provides the security, is the timber upon it. The tenant has really no right to cut the timber until the 49 years are up, and that would meet the noble Earl's (the Earl of Kimberley's) objection, if the tenant did not do it, but I can only tell your Lordships he does do it, and will do it. As to the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor of Ireland saying that the 1st subsection of Clause 24, as now inserted in the Bill, will protect the trees, I cannot, with all due submission to him, see that there is any protection at all under that clause, because it would not be waste for the man to cut his own timber. This is his own timber, and how can a man commit waste if he is only cutting what belongs to him? I must say I fail to see how this subsection can protect him; but, at the same time, I hope something may be done. If Her Majesty's Government will not accept the noble Duke's clause something must be done to prevent this appalling disafforesting that is going on all over the country. Only £9,000,000 have been expended up to the present time on land purchase in Ireland, and you can already see a difference—a most marked difference—in the country. The whole of the timber upon farms sold has been cut away, and what the state of affairs will be after £30,000,000 more have been expended in land purchase it is not difficult to foresee. What will happen will be that, as far as timber is concerned, there will only be left that which is on the landlord's domains. I think it was the noble Duke opposite who referred to the fact that the landlords were to be removed by this Bill. Well, if they are removed you will not have a tree left in Ireland, and, therefore, I hope Her Majesty's Government will be able to do something in the matter which will carry out the object of the noble Duke.

LORD HERSCHELL: I think the noble Marquess is under a misapprehension of the effect of this clause as inserted in the Bill. In my opinion, it affords the most complete protection possible, because it provides that the proprietor shall not, without the consent of the Land Commission, do any act which would as between him and his landlord be waste. If a tenant were to cut down trees he would as between him and his landlord be unquestionably committing waste. Therefore, this clause provides that he shall not do such an act as that. It has, however, occurred to me in reading it, whether it does not go further than was intended, especially with reference to the phrase mentioned by the noble Marquess, with whose criticism I entirely agree, namely, that a tenant purchaser, under these circumstances, ought not to do acts which will diminish the value of the security. I doubt whether that limitation "which will diminish the value of the holding" ought not to be added to the 1st section of Lord Arran's Amendment, because one can conceive acts which would not as between a tenant at will and his landlord be waste which nevertheless it would not be unreasonable to make waste for the purposes of such a Bill as this, because all you want to do is to preserve the security. Therefore, I think there should be some such limitation as that introduced at the end of sub-section (a).

*EARL STANHOPE: I think there ought to be some further definition of the word "waste." There is no such definition in the Bill. If there were I assume that the noble Earl's (Lord Arran's) Amendment would cover the difficulty. I am sure that noble Lords who are not in any way connected with Ireland, but who know something of the condition of that country, will see the very serious evil which might arise from the wholesale cutting of timber, and there undoubtedly ought to be some protection against it.

EARL FORTESCUE: I venture to think it is very desirable that every facility should be given for preserving the few trees one sees in Ireland. The shelter they afford is very valuable, not alone to the holdings themselves, but in the case of wind-swept districts, to lands far beyond the limits of the properties of the small occupying owners on which they stand, and which are liable under this Bill to be separately purchased. One of the melancholy features in Ireland is the terrible scarcity of trees, and in many parts of the country the population do not seem to be aware of the value of the shelter which trees afford. We have heard a great deal about our afforesting parts of Ireland, but we are taking no precautions against the very limited number of trees in existence, which are of great use in many districts, being swept away in detail.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Does the noble Duke press his Amendment?

*THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS: No; I shall be satisfied if the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal will consider the matter between now and the Third Reading. I accept the Marquess of Waterford's suggestion.

EARL CADOGAN: I am afraid we cannot accept the clause of the noble Duke as it stands, but we will consider between this stage and the Third Reading whether the object which it appears to be unanimously felt in the House should be secured, namely, of protecting the trees in Ireland, can be dealt with either by some such alteration in Sub-section A., either in Clause 24, as has been suggested, or by the introduction of some other clause in an amended form.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Clause 25.

Verbal Amendments made.

Clause 27.

*LORD CASTLETOWN: My Lords, the words I propose in the next Amendment which stands in my name are these:—After the word "law," to insert the words "or of mixed law and fact," in Clause 27. The object is merely a formal one, because, I think, all noble Lords will recognise in the case of appeals such as this, it is very often necessary in land purchase questions that questions of fact should be considered with questions of law. They are so inextricably intermingled as a rule that it is very difficult to keep them perfectly clear, and to deal only with the questions of law involved. I venture, therefore, to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Moved, in page 22, line 2, after "law," to insert "or of mixed law and fact."—(The Lord Castletown.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: This is a sub-section which was a good deal discussed in the House of Commons, and it was passed on the understanding, as I gathered, that the Judges who are to aid in the administration of the Land Code should only act for the purpose of deciding legal questions. That was the view taken upon it, and that is a matter upon which I think it is not desirable to cast any doubt. I think it is wide enough as it is drafted at present, in this particular sub-section which the noble Lord seeks to amend, for us to leave the drafting as it stands. Of course, any Judge to whom a question of law is submitted will apply his mind to it, with all its necessary surroundings, for the purpose of decision, and I do not think it necessary to amplify it by adopting this particular Amendment. I am guided in this by the fact that this was a clause which was very closely scanned in the other House of Parliament, and it was thought better not to make it wider than the present drafting goes. It is the sub-section which enables the Lord Chancellor to arrange that other Judges of the High Court shall be able to give their assistance in the decision of questions of law, and it is that particular section that the noble Lord seeks to amend by making it somewhat wider, and enable assistance to be taken from another category on the other side of the dividing barrier. It is, therefore, something in excess. I think we had better leave the drafting as it is. I notice that the noble Lord goes on and asks your Lordships to amend the last paragraph of the clause, but I will deal with that when we come to it. I think that in this particular clause we had better keep the drafting as it is.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

EARL CADOGAN: I have to move, in line 12, after "law," to insert "or of hearing any appeal." This is to enable any Judge of the High Court appointed by the Lord Chancellor to determine any question of law, and also to hear any appeals under this Act.

Lord Castletown

Moved, in page 21, line 12, after "law," to insert "or of hearing any appeal."—(The Earl Cadogan.)

LORD HERSCHELL: Does that mean an appeal on the facts or only on questions of law?

EARL CADOGAN: On questions of law and facts.

LORD HERSCHELL: Then does that give a new jurisdiction? Because I understood the noble and learned Lord opposite to say this clause had been very carefully considered, and that it was undesirable to extend the jurisdiction; but if you say "or of hearing any appeal," apparently you do largely increase the jurisdiction.

EARL CADOGAN: No; it is not increasing the jurisdiction.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Perhaps the noble Lord will tell us what the effect of this Amendment will be, because my noble and learned Friend beside me says it will have the effect of extending the jurisdiction beyond what is intended.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: The noble Lord who moved the Amendment just now does not present it exactly in the same point of view as the noble Lord who moved the last Amendment, because the point here is this:—

"Every Judge so nominated shall, during that time, have the same jurisdiction for the purpose of determining any question of law;" that is, any question which might be reserved for decision—

"as the Judicial Commissioner for the purposes of the said Acts."

Therefore, we do not want to widen it. I do not think it is in the least necessary. Every Judge has to decide questions of mixed law and fact. They are so interwoven that they cannot be separated. It is merely a question of drafting; but now the noble and learned Lord comes and says that it will increase the jurisdiction. The provision for hearing the appeal would, of course, enable the Judge, who was occupying the position pro hac vice of head of the Land Commission, to perform his functions as long as he is so acting, and to exercise his discretion in the cases brought before him.

*EARL SPENCER: As I understand the noble and learned Lord, there would be an appeal on facts, but I gathered from the opening remarks of the noble Lord opposite that the appeals were only to be on matters of law. These words would allow them to be brought on matters of fact as well.

LORD HERSCHELL: Is not the object of the noble Lord met by the next section, which provides that "the Lord Chancellor may nominate any Judge." Is not that sufficiently met by Sub-section 5?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: No; I think not. The Lord Chancellor would have to consider whether the case came under Sub-section 5, and he would have to deal with the case of a Judicial Commissioner being temporarily unable to act from illness or anything of the kind; for the time that he cannot sit and perform his functions that office is, of course, temporarily not in a position to work, and then Sub-section 5 would come in. Section 4 would come in whilst the Judicial Commissioner was engaged in other duties which would prevent him sitting in that Court. I think it is more a question of drafting, as my noble Friend very fairly presents it, than of actual substance, because everyone knows, and no one better than the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Herschell) that it is impossible for a Court to sit and decide a question of law without considering the surroundings. That is always done. Every Judge who knows how to do his business decides the point before him and gets on without the slightest difficulty; but if the drafting is changed here in this clause, I fear it would lead to controversies, misconceptions, and jealousies, which, I think, are not worth fighting about or discussing here.

LORD HERSCHELL: Do I understand that the noble and learned Lord proposes that the Amendment should be withdrawn?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: No.

Amendment agreed to.

Verbal Amendments made.

EARL CADOGAN: In line 24, I move to leave out the words "The Land Commission." I may explain with reference to this that when we discussed this section in Committee it was stated that the Land Commission would not be willing to be deprived of a share in this patronage. That, I believe, was the view of the noble Lords opposite, and I pledged myself that before the stage of Report we would do our best to ascertain the views of the majority of the Land Commission on the subject—whether they desired it or not. We have done so, and are informed that the majority of the Land Commission are not anxious for the patronage, and would prefer that the words "Land Commission" should be left out. For that reason I move their omission.

Moved, in line 24, to leave out "The Land Commission."—The Earl Cadogan.)

*EARL SPENCER: I think I started the objection to this the other night, and I still retain the opinion I then expressed very strongly. The noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal undertook to obtain the opinion of the Land Commission, and he states that the majority of the Land Commission do not wish to have this task as it is invidious, but I venture to say that it is not a question of what the opinion of the majority of the Land Commission is on this matter, but a question of general principle. I maintain it is wrong on general principle, independent entirely of what the majority of the Land Commission may say, that a body who have charge of a large number of local officers should not have a locus standi when an organisation of the staff is to be made. It might be exceedingly unfair to the Land Commission that they should not be consulted. It may be true that the majority of the Commission do not wish to have this task, but I maintain that they ought to be consulted, because they are the persons who know best which men are efficient, and how they perform their duties. In a future Commission the majority of the Commissioners might think it exceedingly hard not to be consulted. I, therefore, still adhere very strongly indeed to the opinion that the omission of these words "the Land Commission," as proposed by the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal is absolutely wrong, and I hope your Lordships will not agree to it.

*LORD CASTLETOWN: My Lords, I should like also to say a few words upon this matter before the noble Lord (Earl Cadogan) replies. I think it would be much wiser to leave the selection of the men you are going to trust in many important ways to the "Land Commission," as originally proposed. You use the words in the Bill that they are to be the men who are the "most qualified" for the posts, and surely the people who have the best opportunity of knowing, and who are most likely to know who are the most qualified are the Commissioners themselves. Although the majority of the Commissioners, as I understood the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal to say, have stated that they consider it would be an invidious task which they do not care to undertake for them to go into this question, I think we must not attach too much weight to the "thin-skinnedness" of the Commission themselves upon this question. In any case they would have to be consulted. It is their task to find out the men who have worked best under the last two Acts, those of 1885 and 1887, and are the most qualified, and it is to those men in the future that we must look for the proper working of this Bill. Under the circumstances I think it would be very unwise to allow these words to be taken out of the Bill. They were put in in the other House after very careful consideration, on the ground that they were proper words and that it was a wise provision, and I cannot see any reason why they should be excluded now.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I think there seems to be some misapprehension on the part of noble Lords about this matter which is not after all a very great or important one, or involving any principle. The power of patronage is thought by those who do not enjoy it, that is, who do not have to exercise it to be an agreeable one, but those whose duty it is to exercise that power know that though they may in doing so make many enemies, they will probably make few friends. Therefore it is not a thing to be slightly spoken of or carelessly imposed. I can quite understand the majority of the Land Commission here expressing respectfully their wish to be relieved from a position which I do not say is odious, but certainly is invidious, because they would have to make selections and rejections from a staff, as has been pointed out by the noble Earl, according to their knowledge of capacities and capabilities, and that is a task for which they would be content that others should be put in their place. All those are matters to be judged of; but the question remains, what is the best way of turning out a sound working clause; and I venture to think the soundest method of working, the best course to adopt, is to leave the Lord Lieutenant, as has been pointed out by the Lord Privy Seal, to make the requisite selections with the financial aid of the Treasury. It is obvious that the Lord Lieutenant must exercise that discretion in the same way as any Lord Lieutenant would do, that is by considering all the surroundings of the position, consulting those who he thinks can give the most useful advice, and, where he thinks that course deserves adoption, to use the very words of the noble Lord who has just sat down, "consulting the Land Commission." There is nothing in the Motion of my noble Friend to prevent the Lord Lieutenant consulting the Land Commission every day in the week if he likes, and as much as he pleases, and I have no doubt that in these matters the Lord Lieutenant will be pretty constantly in communication with the Land Commission, in reference to the appointments to be made. Is that not sufficient? Does it not meet every fair requirement to leave it open to the Lord Lieutenant to consult the Land Commission and everyone else he pleases in Ireland in making the appointments, without leaving it to the Land Commission to make the appointments, which might in extreme cases lead to something very like a "dead-lock," if one can use such an expression. But with regard to the moderate appointments which would exist under the Land Commission, I can see no good or valid object in forcing on the Land Commission the duty of vetoing the appointment of persons to fill positions as may be necessary in the administration of the Land Department. I think it is a sufficient provision and a reasonable and wise course to leave the Lord Lieutenant free to consult the Land Commission or anybody else he pleases, and that is all my noble Friend proposes in his Amendment.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I think this raises a very important question, because as I understand it, an entirely new principle is to be introduced into our system of patronage. Having had to exercise it myself, I know there is probably no more disagreeable duty. At the same time I am not aware that important officers of the State can plead that they would rather prefer not to perform the duties of their office, because they happen to be rather disagreeable. That, I think, is not an argument of much weight. I am rather curious to know whether this is likely to be a system generally adopted. If so, we might see some very curious results. For instance, the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) might make arrangements by which he and the Treasury might determine the appointments now made by the Secretaries of State. That would be an interesting proceeding, and it would certainly relieve the Secretaries of State from the invidious task of making selections among the persons whom they know in their offices, and, according to the noble Lord opposite, would lead to very much better selections being made. Why there should be this particular arrangement introduced into Ireland I confess I cannot see. The Land Commissioners will have the best opportunity of knowing the persons who have discharged their duties well from their contact with the officers themselves, and it seems to me to be a reasonable thing that they should have a potent voice in the recommendations. I, therefore, cannot agree to the Amendment proposed.

*LORD CASTLETOWN: My Lords, the Amendment which stands in my name on page 22, line 5, of Clause 27, embodies the same words which I sought to have inserted in the first part of the clause with regard to questions of mixed law and facts. As those words were not accepted there I cannot expect that they will be accepted now; but after the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor of Ireland saying there is something that might be useful in my Amendment, perhaps he will re-consider this matter, and allow it to be dealt with on Third Reading.

Clause 27, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 28.

*LORD CASTLETOWN: The next Amendments are really all consequential, because they are all dealing with the same matter in this clause. Those Amendments were to leave out the word "Commissioner," and insert "Commissioners" in two places, to leave out "he is," and insert "they are," and then for the insertion of the same words "or of mixed law and fact." The object of this Amendment is simply this. In the Committee stage of the Bill Lord De Vesci moved an Amendment, which had for its object the re-constitution of the Court to deal with Land Purchase cases. Unluckily, in my opinion, his Amendment was not accepted by Her Majesty's Government. They said it went too far and was too wholesale in its work. My opinion is that a strong Appeal Court should be formed to which any person who feels himself aggrieved by the action of the ordinary Court might have the power of appealing. For that purpose I would form an Appeal Court, consisting of the Judicial Commissioner for the time being, and another Judge, who may be nominated by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, to act as an additional Commissioner, and two Purchase Commissioners either Land Purchase or Fair Rent Commissioners. I think my Amendment is a fair one, which ought to commend itself to your Lordships. Unluckily Her Majesty's Government accepted in the other House an Amendment of Mr. Lees I think it was, and subsequently Amendments which entirely subverted the arrangements originally come to, and made what I must call a very mixed and confused Court. As showing that the view of the Government was rather in favour of the Appeal Court being constituted as I am proposing, I would refer your Lordships to the speech made by Mr. Balfour with regard to the amalgamation, that was upon Mr. Lees' Amendment. But, unluckily, they were introduced into the Bill for some reason or other. The Land Department Bill was tabooed in the other House, and the result has been that a rather confused Court has been created. Not to weary your Lordships any longer over this point, I will simply say this: The object of the Amendment is to create simply a strong and useful Appeal Court, so that any person among those aggrieved may appeal from the original Court to the Appeal Court which I propose to create. I have the honour to move the Amendment which stands in my name, and I suppose I may ask Her Majesty's Government to take them altogether, because they are practically consequential.

Moved, in page 22, line 14, after ("alone") to insert—

("Or of any two commissioners"); and in line 16, to leave out ("only") and insert ("or of mixed law and fact"), to leave out ("the") and insert ("two"), and to leave out ("commissioner") and insert ("commissioners (of whom one shall be the judicial commissioner appointed under the provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, and another shall be a judge of the High Court nominated by the Lord Chancellor to act as an additional judicial commissioner under the provisions of this Act.)")—(The Lord Castletown.)

*VISCOUNT DE VESCI: Before the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal answers I should like to say a few words. I trust Her Majesty's Government will give my noble Friend's proposals favourable consideration, and that they are prepared to accept them. These proposals are not, I venture to say, an entirely satisfactory solution of this vexed question of the constitution and method of procedure of the Court; but I think they are the best arrangement that could be arrived at considering all the circumstances, and the late period of the Session. No doubt your Lordships who have watched the progress of the Bill will have seen how, in all these matters, the Bill has been altered. It was altered by compromises, which are always unsatisfactory, entered into after the very confused and lengthy discussion which occurred in another place. Before I go strictly to the Amendments themselves, I wish to call attention to the Amendments which, as my noble Friend has said, I had the honour of proposing in the Committee stage of this Bill. The object of the proposal made in my Amendment was that the Land Judge should be brought into and absorbed into the Land Commission. Rather to my surprise, the noble and learned Lord the Lord

Chancellor for Ireland, on behalf of the Government, did not address himself to the principle of the Amendment, but said the Amendment sought to make an entire change in the tribunal, and referred to the opinion of Mr. Justice Monroe, the present Judge of the Land Court. Before I leave that part of the answer, I will say that I think it is obvious the Government must have been in possession of the views of Mr. Justice Monroe when they inserted the clause which was in the Purchase Bill of last Session, and in the Land Department Bill of the present Session. I was taken rather aback, I must confess, not being an old Parliamentary hand, by what then took place, but I took this course: I wrote to Mr. Justice Monroe on my own responsibility, and I asked him if he had any objection to state, whether there was any reason on public grounds why the office of Land Judge should not be merged into the Land Department. I do not know whether that was a right course to take. It may have been an improper one, but I hope your Lordships will consider, under the circumstances, that I was justified in the course that I took. Mr. Justice Monroe, in his answer to me, stated that the duties of the Land Judge were many and onerous, but that he saw no reason why, under certain conditions and under certain circumstances, the Land Judge should not be a member of the Land Department, and I submit that the substance of Mr. Justice Monroe's answer ought to be embodied in whatever answer may be given by the Government, and that we should not be met with a non possumus. We should then be in possession of the views of the Government in full detail, and perhaps some satisfactory arrangement might be arrived at. To return to the Amendment of my noble Friend, although, as I stated before, it is not in my opinion a full and satisfactory one, and although it is really in the nature of a compromise grafted on to a compromise, still, taking it as it stands, affirming and strengthening the judicial element of the Land Commission, I think it is very much superior to the Amendment which has been put down in the name of the Lord Privy Seal. The clause as it stands is, in my opinion, a blot on this Bill. It is a great blot on a very great measure, which will rank in the history of all similar European legislation as only second to the great Prussian land legislation connected with the names of Stein and Hardenberg, which regulated the old feudal land laws of that country. I ought to have mentioned before that I should have been in favour of taking a much stronger course, with the view of omitting this clause, so that the Government might be enabled to consider the question in the Recess, with the view to bringing in a new Land Department Bill which would be satisfactory to every Irish interest. But, failing that, I trust the Government will see their way to accepting the Amendment which stands in the name of my noble Friend.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, the noble Viscount is quite right in saying that this clause is the result, to a certain extent, of a compromise; but as he added that all compromises are unsatisfactory, and as he says that this Amendment is a compromise grafted on to a compromise, I am afraid I shall not be able to persuade him that this clause is satisfactory in itself. I think the strongest reason I have to give the noble Lord is that the constitution of this Court of Appeal, as it is formed under the Bill, has been arrived at, as the noble Lord says, as a compromise, or not actually perhaps as a compromise, but as the result of consultation between the two sides in the other House. That being so, it would be very difficult at the present stage, as I think the noble Lord will admit, to alter the whole course of the Bill. The Court now set up consists of five members, as my noble Friend knows, and if I understand him rightly he would add a sixth. There will be two legal members and one lay member in one division, and one lay and one legal member in the other division; and I am afraid, having so constituted the Court, we must keep it so. In some Amendments which come later on I have to propose an alteration where two Commissioners have come to a decision, and where it is necessary to provide for an appeal from two Commissioners instead of one. I am afraid I must tell the noble Lord I am not able to depart from the arrangement which we have made. Then with regard to withdrawing this clause and introducing a new Land Bill for the purpose next Session, I am unable to consent to such a reopening of the matter as the noble Lord proposes, and I must insist upon this clause remaining in the Bill, leaving it to Her Majesty's Government to deal in the future with any further matters which may arise.

*LORD CASTLETOWN: After what has been stated by the Lord Privy Seal, I will withdraw the Amendments, but I confess I should have liked to hear a little stronger expression of opinion on the part of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the introduction of a Land Department measure next Session. The introduction of such a measure would make the Bill, which is a great one as it is, a valuable and a working Bill. I may say that I have sold land under the two last Acts—1885 and 1887—but as long as this administration which is imported into the present Bill is kept going, I shall absolutely refuse to sell one single acre of land under it, and shall advise all my friends to do the same, because I do not think the system now adopted is either a sound working or a valuable system. I beg to withdraw the Amendments which stand in my name.

Amendments, by leave, withdrawn.

EARL CADOGAN: The next Amendment is in line 14. This is to provide, as I said before, for an appeal from two Commissioners. An appeal is provided in the clause from the decision of one of the Commissioners. This is to provide for an appeal from the decisions of two of them.

Moved, in Clause 28, page 22, line 14, after ("alone,") to insert ("or of any two Commissioners.")—(The Earl Cadogan.)

Amendment and consequential Amendments agreed to.

*LORD CASTLETOWN: My Amendment in line 21 comes next, to insert "all consequent duties and functions." It is in the same clause, and is to provide for the discharge of these duties by the Commissioners until the fair rent appeals lodged before the 1st of June in this year shall have been disposed of.

Moved, in line 21, after ("advances,") to insert ("all duties and functions consequent thereon.")—(The Lord Castletown.)

EARL CADOGAN: I see no objection to that Amendment. We will accept it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 28, as amended, agreed to.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, I have given notice of a Motion to leave out Clause 29, but, after consultation with one of my noble Friends, it has occurred to me that possibly I may suggest an alteration in the present form of the clause which would meet the views generally of the House. I propose to insert the words ("of delegation") after the word ("powers.") Clause 29 would then read—

"The powers of delegation conferred on the Land Commissioners under the 43rd and 44th section of the Land Law (Ireland), 1881, shall not apply to the discharge of duties arising under the Land Purchase Acts."

I think that is pretty clear. It hardly requires any explanation.

Moved, in Clause 29, page 23, line 7, after the word ("powers,") to insert the words ("of delegation.")—(The Earl Cadogan.)

*EARL SPENCER: I should like to have a little more explanation of that, because I object extremely to the proposal to leave out Clause 29; and, as far as I can make out, merely inserting the words ("of delegation") would leave the clause very nearly in the form in which it now stands.

EARL CADOGAN: It takes away the difficulty of settling the advances which under the clause the delegates might have been unable to sanction.

LORD HERSCHELL: As far as the clause prevents them delegating their powers, it will have the same effect under the noble Earl's Amendment, as I gather. The powers of delegation, as I understand, are not to be exercised. But, if so, what does it leave to them?

EARL CADOGAN: It relieves them from all duties which are not arising under the Land Purchase Acts. It allows them to appoint delegates for certain purposes which are mentioned, but it does not allow them to delegate their powers generally.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: Perhaps I may explain it is for sanctioning advances and registering titles.

A NOBLE LORD: Will the noble Lord explain why he proposes to leave out the words ("last preceding Census"): I think that will lead to some confusion. It must be definitely determined how the population is to be ascertained. It may fluctuate.

EARL CADOGAN: According to the last Census the population had decreased since the previous Census, of which this Bill was drawn, and the valuation remained the same, although consequently the rates had to be raised.

LORD HERSCHELL: If these words are to be struck out there is nothing to determine how the population is to be ascertained.

EARL CADOGAN: I think the noble and learned Lord will find the definition is given in another clause. The expression "population" means the population according to the last Census for the time being. It is in the definition.

Moved, in page 26, line 9, to leave out from "population" to "gives."—(The Earl Cadogan.)

Amendment agreed to.

EARL CADOGAN: The next Amendment, to substitute 10s. for 6s. 8d., is necessary for the same reason that I stated before—namely, that the rate has had to be raised.

Moved, in line 10, to leave out "6s. 8d." and insert "10s."—(The Earl Cadogan.)

*EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I should like to say a few words on this Amendment. I am not quite certain whether my remarks may not go rather further, perhaps, than the actual words which my noble Friend proposes. I was unable to be here on the Second Reading, or I should have made some reference to this which I consider one of the most important parts of the Bill which Her Majesty's Government have introduced—I mean the part of it affecting congested districts. Now, it was said, I think by the noble Marquess opposite, that this was the first attempt any Government had made to deal with this subject. I am told that the same statement was made by the Lord Privy Seal. I venture to disagree with my noble Friend in that particular, for in the Land Act of 1886, which Mr. Gladstone's Government introduced, we had a most important clause dealing with this matter. That clause was to this effect: it was to enable a Local Body to become the purchasers and hold the land instead of selling to the small proprietors. Now, I think your Lordships will agree with me, or any noble Lord, at all events, who understands what a congested district in Ireland is and what is the character of the holdings in such districts, that it would be perfectly futile to expect that the provisions of this Act will enable those small tenants only paying perhaps rents of £1 and 30s. a year to buy individually under the Act. You will, therefore, do nothing if you do not provide for that, and you will not be able to deal with what is one of the most difficult and dangerous characteristics of Ireland, namely, the existence of an enormous number of small holdings occupied by persons who cannot possibly out of their holdings meet even their rent, and who depend upon other means for paying that rent, sometimes coming to England, where they get money at harvest and in hay-time. Those persons are certainly a source of danger to Ireland, and ought to be dealt with. Unless you are able to sell an estate in a congested district to some Syndicate or some Public Body you will not be able to deal with this great evil. That is an opinion which I have deliberately formed and must deliberately express, and I believe if Her Majesty's Government expect under this Bill that any great number of these small tenants will purchase they will be disappointed. I was going to ask my noble Friend whether such a course as I have pointed out can be taken under this clause. I think it would be of great importance, but I am not sure whether I understand it correctly or not. It is possible under this sub-section that the Congested Districts Board will be enabled to advance money for the purpose, and that either they or the Land Commission will be able to hold the property while amalgamation goes on. If that can be done, and I contend it ought to be done, a great evil will be met. I think it is a matter of great importance, and I venture for that reason to make these observations which, had I been able to be present, I should have made on the Second Reading.

EARL CADOGAN: I am very unwilling to interrupt the noble Earl, but I ought to have done so sooner in order to point out to him that he has not given me the opportunity of moving the very next Amendment. This Amendment is only a drafting Amendment which is now before the House, namely, to leave out the words "or to the Land Commission;" but there is another which I was about to move for the insertion of the words "or that he transfers such interest to the Land Commission." The noble Earl will see that the two taken together really form one Amendment, and I would have pointed that out sooner, but I was unwilling to interrupt my noble Friend.

LORD HERSCHELL: Would this clause enable the Congested Districts Board to acquire a number of these small holdings with the view to dealing with them in the way suggested by the noble Earl? No doubt it enables them to give aid for purposes of migration or emigration on condition that the tenant transfers his interest in the holding to a neighbouring holder or to the Land Commission; but when he does so, what is the position of the Land Commission in relation to it? Is it to become the tenant, or is it intended that the Land Commission shall become the purchaser?

EARL CADOGAN: Under my Amendment the Land Commission would become the purchaser, because it reads then, "that the holding be amalgamated, or that he transfer such interest to the Land Commission."

LORD HERSCHELL: That would be that his interest is to cease; but is there any power in them to get out of the position they will then be in, either by purchase or in any other way? I do not see when the County Council have become transferees of the tenant's holding what they are to do with it. Are they to become the purchasers and sell it again?

*THE EARL OF ERNE: Perhaps I may be permitted to say a word on this question, as the words now proposed to be put in by the Lord Privy Seal were put in at my suggestion in Committee. The object of my Amendment was for the purpose of facilitating amalgamation in case the Congested Districts Board wished to amalgamate certain holdings, and they might not be at the moment able to negotiate with one of the adjoining tenants. Similar latitude is given to the Land Commission to purchase under this same clause, Sub-section 3, line 36. If these words are not inserted it appears the Congested Districts Board might be prevented altogether from carrying out the amalgamation which they wish and from promoting the migration or emigration to which the clause is directed, because it all depends upon the holdings being amalgamated. But if the Land Commission is able to accept the transfer of the holding with the view to facilitate the amalgamation the difficulty, it appears to me, would be got rid of.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I suppose the effect of the whole clause with the other sub-section is that when this land has been transferred to the Congested Districts Board they will then move the Land Commission to take certain steps, and among those I see that as soon as possible—it is in the Sub-section (b.)—the Land Commission is to endeavour to sell the same to one of the adjoining occupiers. Supposing the Land Commission, as my noble Friend seems to think is not improbable, find it impossible to sell to one of the adjoining occupiers, the necessary result will be that the Land Commission will hold this land until they do find a purchaser. That must be the result; I do not see any special provision for their holding it, but it seems to follow as a matter of course.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: This is one of the Amendments taken on the last occasion at the instance of Lord Erne, and I think the powers have been taken from the Land Department Bill which enabled them to deal with the expenses of management in a case like that contemplated, where a holding might be on their hands without purchase either by a neighbouring tenant or otherwise. There is machinery provided in the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

EARL CADOGAN: The next Amendment belongs to this matter, and has, in fact, been discussed.

Moved, in line 13, after (“amalgamated”) to insert (“or that he transfers such interest to the Land Commission.”) (The Earl Cadogan).

Amendment agreed to.

LORD HARLECH: The next Amendment stands in my name. I gave notice of it in Committee, but withdrew it then on the promise of the Lord Privy Seal to allow it to be proposed on Report. It is very simple, namely, to continue the power which under the Land Act of 1881 is given to the landlord. Under that Act the landlord has the right of pre-emption, and it is to give him the same right under the provisions of this Bill.

Moved, in page 28, after line 18, to add new Sub-section—

“(8) Where any such transfer or purchase is made of a holding in respect of which rent is payable, such purchase or transfer shall be subject to the like right of pre-emption in favour of the landlord as he now has under the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, section one.”—(The Lord Harlech).

EARL CADOGAN: I am afraid it is impossible to accept this Amendment. It appears naturally to be open to the same objections as those which were found in Committee. The landlord retains his right of pre-emption before the purchase of the holding by the Land Commission, and after the purchase it would be inconsistent to allow him the exercise of that right. I cannot see how it is possible to accept the Amendment, and I hope the noble Lord will not press it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 41.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I had an Amendment upon this clause with regard to the definition of the "annual value" of a holding, to strike out on page 32, lines 1 to 16, but I do not propose now to move it.

*THE EARL OF ERNE: In that case I presume, my Lords, that mine comes next. I move to leave out, in lines 5 and 6 ("the average amount of abatement allowed by the landlord"). It will be in your Lordships' recollection that in Committee the Marquess of Waterford moved Amendments of a similar nature to these which stand in my name. However, the form of those Amendments was not approved, and I venture to think the words I have placed on the Paper will carry out the object better than those of the Marquess of Waterford. The words which I move should be omitted are open to objection from more than one point of view. If you once recognise abatements given by landlords as a factor in calculating values, you encourage, in the first place, terrorism upon landlords to make abatements; and, again, you are practically setting up a fresh standard of valuation in Ireland, for the landlord's abatements will unquestionably be considered in fixing the rents at the end of the judicial term, and the rent will be reduced in proportion to those abatements. Then there is the danger of collusion. I do not suppose that a case of that kind would often happen; but, still, they may do so; and, unfortunately, we have had experience of what has happened under the Arrears Act, when the tenants and landlords have been found combining to defraud—there is no other word for it—the Exchequer; and a case of this kind may possibly happen; a landlord may say to a tenant, "Give me a higher price, and I will make you such and such abatements." Then, lastly, it appears to me that the retention of these words will, in nine cases out of ten, do away with tenants' insurance; and it does seem rather absurd to create a complicated piece of machinery like this in Ireland, and then, by two or three words in a definition clause, to do away with it entirely. I beg, therefore, to move the omission of these words.

Moved, in page 32, lines 5 and 6, to leave out the words ("the average amount of abatement allowed by the landlord.")—(The Earl of Erne.)

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: Before the noble Lord answers my noble Friend behind me, I would like to say a few words. This Amendment was originally proposed by me in a different shape, as my noble Friend says; and he has now moved it in another, and, I think, a better form, with the view of meeting the objections of the noble and learned Lord who spoke so ably upon it in the Committee stage of the Bill. But, my Lords, I do not think Her Majesty's Government could have been aware of the effect of these words, "the average amount of abatement allowed by the landlord," being inserted; and for this simple reason: that, as my noble Friend has stated, they would, after creating the most complicated machinery that it is possible to conceive in Clause 8, absolutely sweep away the whole benefit of that clause, if there is any benefit in it. I am myself opposed to insurance, and I told your Lordships so on the Second Reading, when speaking in reference to the calamity clauses, one of which is provided for by this insurance. But although I am opposed to insurance, I am a thousand times more opposed to the sweeping away that insurance by a side wind by means of the introduction of these words into the Definition Clause, which, as I think, sweeps the insurance away entirely, and, at the same time, puts into the Bill a most dangerous provision, as my noble Friend has pointed out, which would, in fact, establish a new form of valuation in Ireland. It will establish a valuation based either upon the kindness of the landlord or upon the terrorism he may be subjected to, and it would be most dangerous in every respect that such a form of valuation should be introduced. My noble Friend has alluded to collusion. I need not trouble you on that point, but you are aware that under the Arrears Act there was some collusion. I do not think myself there would be much collusion, but still this is a direct incentive to bad tenants and landlords to take advantage of this clause to cheat the Government. Your Lordships are not aware, perhaps, of the very small sum it would take in the way of abatement to sweep away the insurance. In the case of an 18 years' purchase it would only take a 5 per cent. abatement to sweep away the entire insurance. In the case of a 17 years' purchase it would only require 10 per cent., and 15 per cent. on 16 years, the percentage increasing as you get to a lower scale, though I think you will admit that 16 years' purchase is nearly low enough. But there is one point which my learned Friend did not raise at all in the Committee stage. It is this: That tenants are generally forgiven their arrears, or rather, if a tenant purchases, the landlord is bound to forgive all arrears of rent due. That is the first arrangement upon the application to purchase. The landlord says, "I will forgive you the rent due." Those arrears vary from one year's rent, which it always is at the very least, up to five years' rent all over Ireland. Now what would be the case? These arrears of rent must be taken into consideration as an abatement. What are they but an abatement? What better abatement can a man receive than sweeping away five years' arrears of his rent? I do not think that can ever have occurred to Her Majesty's Government, but I believe the fact is they allowed these words to be inserted in the Bill at about 2 o'clock in the morning when everybody must have been extremely tired. I am sorry to detain your Lordships' but I should like to point out to you the effect of putting in these words. In the case of abatements taking the arrear of rent forgiven. Just consider what the effect would be. Taking a gross rent of £100 for a holding or a number of holdings, let that gross rent be sold at 13 years' purchase. That would be £1,300. The share of the landlord's taxes would be 5 per cent. I think that is a very liberal computation. That would bring the annual value under Clause 8 down to £95. If you deduct a year-and-a-half's arrears, I think my noble Friend will agree that would be a very small arrear in Ireland, that would amount to £150. Then, if you divide that over five years, that would amount to £30 a year to be deducted from the £95. Therefore you get £65 as the annual value. If you multiply the £65 annual value by 20, you will find it will come to £1,300 exactly, that is to say, exactly the amount of the advance. Under Clause 8 it states that when an advance is less than 20 times the annual value there is to be no insurance. If you take a purchase at 15 years, one year's arrears will sweep away the whole insurance. I will ask your Lordships how many cases are there in Ireland where there are not one year's arrears? And at 17 years' purchase it only requires six months' arrears to sweep away the whole insurance. And I believe, under the Ashbourne Acts, something like an average of three years' arrears have been forgiven, these words, if kept in the Bill, would do away entirely with all the machinery provided in Clause 8. As I said before, I am entirely opposed to doing away with a thing by a side wind, and by a most objectionable side wind, when the thing could have been done by moving the rejection of Clause 8. Then there is another element of obscurity in this clause. Although the poor rate, county cess, and so on, are to be arrived at by taking an average of five years, there is no average for landlord's abatement and the landlord's abatement may go back to the year 1848, the time of the Famine, or, possibly, to the Flood. There is no time arranged when the landlord's abatement is to begin to be taken into consideration. I think that must be a mistake in the clause. Her Majesty's Government will, I hope, accept the Amendment of my noble Friend. It is, as your Lordships see, worded rather differently to my Amendment. As it was drafted the clause provided for an application to the Land Commission to fix the annual value to any man who had not had a judicial rent fixed. This Amendment gives the power of application to the Land Commission to both judicial and non-judicial tenants. I hope sincerely Her Majesty's Government will agree to the omission of these words, which if retained, will I am sure, lead to the greatest possible confusion in the future.

EARL CADOGAN: We have carefully considered the matter since the Committee stage, and the arguments in favour of the Amendment of the noble Lord have been stated with such force that I think I need not add to them. We are prepared to accept the Amendment he proposes and for the reasons which have been so ably stated to your Lordships.

LORD HERSCHELL: I regret to hear the announcement which the noble Earl has made on behalf of the Government, because it certainly has struck me the

some of the reasons given by the noble Lord (the Marquess of Waterford) were founded entirely on a misapprehension. He spoke of arrears forgiven as if those arrears were an abatement made by the landlord, and cases of that kind constituted the illustrations he gave. Now, arrears would not come within the express abatement allowed by the landlord. The landlord does not allow an abatement simply because his tenant does not pay him. It means simply remitting part of the rent and discharging the tenant from his debt. Therefore none of the rent in arrear would be taken into calculation at all in estimating the annual value, or whatever the term is, that is provided for. I certainly think the noble Marquess was right in one point. He justly pointed out that there ought to be a fixed term provided for the landlord's abatement. So far I went with his argument. You provide five years in the other case, and you ought not in this case to go back for all time, possibly, so far as the clause itself goes. But as regards the other matter it seems to me to be a complete misapprehension to suppose that these arrears would be taken into account in ascertaining what would be the average abatement allowed by the landlord. My objection to these words being omitted is this. I desire to see this Bill work; in order that it shall work the tenant must come in and buy, and if you so alter it and so hamper its working that the tenants will be prevented doing so you will destroy its object. You are here cutting out a provision in the Bill which is vital to it; and while, on the one hand, I do not believe that the presence of these words will do the landlords any harm, on the other it will prevent tenants buying and coming under the operation of the Bill, and so cripple it as an effective measure. If you cut out these words the result must be this. If the tenant has been in the habit of receiving abatements upon the rent from his landlord, the purchase money he will have to pay will much more nearly approach the amount of the rent which he would have had to pay before, and will even exceed it, and it will be the reverse of an inducement to him to come in and buy. It is really for that reason, wishing to see the Bill made a workable and valuable measure, and that its provisions should act as an inducement to the tenants to come in and buy, that I oppose this Amendment.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I cannot quite agree with what my noble and learned Friend has stated about arrears being altogether excepted from the word "abatement" here. I agree that if there is an arrear in regard to which there has been no settlement and which has not been remitted or waived, then there would not be an abatement; but if in any year by arrangement between a landlord and tenant arrears have been remitted or waived, I think that would be an abatement, and I do not think that ought to be taken into account.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: May I be allowed to ask the noble and learned Lord one question? If there were five years' arrears of rent due and forgiven, how is that to be treated in considering what abatement has been allowed by the landlord? As the noble and learned Lord (Lord Selborne) pointed out just now, the arrears forgiven will be counted as an abatement, and they must be forgiven before an application to purchase is signed. There is nothing in the Act which obliges the arrears to be forgiven, but they are as a matter of fact always forgiven when a tenant signs his application. Does the noble Lord mean that will not be considered an abatement? It is a distinct abatement, and the landlord would wipe out the amount by saying, "I will forgive you this rent and you can count it as an abatement and, therefore, so much to the good in fixing your annual value."

LORD HERSCHELL: I should say the mere fact of the arrears being due would show that there had not been any abatement; but if by the operation of this Act the rent was ipso facto remitted, that would not be an abatement within the meaning of the section. The argument may go to show that the section needs some amendment. I do not deny that; but I only wish to point out that if you strike out the words instead of amending them, the result, in my opinion, will be to cripple the Bill.

LORD HARLECH: I should like to point out to the noble and learned Lord that abatements have been granted by landlords during periods of distress, and I do not know why those cases should not be taken as abatements; because the "average" amount of abatement is to be taken.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I think the noble and learned Lord who spoke just now cannot quite have had present to his mind at the time he made his criticism exactly the part that is played by this definition in the scheme of the Bill. When the noble Earl sitting opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) spoke on the Second Reading of the Bill, this was one of the points he criticised and addressed himself to, and he indicated that it was desirable to leave it in an elastic way—not to lay down definitely that there should be one method of decision in cases of judicial rents and another in cases of non-judicial rents, but to leave it in a simple way to the Land Commission.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The noble and learned Lord is not referring exactly to what I said on this point. No doubt he is referring to what I said on another clause. What I said was that the Commissioners were not empowered to fix the amount in case it was a judicial rent, and I suggested that it would be better that they should have power to fix the rent in both cases.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: It is very hard to see how that fits in with the objection taken just now by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell). As I understand the point taken by my noble and learned Friend is that the Amendment moved by the Earl of Erne will have the effect of interfering with the working of the Bill. That is the substance of the objection, and he illustrates that by saying that it will put the tenant in a difficult position if this element of subtraction is struck out of the Bill, and that there may possibly be fewer advances made to the tenants than he would like. I have considered this Amendment from that very point of view of the object of the Bill, and I have arrived at the diametrically opposite conclusion. I think these are objections which might have been urged to the Bill as drafted, but that they are met by this Amendment moved by the Earl of Erne and accepted by the Lord Privy Seal. This, in my opinion, is calculated to leave the measure much more workable than it was before, and I look upon it as a valuable contribution to the workability of the Bill. I look at it entirely from that point of view, and I venture to say that the criticisms of my noble and learned Friend are not matters which commend themselves to my mind as conducing to the general workability of the Bill. With regard to what fell from the noble Lord (the Earl of Kimberley) on the Second Reading of the Bill, I think it will be seen that this Amendment is a substantial advance, at all events, in the direction he advocated, and upon what he regards as the scheme of the Bill, and it is solely as a contribution to the workability of the Bill that I welcome it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I assure my noble and learned Friend opposite that I had nothing in my mind of the kind upon the point he refers to. He will find at the end of the first clause, on page 32, that—

"Where an advance applied for has been sanctioned and a judicial rent has not been fixed for the holding and the purchaser applies to the Land Commission to determine the annual value of the holding."

That is not the point which is now referred to, but that is the point which I spoke upon then, and all I said was that I thought it was a pity there should not be a power for the Commissioners to fix the rent upon the application both of the purchaser and the tenant, even though the rent be not such judicial rent. That is not the point raised by my noble and learned Friend. So far from being elastic, with great deference to the noble and learned Lord, I cannot really see what he means by its being elastic. There is nothing elastic in it. It simply strikes out one of the deductions to be made in ascertaining the annual value.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: The two things must be taken together. It is impossible to take the Amendment by itself; it must be taken in connection with the next.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I have not looked at the next Amendment, and I do not know what its effect may be, but I see no difficulty in understanding this Amendment. It is simple, direct, and most intelligible as expressed. The Amendment relates to this; the Bill as it stands says that in calculating the annual value for the purpose of the Guarantee Fund you are to take into consideration the average abatement which the landlord may have made. Now, an abatement cannot be arrears unless they have been forgiven, and it cannot be arrears which are struck off by the operation of the Act. That is not an abatement made by the landlords. We all know what an abatement is. Suppose you have to receive £100 from your tenant and you take £80; you give him a discharge for the whole £100. The objection to the Amendment is this: under Clause 8 the tenant has for five years to pay an additional sum towards his Guarantee Fund in any case where the number of years' purchase is under 20; of course, if you by the operation of this Amendment raise the annual value, you will make the tenant pay a larger sum for those five years than he would under the Bill as it stands. I objected extremely to Clause 8 when we discussed it on second reading; but it seems to me that the operation of this clause now would be, with regard to the Guarantee Fund, making the tenant pay during those five years beyond the terms fixed. It would go distinctly against the working of the Bill, for this reason: that if you make the tenant pay this additional sum it will operate as a disadvantage to him for five years, and will deter him from purchasing. That is the operation of the clause as it stands, but the Amendment makes the clause much more burdensome and the obstruction to the working much greater. It seems to me distinctly against the policy of the Bill, and I would ask Lord Waterford and other noble Lords who take the same view, whether it will not have an effect which they do not desire, namely, to deter purchasers. The noble Marquess thought there ought not to be this guarantee at all, and I am much disposed to agree with him if it is levied on the tenant in the way it is put here; but if you put in this, you will simply interpose an obstacle which we shall all regret, to tenants purchasing under this Bill.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I ventured to say a few words in Committee on Clause 8, and I said I should move an Amendment when we reached this stage. I did draw an Amendment, but, on re-consideration, I withdrew it, because I found on further considering it that it would not work. But I still have the very strongest objection to this principle of the landlord's abatement. The object of ascertaining the annual value is, in the first place, to enable the tenant to know what he is going to pay, so that he may know what will be expected of him when he enters upon the purchase. By introducing this principle of landlord's abatements it would be perfectly impossible for him to know what he would have to pay until he had gone before the Commissioners. That was the first objection, and, as it seems to me, a fatal objection to the introduction of this proposal. Now, the object of ascertaining the annual value is altogether with reference to the 80 per cent. of the annual value, which is to be paid by the tenant during the first five years after he has made his purchase. The noble Lord who has just spoken says that he objects to that 80 per cent., because, he said, it was a very high payment for the tenant to make, and it would probably militate against the operation of the Bill; but by making this provision for the landlord's abatements it will militate against the operation of the Bill still further. If your Lordships' object is to cut down this 80 per cent., by all means do it, but do it in some other way than this. As your Lordships know, abatements by landlords are not given only in Ireland, but in England and Scotland a'iso, and abatements are given in virtue of certain circumstances which very frequently are merely of a temporary character and have nothing to do with the permanent value of the holding; and in no Act of Parliament can you find any case in which the value either of a tenancy or of a property is made up by a calculation, part of which is an abatement given by the landlord. If your Lordships were to consent to the introduction of this very fallacious principle into an Act of Parliament, I do not know to what consequences it might lead. If the object is to diminish the payment of the tenant, by all means diminish that payment; if 80 per cent. is too high, take 60 per cent., or 40, or whatever you choose; but do not make a calculation which is really founded upon a fallacious principle altogether. It is for that reason that I think the Government have taken a wise course in this matter, and I hope they will adhere to the decision at which they have arrived.

Amendment agreed to.

*THE EARL OF ERNE: Then, my Lords, the next Amendment is, as has been pointed out by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, to make this clause applicable to the judicial and non-judicial rents alike; at present it only applies to the non-judicial rents.

Moved in page 32 line 9, leave out from ("but") to ("applies") in line 11 (both words inclusive), and insert ("except that after the advance applied for has been sanctioned the purchaser may apply.")—(The Earl of Erne.)

EARL CADOGAN: I am prepared to accept this Amendment. I understand its meaning to be that as soon as an advance has been sanctioned the purchaser may make application, whether he has had a fair rent fixed or not. I would, however, ask my noble Friend to allow me to suggest some drafting Amendments, that is to say, to leave out "except," and insert "provide," and after "and," to introduce "thereupon."

*THE EARL OF ERNE: I have no objection.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 41, as amended, agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^a on Monday next, and to be printed as amended (No. 229.)

LOCAL REGISTRATION OF TITLE (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 209.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: My Lords, I should hesitate to ask your Lordships to afford a Second Reading to an important Bill of this kind at so late an hour, but that I have ascertained from noble Lords who take a very great interest in this question, and have especially devoted themselves to its study, that it would be convenient that its consideration should be taken to-night, and that I should name the Committee stage for some later date, in order that they may have a full opportunity of discussing the subject and of putting down any Amendments they may think right. I trust that course will be agreeable to your Lordships.

The Earl of Camperdown

The Bill is no novel measure, in the Parliamentary sense of the term; it has twice been presented to Parliament—that is to say, in 1889 and last year—and it has been the work of my right hon. Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Madden, who, I venture to say with confidence, is the greatest authority on this question in Ireland. It has also been considered by those best qualified to deal with it as experts, and the result is now before your Lordships. There is a very complete, though not long, explanatory memorandum attached to the Bill, and as that is in the hands of your Lordships, I venture to think that any statement I might venture to make at the present stage of the Bill, and at this hour of the evening, would be merely a cutting down and an attempt again to shorten that memorandum. In the Land Purchase Bill of 1885, which I had the honour of presenting to your Lordships, this subject was glanced at rather than dealt with. Provision was made in Section 14—I think it was—that Bill that on the execution of a vesting order or conveyance under that recent Purchase Act, a copy of it should be transmitted to the Clerk of the Peace of the county in which the property was situate, for the purpose of local registration; and I remember well that on the occasion of the introduction of that Bill, I was pressed by noble Lords connected with Ireland and taking an interest in the question to provide adequate machinery for carrying out that direction for local registration. At the time that Bill was introduced it was obvious that there was much urgency in its passing, and I did not see my way, though I recognised the importance of the subject to endangering the passing of the Bill by encumbering it with the requisite machinery clauses, and I think I was right, although, as I have said, I quite recognise the high importance of the subject, and the great desirability of passing clauses for that purpose at the earliest possible moment. The Bill now presented to your Lordships contains all the requisite machinery for carrying out the local registration which was glanced at in the Purchase Act of 1885 in the section to which I have referred. There are other matters which at a later stage

I shall be prepared to detail to your Lordships for providing an adequate, cheap, and working system of land registration in Ireland. This is a matter of importance, and it is now more than ever necessary that there should be an adequate scheme prepared for local registration in Ireland which will work cheaply and simply. At a time when a Bill like that which has just passed through the Report stage of your Lordships' House is becoming law, and when it may be expected that there will be a large increase of small proprietors in Ireland, I trust it will be of especial convenience and value now to accord a Second Reading to this Bill. I believe it will be for the convenience of such of your Lordships as take special interest in this question, that I should not name too early a day for the Committee stage, and I would, if it falls in with the view of your Lordships, suggest Monday week, when, I think, some noble Lords may desire to take the opportunity of discussing the subject, and they will also be able to move any Amendments which they may think the measure requires.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor of Ireland.)

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, no doubt this is a measure of great importance, but I certainly do not intend, after the noble and learned Lord's introductory speech, to detain your Lordships on the present occasion by discussing any of its details. There is, however, one part of it which I think, if I understand it rightly, may lead to complication, and is to my mind somewhat extraordinary legislation. Your Lordships will be aware that the question of the devolution of real estate has often been considered in this House, and there has, no doubt, been considerable difference of opinion upon it. I have always taken the view that it ought to be assimilated to the devolution of personal estate, that in cases of intestacy it should no longer go to the heir, but be passed to the personal representatives and be dealt with in the same way as personalty. In the Bill, as introduced by the noble and learned Lord, this provision is made, as I understand it, that where any land is purchased under the Land Purchase Acts, the present law of inheritance shall cease, that the land shall go to the executors and be distributed in the same way as personalty; but that where any land, though registered, has not been purchased under the Purchase Acts, the old law of inheritance is to remain. So that you will have the land in Ireland divided into two classes; land which was at one time or other dealt with under the Land Purchase Acts, where the law of inheritance is abolished, and land which has not been dealt with under the Land Purchase Acts, and as regards which the old law continues. Now, that seems to me to be an extraordinary and anomalous course to adopt. The present law of inheritance may be good or bad—a measure to assimilate the devolution of estates to that of personal estate in the case of intestacy may be good or bad; but it strikes me that the same principle should be applied to all land, and that you should not make this division into two classes, and deal with one class in one way and with the other in another. I cannot help thinking it will lead to great difficulty hereafter. A person is possessed of property: to whom it is to go in the case of an intestacy will depend, as I understand, upon how it was purchased 20, 30, 40, or 50 years before. If it was purchased under the Land Purchase Acts, it will have to be distributed like personal property; if it was not, then the old law is to prevail, and it is to go to the heir. It is very desirable that a person in possession of property should know how it will go if he leaves no will when he dies, but that will all depend upon the result of an investigation with regard to the dealing with land which he may have only bought the year before, but which 20 or 30 years previously had been purchased under the Land Purchase Acts. I cannot help thinking that such a provision as that requires serious consideration, and that it will lead to the gravest complication if such a change in the law is introduced in this piecemeal manner, because, as I have pointed out, it must be then very difficult for anyone to know what the devolution of his property will be.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: As I understand, the noble and learned Lord has postponed his full explanation to your Lordships until we go into Committee on the Bill. No doubt some noble Lords who have for the last two years taken great interest in this subject, and have examined the measure very carefully, will be glad upon that occasion to make some observations. Meanwhile, we propose to put down a limited number of Amendments, which I have no doubt will be carefully considered, and therefore I do not wish to say much upon this occasion. There is, however, one point on which I would like to make a remark, and that is, that while under this Bill the titles of tenant-purchasers will be compulsorily registered, those of the vendors will only be registered by the Court on the application of the purchaser. I confess, if it were a practicable thing to do (and I agree that possibly it may not be practicable), I should have liked to have seen the position of the purchaser and the vendor exactly the same, and that the vendor's title should be compulsorily registered in this new Court. But failing that, I, or one of my noble Friends, will put down an Amendment following the Record of Titles Act, 1865, by which, unless a vendor objected, the title which had been investigated as regards the rest of his property as well as what he has sold, would be placed upon the record. The reason, as I understand, why the Government have not thought that desirable, in the present instance, is that it has been stated that solicitors, in proceeding under the Act of 1865, have rendered that Act a dead-letter by always inviting their clients to sign a paper of objection. I think I shall be able to show that the circumstances at the present day are entirely different to what they were in 1865, before any of these Land Acts were passed. The business of solicitors has very much changed in its character since, and I hope there will be no disposition to render an Act of this sort a dead-letter, but that, on the contrary, they will cordially endeavour to carry it out and make it work smoothly. We look upon this Bill as the first step in a very great reform in the registration of titles in Ireland, and we wish it every success.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: I have only one word to say in reply to the remarks which have been made by the noble Lords who have spoken. Of course, I can promise that every Amendment which may be put down will be most respectfully and fully considered, and that every consideration will also be given to the important suggestions which have been made upon the Bill. I would point out that this is a Bill which creates the deepest interest in Ireland, and among those who are connected with Irish affairs. It is a Bill dealing with Ireland and Irish property. Everybody who is acquainted with the constitution of the House of Commons knows that it is very hard to get unanimity there on any Irish subject, and this is one of those rare Bills which has succeeded in winning the approval of all sides and all parties connected with Ireland. It now comes up to your Lordships accredited by the unanimous Irish opinion in that House, and that is a circumstance which I am sure will have very great weight with your Lordships. Practically, I may remind your Lordships that if this Bill is subjected to anything like acute amendment from even the best possible disposition, that will have a very deterrent effect upon its chances of becoming law this Session. We are aware that women like kindness; but we are also aware that women may be killed by too much kindness, according to the well-known aphorism; and therefore I venture to submit to your Lordships that the discussion which takes place on this Bill should be temperate as well as kindly, and that the Amendments which may be put down by those noble Lords who take an interest in this Bill should be such as they consider absolutely essential for elucidating its meaning and making it work well. What my noble Friend has said as to the discussion which may take place hereafter is quite reasonable. I am aware that the noble Lords who have reserved their criticisms are quite within their rights, and I can only say that I shall listen to them with respect when they come to speak them. The noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Herschell) has said a few words of important criticism on the Bill, and I shall be glad to consider all the views he may think it his duty to press on the House. I feel the interest and importance of what he says; but it is obvious that if it is proposed by one sweep of the pen to change by one short clause the whole devolution of landed property in Ireland that would be a measure which very likely would not pass in the other House of Parliament, with that calm and smooth tranquillity which it has hitherto been the good fortune of this important Bill to meet. Many reasons can be suggested why the simple method of devolution proposed in this Bill should be adopted with the machinery for registering the titles of those who wish to become owners. I will reserve any further remarks until a later stage of the Bill, and I hope then to give those who take an interest in the matter adequate and satisfactory reasons for urging them to facilitate the sound and practical working of the scheme drafted in the Bill.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, this Bill is one which is designed to facilitate the more economical administration of two offices which are at present distinct. It is for the purpose of amalgamating them. Your Lordships will remember that the Middlesex Land

Registry was introduced on the decease of a person who had held the office for several years, and there is an Act of 1875, the present in existence, in connection with it. The object of this Bill, as I have said, is to amalgamate the existing offices. It is simply designed for the purpose of facilitating the working more economical and facilitating that amalgamation. It has been drafted with the view of avoiding anything which would lead to controversy, and anything which should be seriously objected to in the Bill would be dropped rather than that the Bill should be imperilled.

QUESTIONS.

ALLEGED MURDER OF PARSEE WOMEN.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the agitation in Bombay consequent on the alleged murder of two Parsee women; whether he is aware that serious charges are brought against the police in connection with this affair; and whether he will recommend the Bombay Government to institute an independent inquiry into the matter?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has no information on this subject except such as may be obtained from the Bombay newspapers. It appears that a person has been committed for trial on a charge of murdering the women referred to. The Secretary of State will not recommend any interference by the Bombay Government with the due course of law.

CASE OF BULWUNT RAO.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he has now received information as to the case of Bulwunt Rao, formerly an official of the Indore State, for whose arrest a warrant was recently obtained from the British Residency Magistrate at Indore, at the instance of the Maharajah Holkar, the Ruler of Indore, on a charge of having written a letter in a local newspaper, commenting on certain proceedings of the Maharajah; is he aware that although Bulwunt Rao was living at the time in the Gwalior State, where the warrant could not be legally executed, the warrant was nevertheless entrusted to a body of the Indore Police, who seized and murdered Bulwunt Rao on the 19th May last in the streets of Ujain; whether it has been brought to his notice that the widow of the said Bulwunt Rao has written a letter to the Agent to the Governor General for Central India, charging the Maharajah Holkar with having ordered the commission of the crime, and also that Bulwunt himself, during the three weeks immediately preceding his death, wrote letters to various persons, one of whom is resident in this country, declaring that information had reached him from Indore that the Maharajah Holkar had issued orders to the police that he, Bulwunt Rao, should be made away with; that he, Bulwunt Rao, had communicated this to the District Commissioner of the Gwalior State, who had promised to do his best to protect him, but that the Maharajah Holkar's police had then been encamped at the railway station for three weeks waiting to carry out the Maharajah's orders; and whether the Government of India will institute an inquiry into the truth or otherwise of the allegations thus made in writing by the deceased a few days before his death?

SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State communicated with the Government of India on the subject of Bulwunt Rao, after the former question of the hon. Member in this House, and the following telegram has been received in reply:—

“Agent to Governor General in Central India reports that this man was arrested under warrant issued by the Residency Court, Indore, at the request of the Indore State, for publication of a defamatory libel in the Eastern Herald. He was arrested in Ujain by Gwalior and Indore police, one of our railway police being also present. He was apparently treated with great violence, and died of syncope. The Agent to the Governor General reports that the Durbars will use every effort to secure the punishment of the offenders. The case will be watched."

MR. KEAY: Will the right hon. Gentleman reply to the last paragraph of the question, whether the Government will institute an inquiry into the truth of the allegations made by this man a few days before his death?

SIR J. GORST: I really cannot say whether the Government of India will make any further inquiry at present, as the case is before the Court. It would be beyond the province of the Government of India to interfere until a Report in the ordinary course has been received.

CENSUS ENUMERATORS.

MR. KEAY: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the Census enumerators for the town of Forres have only just been paid, although their work was finished three months ago; and if he can say if there was in this case any special cause of delay?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The cause of delay was the excessive claims for mileage made by the enumerators in question, which necessitated a reference to the Sheriff for investigation.

SCHOOL BOARD ELECTION IN BELLIE, MORAYSHIRE.

MR. KEAY: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to an article in the Northern Daily News of the 10th instant, referring to certain occurrences at the last School Board election in the parish of Bellie, in Morayshire; whether he is aware that Andrew Macdonald, a saw miller in the employment of the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, came forward as a candidate of the working classes, his nominators including three fellow employés on the Duke's estate; that on the last day but one on which nominations could be withdrawn, the Duke's overseer, named John Andrew, took Macdonald into his office, and gave him his choice either to withdraw from his candidature or to be dismissed from his appointment, also adding, "If you don't withdraw it will be the worse for your nominators;" that Andrew then went to two of these nominators, and told them to get Macdonald to withdraw, and that Macdonald, having received this information, withdrew, was again warned by the Duke's overseer that, if elected, he would be dismissed from the Duke's service; and that, having been duly elected a member of the School Board, he wrote to the Duke informing him of the circumstances, and received on 25th April a simple acknowledgment of his letter; and whether it is in accordance with the law to intimidate a candidate for the School Board, or his nominators, in the manner here alleged, with the object of procuring his withdrawal from the contest?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Notice Paper was the first intimidation I had of the matter which forms the subject of this question. I am informed that the statements made are inaccurate, but even were they correct, there is nothing shown which amounts to undue influence as defined by the Corrupt Practices Acts.

POST OFFICE REGULATIONS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with reference to the system of transferring members of the Service from one office to another, at their own instance or from any other cause, whether, by the Rules of the Post Office, such members, clerks or others, so transferred are compelled to take, upon the staff of the office to which they have been transferred, rank secondary to members who in point of service are many years their juniors, or to others who at the time of such transfer may only be passing through the probationary period of their appointment; whether the latter are considered and ranked as established servants of the Department before they have had their appointment confirmed; and, if so, upon what grounds are probationers permitted to take rank in seniority, and subsequently receive promotion, over transferred members of the Department with several years' service; whether, when a question of promotion arises, years of service spent in one office are ignored upon transfer to another; and, if so, will he remedy this grievance; and, if this system be admitted, whether he will provide that members about to be transferred, or who are seeking transfer, from one office to another shall have clearly defined to some obscure position which they will expose to put transfer; whether he is aware the transfer from one office to another actually entails heavy pecuniary loss; and whether it is usual to transfer members of the Service, either optionally or arbitrarily, from one office to another, and to subject them to loss of income, as well as minimise their prospects of promotion, without compensating such members for losses so sustained?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Dublin University): I have received a representation on the subject referred to by the hon. Member, and will examine the statements which it contains.

THE SHENSTONE SCHOOL.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is now in a position to state what decision, if any, the Education Department has come to with regard to the case of the master of Shenstone School, near Lichfield?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): No complaint has reached the Department, and there are accordingly no grounds for proceeding further in the matter.

CAPE TOWN AND SIMON'S BAY.

SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether all lands and premises used by, or reserved for the use of, the Royal Navy at Simon's Bay are permanently vested in the Crown as represented by the Imperial Government; and, if not, what is the precise nature of the tenure by the Admiralty of such lands and premises?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): All the lands and premises in question at Simon's Bay are held by the Admiralty on a freehold tenure, but the grant of certain property by the Colonial Government was conditional upon the land being used for naval purposes.

Mr. Sexton

SIR J. COLOMB: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the authority and control of the Admiral commanding Her Majesty's ships is as full and complete over the ports of Cape Town and Simon's Bay as that of Admirals commanding Her Majesty's ships over the ports of Portsmouth, Plymouth, and other fortified naval ports of the United Kingdom; and, if not, what is the nature and cause of any difference which now exists?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Admiralty has no legal authority over the ports either at Cape Town or Simon's Bay in time of peace. Such authority at Cape Town has not been considered necessary, as it is a purely mercantile port, and at Simon's Bay Her Majesty's ships are accorded only prior rights of anchorage in the bay generally. No rights were specially reserved to the Admiralty when the colony was granted self-government, and therefore any exclusive authority over the anchorage in time of peace must be conferred by the Colonial Government.

METROPOLITAN OVERSEERS LISTS.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I had intended to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will grant the Return to be moved for to-day in reference to the Metropolitan Overseers Lists for the coming revision? but as the right hon. Gentleman is not in his place I will defer the question.

NEW UNIVERSITY FOR LONDON.
